Meditation helps U. Maryland students find health, spirituality

By Allison Stice
The Diamondback (U. Maryland)

BALTIMORE, Md. – College students at the University of Maryland and around the country are increasingly finding meditation a part of their overall health care, as health care providers learn more about the health and cognitive benefits of meditating.

Student groups like the Meditation Club and classes through the University Health Center and Campus Recreation Services are proliferating and promoting meditation as a means to combat anxiety, depression and even drug abuse, while meditation techniques are an integral part of other therapies like the smoking cessation and stress management programs.

At the Center for Health and Wellbeing, Coordinator of Wellness Programs Tracy Zeeger said last spring's decision to add free meditation classes – which became popular right away and continue to bring in about seven students per class – twice a week was encouraged by University Health Center Director Sacared Bodison as a means to bolster the alternative medicine programs at the health center.

Zeeger said she has also seen an increase in her appointments for wellness counseling, where she incorporates meditation techniques like concentrated breathing and guided visual imagery into offerings such as relaxation training.

"Meditation falls very neatly into the category of wellness in that it not only promotes physical health but mental and spiritual health as well," Zeeger said. "It can help with students who suffer from depression or mild anxiety. There are alternatives to prescription pills."

Attendance at the meditation class tallies about as many as the main lobby for the Center of Health and Wellbeing can comfortably hold.

At the Meditation Club meeting on McKeldin Mall Monday, about 30 students gathered in a circle, casting long shadows under the glare of the street lamp as they practiced meditation in silence. The club encourages students from all religious backgrounds to attend, junior history major Ryan Zembik said, and has helped him with stress and controlling his temper.

"It would be to our advantage if a class could present the different forms of meditation and their benefits," Zembik said. "It's good for you, it's healthy, and it's something that people should do that they don't know how to."

"More and more people are searching for a spiritual meaning," said sophomore English major Ivan Goldensohn, a leader of the Meditation Club.

In addition to sessions and clubs, a larger effort to incorporate meditation techniques into higher education is underway with Association for Contemplative Mind in Higher Education, created in May 2008 as a subset of the Center for Contemplative Mind in Society. The association is looking at practices from the view of the cognitive benefits and what it offers for learning, rather than incorporating religious beliefs.

"It fits into college life because it helps with sustaining attention and focus and the capability to have insights and be more open to information," said Beth Wadham, the academic associate for ACMHE. "Educators have been experimenting, and it's starting to coalesce into a movement that's getting its quantitative research together."

Researchers at Harvard Medical School and the Center for Alternative Medicine found that more than 40 percent of Americans have used alternative medicine therapies at some point in their lives, and that percentage is greater for those with a college education, according to the Annals of Internal Medicine.

Meditation in the classroom was difficult, he said, but he's working on how to more effectively incorporate meditation study and techniques for a future class he hopes to run. One benefit he said he hopes he gave his students is the ability to look at their own thoughts objectively, rather than buying into all of them.

"In the broad teaching culture and on this campus, there is room to try different approaches to the subject and how they learn," Stairs said.

Goldensohn said that in spite of an increased interest in meditation, there is still a stigma that it involves "sitting cross-legged and going, 'Ohmm.' But the benefits are tangible and he said he no longer suffers from the insomnia that plagued him as a child, or the drug abuse he turned to as a teenager.

Stem cells on the table

Lunch meeting convinces Bush

By Kevin Bardeen
Badger Herald (U. Wisconsin)

MADISON, Wis. – In a summer 2001 meeting with President George W. Bush, former Gov. Tommy Thompson helped convince Bush to approve limited embryonic stem cell research, Thompson said Tuesday at the World Stem Cell Summit.

Thompson, who served as Bush's secretary of health and human services from 2001 to 2005, said he finally felt comfortable telling the story "because President Bush is almost out of office."

Bush had asked Thompson and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove to lunch.

"He says, 'Gentlemen, I want you to debate embryonic stem cells for me,'" Thompson said. "He says, 'Karl, I know you're opposed to it, and Tommy, you're for it. I want to learn about it.'"

Thompson said he told the president "every American" has a relative or friend who has suffered from diseases like cancer, Parkinson's disease and dementia.

"And every one of those individuals that is suffering from that disease has got some inner hope, some inner hope that embryonic stem cells or stem cell research is going to find a cure for them," Thompson said.

On Aug. 9, 2001, Bush announced he would allow federal funding for the research of 78 lines of embryonic stem cells.

Prior to that, the administration refused to fund any research involving embryonic stem cells, and Rove aimed to continue that policy.

"I'm absolutely certain if that lunch had not taken place, the research of the 78 lines would not have taken place," Thompson said.

Thompson, a four-term Wisconsin governor, has been a supporter of embryonic stem cell research since 1998, when University of Wisconsin anatomy professor James Thomson first isolated human embryonic stem cell lines.

Like many speakers at the World Stem Cell Summit, Thompson called upon the next president to lift the restrictions put in place by Bush.

Thompson also recommended an aggressive plan to cure cancer. He said he would advise the next president to take up a plan he talked about in his short-lived 2008 presidential candidacy.

That plan would aim for curing breast cancer by 2015, prostate cancer by 2020 and all forms of cancer by 2025.

"We have the capacity to do that," Thompson said. "Just like we put a man on the moon. And just like Ronald Reagan says, 'Tear down this wall.'"

Thompson's remarks were a part of a panel that also featured Democrat Greg Simon, who oversaw the National Institutes of Health and the National Cancer Institute as chief domestic foreign policy adviser to former Vice President Al Gore.

"I ask the question: WWSPD? What would Sarah Palin do? And then I do the opposite, and we'll make some progress in stem cell research," Simon said, jokingly.

A White House spokesperson did not return a Tuesday afternoon phone call seeking comment on the meeting between Thompson, Bush and Rove.

Beer pong stabbing suspect could face 20 years in prison

By Mike Gerrity
Montana Kaimin (U. Montana)

MISSOULA, Mont. – A University of Montana student remains hospitalized after he was repeatedly stabbed over a game of beer pong last weekend.

Collan J. Sheppard, 23, has been charged with felony assault with a weapon and is being held on $50,000 bail.

Sheppard, who is from East Glacier, stabbed Jerry Brady Stewart in the abdomen and the arm, puncturing an artery after the alleged disagreement, according to court records.

The incident occurred around 1:00 a.m. Saturday morning at 1117 Cleveland St., where a party was being held and several people were playing beer pong in the basement.

UM sophomore Brenna Gibson – a member of the household – said Sheppard became angry with her over a "house rule" – a rule observed by some who play the game that depends on the household in which the game occurs.

"Because Collan had been being aggressive with me, 'Brady (Jerry Stewart) stepped in and told him to calm down because it was just a drinking game," Gibson said.

According to Gibson, Sheppard, who was visibly drunk, turned to Stewart and asked if he wanted to step outside.

That's when the night got ugly.

"Witnesses at the party said the argument escalated between Sheppard and Stewart and a physical fight started," court records state.

Gibson, however, said she saw Sheppard holding what looked like a folding knife before the two even made physical contact.

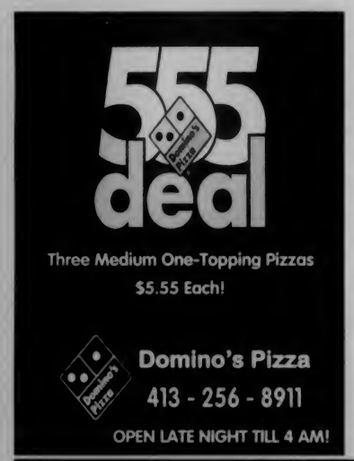
"He had the knife out before he got over to Brady," Gibson said, and added that she saw Sheppard come at Stewart and back him into the corner by the basement door as partygoers rushed in to pull him off.

After everyone drew back, she said she saw that Stewart was already bleeding from a large gash in his stomach.

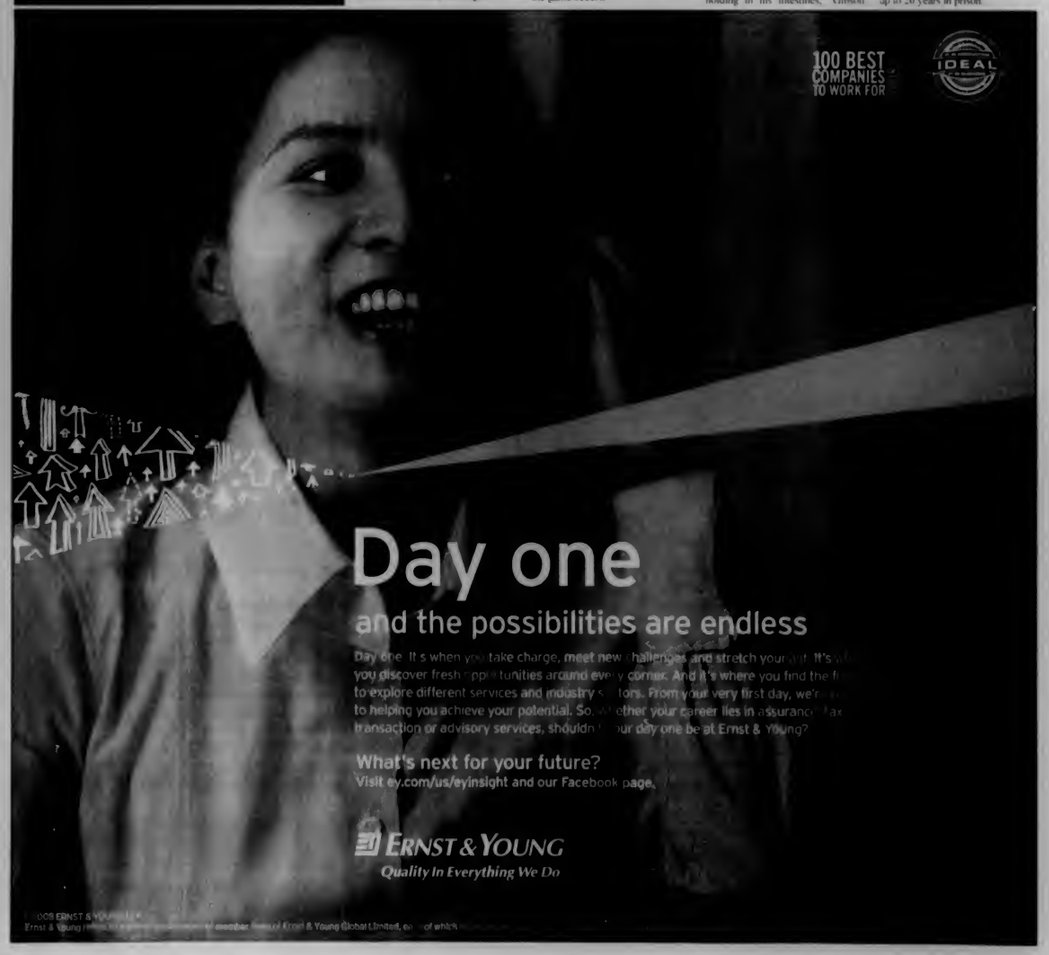
"Brady was up against the wall holding in his intestines," Gibson said.

UM sophomores Tawni Guisti and Hannah Hindman, who also live at the house, said Stewart's wounds began to bleed out immediately, forming a pool of blood on the carpet.

Sheppard then rushed out of the house accompanied by his brother, Jorel Sheppard, a UM student, before other partygoers began to head out, according to Hindman and court records.



With Stewart bleeding on the basement carpet, Gibson managed to keep him awake while staying on the phone with 911.



"He was a trooper," Guisti said.

Several hours after the incident, Sheppard turned himself in to Missoula police.

The rule prompting the night's incident stemmed from a "bounce back" rule, where, if played on a ping-pong table with an upright net, the opponent can shoot the ball again if they catch it after one bounce on his or her side of the table.

If convicted, Sheppard could face up to 20 years in prison.

Support UMass

Nothing angers true sports fans more than "fair-weather" and "bandwagon" fans. You know, the guy (or girl) that forgot that Boston even had a basketball team in 2007, but was the team's biggest fan in 2008. How convenient.

This certainly bothers us here at the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, but what bothers us even more is the apathetic fan. Maybe fan isn't the right word here, because it seems like the entire student body couldn't care less about UMass sporting events.

Where's the school pride? We see thousands of freshmen every day decked out in their UMass gear that they bought at the U-Store, but gosh forbid they actually take their hooded UMass sweaters to an actual sporting event.

You know all that money you're spending on tuition? Part of that goes to the athletic department. Your hard-earned money is in part paying for many of our student-athletes to come to UMass for free. OK, maybe you should resent the athletes then.

Kidding aside, there are many reasons to check out a sporting event near you.

One: The teams are pretty good: No, this isn't Ohio State or Florida. But the teams that play in Amherst are generally successful, hard-working and fun to watch.

Two: The characters: Luke Bonner is classic. Bryan Hogan has the coolest hair. Ever. Coach Jim Rudy yells gibberish in Spanish at referees. Liam Coen is not only the best quarterback in school history, but an all-around nice guy.

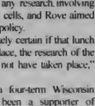
Three: The coaches: Go to the Hangar before a game and grab a plate of wings with coach Don Brown. Go talk with Rudy, Sam Koch or Greg Cannella, some of the nicest people at this University.

Four: Something to do in Amherst: Go tailgate on Saturday and then watch a good football game. Go pre-game before a basketball game and then heckle the opposing team at the Mullins Center. Go watch a men's soccer team at Rudd Field that nearly won a national championship last year. They need your support.

It seems like at most of the sporting events (except for football and men's basketball) that the only fans in attendance are the players' parents and other UMass athletes. This is a huge school, where are the students?

Clearly, pro sports are more appealing. We get that. But why do so many students care so much about the powerhouse college sports programs, but so little about the college that they actually attend?

You can't go up to Charlie Weis or Chris "Beanie" Wells from here, but if you want to meet a living legend (Luke Bonner, anyone?) here, it's only a trip to Boyden away.



Leave your dorms, people. Go watch a UMass sporting event for crying out loud. Hey, it's another reason to drink.

Misplaced trust

John Glaser

The temptation of the masses to place their unmitigated trust in government in times of economic hardship has historically proven to be one of unbearable allure. People lose faith in market institutions and predictably consent to colossal government intervention, praising it as our beneficent and unfailing savior.

It is a veritable banality that the public is misinformed in this. What's of more importance is that they are, here again, condemning themselves to increasingly unsatisfactory conditions by passionately pleading for more of the disease and less of the cure.

In the midst of massive corporate bailouts and government takeovers of entire businesses, it is a popular sentiment that the current state of affairs – the mortgage issue, the housing bubble, Wall Street instability – is the result of a hands-off approach from government, the proverbial fruits of laissez-faire in plain sight. In fact, this couldn't be farther from the truth.

Americans today live under the largest civil government in budgetary terms. Under George H.W. Bush federal spending increased by 23 percent, Bill Clinton increased it by 32 percent, and George W. Bush has increased it by 45 percent. This is laissez-faire?

These measurements in spending correlate to economic intervention. In terms of financial regulations alone, the extension and implementation of rules and red tape is dizzying.

Banks are governed with heavy oversight from agencies that the government like the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, the international Basel accords on capital standards, state authorities, the Federal Reserve and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

The mortgage crisis happened under the influence of the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act (1975) and the Community Reinvestment Act (1977), futile attempts at controlling market behavior. The deduction for mortgage interest, a law in the tax code, encouraged overinvestment in real estate and contributed largely to the current situation. This is hands-off?

Tyler Cowen, Professor of Economics at George Mason University, cited recently in the New York Times that "the Bush administration's many critiques of regulation are belied by the numbers, which demonstrate a strong interest in continued and, indeed, expanded regulation."

Such fascistic seizures of private property are never done in the name of stability in the market.

Indeed. The New York Times reported Monday that this most recent move by the Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson could be "the largest government bailout of private industry in the nation's history." He has proposed a $700 billion "rescue" of the financial markets.

It would give the Treasury, William Kristol wrote in the Times, "the power to purchase hundreds of billions of dollars of financial assets, and hire private firms to manage and sell them."

All on the tax-payer's dime.

Paul Krugman has pointed out that Paulson is "commanding dictatorial authority, plus immunity from review 'by any court of law or any administrative agency.'"

Such fascistic seizures of private property are never done in the name of stability in the market, as the government is claiming, but rather it is always done in the name of the acquisition of power by an inherently violent institution.

What is essentially being done in this takeover is the government is seizing private firms, hiring politically connected millionaires, giving them partial control over these firms and paying them exorbitant salaries with everybody else's wealth.

It is welfare for the rich, but not just because of the redistribution of wealth. It's also because regular citizens will be the ones who suffer from the doomed blanket this corporatism is sure to produce, while these new hires will continue to benefit from government favoritism and political connections.

Economists find lots of common ground with regards to how and why we've been led to this point economically. But they also disagree a great deal on which regulations and which parts of the market ought to be emphasized as causal factors.

So, for proponents of this fascist corporatism, I'm wondering if they can explain to me what kind of divine, ingenious, master regulators they envision are taking control.

If experts can't fully understand the vast complexities of today's troubled time market, at least without plenty of hindsight, why in the world would the government be successful in manufacturing stability, pulling the strings of every facet of the economy and bestowing upon all of mankind a security we'd otherwise never know?

The current economic situation is not the result of any lack of regulation, certainly not laissez-faire, yet all the government can do is apologize and demand further authority over our lives and our livelihood. And all the public can do is rally to their cause, goose-stepping lustily into an Orwellian nightmare.

To light up a campus

S.P. Sullivan

When the University of Massachusetts was rounding out construction on that peculiar building on the corner on N. Pleasant St. and Infirmary Way last semester, I thought the same thing everyone else did.

Namely, what's with the friggin' laser light show?

Here was another example of UMass' architectural and developmental excess, not unlike the Berkshire Dining Commons, which with its own lights looks like an interplanetary casino dropped in the middle of a rather unsightly city. Or the new bike lanes that pedestrians ignore and hapless cyclists are forced to go around.

Here was another waste of money. And electricity.

But Ron Michaud told me otherwise.

"They are off-the-shelf, programmable LEDs," Michaud, former chair of the art department and current associate dean of the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, told me in an interview.

We sat at a table beneath the lights, which were off at mid-day, in the Studio Art Building Commons. The place is new, was just dedicated on Friday, Sept. 15, and looks immaculate – save for the overalls and hands of student painters that came in and out.

And those lights serve a purpose. Well, now they do, at least. The purpose? Light-based art, though Michaud seemed to think the opportunity to extract art from the nightly disco show owes more to serendipity than any pre-planning.

"I'm not sure they were ever really intended for light-based art," he said.

Decoration? I asked.

"Hmm, decoration's not an accurate word either." He pauses. "I think they simply were meant to produce an effect that would communicate clearly that this is a building where art resides."

I thought a sign might do the trick just fine. But hey, he's the artist.

The lights are set in rows on either side of four sculpture trusses on which student artists can suspend large scale works in the Commons, that can be seen pretty well through the paneled windows on the front and rear sides of the building. Groups of lights are given specific addresses in a computer.

Letting students create light-based art for all the campus to see isn't exactly earth shattering. But it's a start.

The computer, which Michaud says looks like "little more than a box," is stowed away on the third floor, flanked by the mechanical guts of the building, including the complex ventilation system created so promising young art students don't kill their talent with paint fumes.

The lights are also another feature of the building's "green" appeal, the Studio Arts Building has been touted as the most energy-efficient on campus. According to Michaud, the lights in the Commons are LEDs, no different than the display on the front of your cellular phone or car stereo. Certain LEDs can consume as much as four-times less energy to start up than standard fluorescent lighting.

The building contractors installed the lights with no apparent purpose other than artsy-fartsy showmanship. But like true artists, Michaud and fellow art staff saw an opportunity.

"We offer a color course, which I teach in the spring," he said. "One idea that I had was to introduce students to the program so they could create their own patterns and load them into the computer."

At the east entrance to the commons, next to two normal-looking light switches, is a panel with several smaller switches. Michaud said each can be programmed with a different light pattern and turned on at will. He hopes student artists, once acquainted with the program, can install their own patterns and bring their friends by to show off their work at the flip of a switch.

But unlike a painting or sculpture hung in a gallery, you can see it from a football field away.

The Studio Arts Building, at long last a home to the University's art students – who were once left to dash from class at the Fine Art Center to the Munson Annex or the Art Barn and back – is perhaps the most successful of the Big Dig in New Dirt's clothing projects. And not even a month into its tenure, faculty in the arts program are already looking for ways to engage students in creating the environment in which they work and learn.

At a university where students went on strike not even a year ago to protest, among other things, a lack of control over student space, Michaud's artistic populism is refreshing. Letting students create light-based art for all the campus to see isn't exactly earth shattering. But it's a start.

If only Michaud and his students could've been around when they decided to paint the Student Union salmon pink.

Talk it out

Solmaaz Yazdiha

For someone who's running for Vice President of a national government that's by the people and for the people, Sarah Palin doesn't much seem to like people. She especially does not like the press.

This past Tuesday, the campaign announced it would prohibit a Wall Street Journal scribe and a CNN producer from the small pool of journalists allowed to photograph Palin before she went in to the United Nations for meetings.

For Palin's traveling press corps, it's mostly been a lot of closed doors and getting shooed away. There goes freedom of the press. And I thought Palin was a fan of the Constitution.

How exactly is Palin going to be vice president if she's camera shy?

Now let's flashback to the Alaska 2006 gubernatorial race.

"Sarah Palin, are you offended by the phrase 'Under God' in the Pledge of Allegiance?"

"Not on your life. If it was good enough for the founding fathers, it's good enough for me," Palin said.

Sucks to be Francis Bellamy, the actual writer of the Allegiance, which was composed a good while after the Constitution. No love. And in beautiful foolish politician irony, turns out, the words "under God" were added even later than that.

How exactly is Palin going to be Vice President if she's camera shy? And why exactly are Americans being censored from her words? Is the McCain campaign afraid she'll say something wrong? Are we amidst her huge cram session for the upcoming Vice Presidential debate? Is the press just distracting her from her cram session?

With so much of the presidential race being a choreographed, scripted and staged event in today's scandal-hungry society, it's hard to know what to think of the candidates.

Just one, the "Hockey Moms for Palin" signs that women waved excitedly in the audience at the Republican National Convention all looked suspiciously the same, same colors, same handwriting, same old sketchy politics.

So I understand the scheme keep her out of sight so that when she does agree to some elaborate overly-publicized interview, like her one with Charles Gibson last week, everyone tunes in. It's a Palin parade!

Politics in general have become a ridiculous spectacle of show business and planned productions. You know it's bad when Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and John McCain are all guests at the Country Music Awards in a spoof with Miley Cyrus. That's just what we needed: a presidential campaign with a side of Hannah Montana.

If Palin doesn't start talking to the press, she will continue to be the soon-to-be-grandmother with a lack of foreign policy experience. For her own good, she should call up make up and get the cameras rolling.

It's time to get up and vote

Libby Protzman

Six months ago, I was a candidate for Student Trustee. I was approached by strangers asking me if I was "the girl who ran for office," and "how did it feel to lose?"

Most didn't even know what the word Trustee meant or how it affected them. Some didn't care about the outcome of the election, stating, "I hope they get Cinemax for the dorms," or "Fix the potholes all over campus."

I was shocked by the lack of knowledge, the tide of ignorance and non-involvement, but mostly the loss of communication between the student body and the SGA.

I figured out some reasons why the majority of the student body was entirely disconnected from the SGA, ALANA Caucus and other parties wanting to change and put students first. Not too many students here really cared or even thought twice about Malcolm Chu or Derek Khanna.

The problems lie with a divide in student interests. Jason Vassell's court defense or the lack of diversity here on campus are not A-list worries for the average student; most young adults here care about gas prices, work schedules, when they can get home to their folks and how to balance class work-loads.

The Student Government Association was given its University Governance (and a $1 million budget awarded each year) by the Board of Trustees years ago to begin a campaign for student rights and better conditions on campus.

We all have lost that goal in the face of political agendas. Some may have even slighted the by-laws and "created" funds for radical groups on Campus that were no where near "student development."

At a University whose diversity rates surpass the average in Massachusetts, at a University that provides more social and political development opportunities than most hometowns, at a University whose main problems are the faux-bomb scare and the lack of Pell Grants or Perkins loans during an economic crisis, where does an RSO leader scandal or campus-wide e-mails come into play?

Why is the SGA concerned with striking when Southwest lost electricity one night and New Dirt costs Massachusetts tax payers millions of dollars each year?

Want to build student bridges? I suggest the SGA starts to steer its massive political locomotive in the directions of road safety, handicap access, financial aid and violence awareness altogether (most of the violence on campus is colorblind, riotous and maybe more dangerous than Jason Vassell yielding a knife).

Students need to be aware of the University's problems and utilize our SGA more efficiently. Instead of expending resources on neighboring communities (it seems like a resume builder, even I put it proudly on mine for the semester I devoted my time), we should focus resources on UMass.

My wish for the entire campus is that everyone takes five minutes to research SGA candidates for your living area based on what they can do for your community and vote this week. Realize that the SGA is not here to coordinate strikes or protests at Beacon Hill unless it represents the desires of the Student Body as a whole.

The Strike of 2007 was a success, however irrelevant to the student body's primary needs. I can't make anyone look past bias or prejudice, refrain from yelling racial slurs in the windows of Southwest or refuse to get up from the Whitmore floor when police yell in their face. But I can vote people in and out of office to serve my needs. Our needs. Everyone's needs.

So I referred to the University Governance. It states that the SGA has the,"primary responsibility for services, and activities which are financed primarily by students . . . and setting standards for student behavior, conduct and discipline."

So if you have an issue, take the example of the SGA: get friends together, appoint/elect them to offices in areas of RSO or Agency leadership, dress in black and storm the Administration building with a manifesto and political agenda.

Don't forget we forced two educated men out of office and made the administration curtsy to our needs (I wouldn't say bow; most of the strike demands were not necessarily met and those two are currently serving higher paying jobs down south).

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash"

A panhandle of an issue

Got an extra dime . . . . . . Don't waste your time

Ben Moriarty

The great Pioneer Valley. Not the Valley of Pioneer, definitely not the Valley of Pandering and most assuredly not the Valley of Pandering to the Homeless. So if you're homeless, please climb the nearby hills and get out. You make us uncomfortable.

Seriously, I'm cringing now.

But we Pioneers are realistic, and we can't expect you to be able to climb those hills anyway, so we're just going to have to ask you to get out of our sights.

So if you don't mind panhandlers, it'd be wonderful if you could take up your belongings and skitter on along to the outskirts where no one will see you. We townsfolk need our comfort. So go ahead and grab your guitar, your upside down hat, and just take off.

Are you cringing yet?

This is what the city of Northampton so brilliantly devised this past summer in an ordinance prohibiting certain panhandling activities. It can't ban panhandling as it has been ruled in past cases to be protected under the First Amendment, so what can they do? I'll tell you. Curb them off into the distance where no one will see them.

The ordinance that Higgins is proposing is an appeasement to the businesses that she said have complained.

Under this proposed ordinance, there are two significant points to be considered. There is an outlaw on both "aggressive panhandling" and what most people would call "regular panhandling."

Aggressive panhandling is just that, being aggressive. This includes using violent language or threats, making physical contact, approaching people in a fearful manner, interfering with safety regulations, and things no one would do without fear of getting in trouble themselves. This isn't dumb, it makes sense. No one will argue this – it applies to everyone.

Mayor Mary Higgins breaches the fine line of humanism though with her next touch. You (yes, that's you future graduates) won't be able to panhandle within 15 feet of any bank, parking meter, pay telephone or bus station.

You also won't be able to do it within six feet of any building entrance nor from any public bench or railroad pass. Oh yeah, did I mention that the panhandlers can't sit or stand still?

Way to keep your real plan covert, Higgins.

I don't know if you've ever been to Northampton, but I have. And I'll tell you if you haven't been there, building entrances about every 10 feet, and parking meters every eight feet.

In other words, there'd be absolutely no place in the center of town to panhandle, which is, by the way, where all the shops, the people, the college students and the spare change is. I'd recommend them to hang from the stoplight, but there is a regulation on panhandling from motor vehicles, so we won't be lucky enough to drive by and try to toss coins into their hats.

I thought the Pioneer Valley was better than this. I didn't come to UMass to pretend I was John Gotti (the cool collar poppin' kid, not the dad). In fact, like most of you, I came here not only because of the great education, but because this town and area has a nifty aura to it.

Really. No offense city slickers, but this is a jivin' town. We enjoy the on-board brandy drinking PVTA riders and the overly rabid Obama fanatics. We even like the McCain supporters as long as they aren't part of the Republican Club and promise to shop at Food-For-Thought books. Everyone's a star here.

I'm not saying this because the Pioneer Valley is Hippieville, but because,it's a fact that this place is as liberal, free-spirited and welcoming as they come. So what exactly is Higgins trying to do with her ordinance? She's making a point and telling those who make snobs uneasy they aren't welcome.

Sorry, you all might be in the wrong town.

No one in their right or caring mind would ever do such a thing as tell the homeless they can't sit on the sidewalk and ask for change unless there was an ulterior motive.

The ordinance that Higgins is proposing is an appeasement to the businesses that she said have complained, but more than that, an affront to this entire Valley and everything we are.

Higgins and Co. simply do not want these people to be seen. This ordinance is nothing comparable to the attitude of this Valley, but instead is attempting to make it impossible for homeless people to collect change in the only place plausible.

To think that the mayor of Northampton could propose an ordinance which cares more about superficial appearances or businesses rather than the well-being of the neediest is abominable and reprehensible.

To want people to be safe and feel safe is necessary, but Higgins went way further than this to make it impossible for any panhandling to go on there. She doesn't want the performing, singing and hopeful to get anything from this Valley. In fact, the very proposition of this ordinance crushes a lot of hope and love in this Valley.

I take back what I said. The Pioneer Valley is better than this. But I guess some aren't.

It must be handed to the terminally whiny of Northampton that there is a considerable controversy over the people's rights to set up shop and beg at ATMs and banks. As first amendment rights are being called into play at the City Council, it seems somewhat appropriate to take a line from the Bill of No Rights, attributed to a Georgian State Representative some 11 years ago;

Jon Peterson

"You do not have the right to a new car, big screen TV or any form of wealth. (More power to you if you can legally acquire them, but no one is guaranteeing anything)"

"You do not have the right to free food and housing. (Americans are the most charitable people to be found, and will gladly help anyone in need but we are quickly growing weary of subsidizing generations of professional couch potatoes who achieve nothing more than the creation of another generation of professional couch potatoes)."

It should be a given that the Bill goes on further- more to explain, rightly, that there is also no right to not be offended, as one would argue is the right protected by the First Amendment to guarantee that everyone can express themselves in the ways that they see fit.

Consequently, the current situation cannot be explained and dealt with as a simple First Amendment issue. The issue is not simply something on which the disenfranchised are to be lined up in a single party by the wealthy for the simple fact of wealth, or lack thereof, but it is the problem that transcends such issues and must be applied to the citizens of the town as a whole.

It can only exist in the civilized world that there is not a right to fail, and the city council now has to make a vote on whether or not they are willing to enhance a freedom to failure with a formal law on it.

It was said of 18th century French law, tongue in cheek, that the "majestic equality, prohibits rich and poor alike from begging on the streets and sleeping under bridges."

It should also be noted however that the author of this saying also said that he would "prefer the folly of enthusiasm to the indifference of wisdom." How well and good such a note is that such enthusiasm is preferred to the indifference of wisdom has lead to many of the great demagogical dictators of world hirtory.

The problem is in the interpretation that there is a right to aggressively beg. There is a misconception that those who are employed would prefer things that are somehow inherently different. And that "beggars issues" are fundamentally different from the issues of the employed.

That the employed would form worldviews that are specifically and directly opposed to the rights of people to beg, and that individuals with this mentality would, thus come before the city council and express themselves as having these views because of these specific viewpoints.

The problem is in the interpretation that there is a right to aggressively beg.

There are times when a governments regulations on a situation can make things better, but it is not a guarantee that regulations and laws passed can be sure to make things better.

It is when regulations get in the way of promoting liberties, and when the authorities promote laws that go beyond the principles of protecting the citizens to the point of controlling their lives that things have become more than excessive and have become intrusive.

But this is the government at the community or city level. It is how a person can discuss at that cities council with as much authority as any other citizen, and decide on living in that community based on whether or not they want to abide by their specific rules. They have the freedom to choose to move to another community that has different ideals and laws about the issues that they are concerned with.

While it can be thought of as unrealistic to think that you would pick up and move every time a law in passed in your community, the option still exists and acts as a check and balance. It can be decided on how much these laws affect you and are important to you.

If you felt that the laws on tree trimming in Amherst are too strict for you, you can move to Springfield or Holyoke. To go further, if you felt Massachusetts to be overly intrusive, you could always move to Connecticut or New Hampshire.

The option is only easier for the destitute because of their ability to move without moving trucks and without having to go through the legal hassles over real estate.

But this would require them to be allowed to fail in the first place. Even then, why would there be the incentive to change anything about their styles of life if they are supported enough by their communities to continue on with it?

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

A LEGAL POINT

Dear Editor:

(Re: "A new look at 'Justice for Jason'," Alana Goodman, Editorial, September 19)

We are the lawyers for Jason Vassell. As lawyers, we are limited in what we can say about the evidence in a pending case by our rules of professional responsibility. However, those rules do permit us to protect our client in a situation like this where substantial, undue prejudice may result from recent pre-trial publicity.

The Daily Collegian's column by Alana Goodman on Sept. 19 contains many distortions and inaccuracies. At a minimum, the following points need to be corrected:

First, Goodman describes Jason as 5-foot-10" and 200 pounds. In actuality, Jason is 5-foot-9" and weighed approximately 185 pounds at the time of the incident. It is clear from the video evidence that Bosse is at least as tall as Jason and that Bowes is substantially larger.

Second, two white female UMass students who were in Jason's first-floor dorm room describe the incident as beginning when Bosse and Bowes were observed peering into Jason's window at 4:30 a.m. When Jason pulled the shade down and told them to leave, they began to call him a "pussy," "nigger," "retard," and "bitch" and eventually smashed the window. A third white female next door was awakened by the racist taunting.

Third, whether the force used by Jason was excessive will be an issue at trial. (Although Goodman claims that Massachusetts law only permits an individual to use force "equal to the force received," in reality, an individual may use as much force as is reasonably necessary to avoid the immediate danger of serious injury). It would be inappropriate for us to take a position on that in this letter. However, the entire fight was captured by dormitory surveillance cameras. Anyone who has seen the video (as Goodman obviously has not) can see the following:

Jason never leaves the dormitory lobby.

Jason's friend, Vishan Chamanlal, never raises a hand to anyone and repeatedly tries to keep between the assailants and Jason.

Jason is clearly holding a small pocket knife and, according to Mr. Chamanlal's narration of the incident, repeatedly holds it so that the assailants can see it and tells the assailants to leave and not to touch him. In Bowe's interview with police, he admits that he and Bosse wanted Jason to put the knife down and fight them.

Jason never had an iron in his hands at any time the assailants were in the dormitory.

Bowes clearly throws the first punch, which broke Jason's nose.

As to whether Bosse was a peacemaker as Goodman claims, we would note that:

The evidence that Bosse was the individual who smashed Jason's window during the initial racist taunting is compelling. Bosse was bleeding from a cut on his hand before the fight began according to Chamanlal. Bowes was not.

In the video, Bosse is seen pushing up the sleeves on his arms as he and Bowes continue to move towards Jason, even after they see the knife.

After Bowes throws the first punch, Bosse is seen throwing punches at Jason and Chamanlal.

Even after Jason uses the knife, Bosse and Bowes continue to advance on Jason until Jason is backed into a corner.

The fight ends only when Jason retreats behind a locked door. After he does so, Bosse kicks and punches at the door for several minutes screaming racial slurs and demanding that Jason return to "finish the fight."

Even Bowes, when interviewed, agreed that Bosse was using the "N-word," while kicking and punching at the door behind which Jason had escaped. He also agrees that Bosse "definitely could have" used the "N-word" while they were still outside. Bosse claims to have no memory of the incident.

This letter does not contain all of the information in our possession about this incident. It contains only the factual information necessary to rebut what we feel was an extremely distorted and uninformed version of the incident that was written by Alana Goodman. Whether Jason's actions were justifiable will be determined by a Hampshire County jury. We hope that the University community will withhold judgment of Jason until all the facts can be revealed.

IN SUPPORT OF OPINION

Dear Editor:

After reading the advertisement/article by Malcolm Chu about Justice for Jason, I was shocked that you allowed such garbage to be printed.

Keeping in mind, if it really was the simple clarification of facts it claimed to be, he would have had just as much right to get it printed as Alana Goodman had to print her views on the case.

However, the fact that he was allowed to buy advertising space to preserve his personal attacks against a Collegian columnist is just wrong.

These attacks were only based on the fact that she did not share his opinion on the events that occurred this February. Mr. Chu was apparently so upset at the "character assassination" of a "decent, sensitive and truthful young man" that he decided to do the same to Ms. Goodman.

He decries her so-called "reckless and irresponsible slanders" then proceeds to accuse her of being an ignorant, irresponsible and malicious racist, based only on her interpretation of the facts.

Ms. Goodman's article was the first I've read that did not paint Vassel as the poor victim of a hate crime. Regardless of my views on the case, it was good to see the other side for once.

Not everybody agrees with the CJJV, and everybody should be entitled to their own opinion on the matter. But not according to Mr. Chu, based on the level of outrage he showed for one single article that goes against his and the CJJV's viewpoint of the situation.

THE PROF SPEAKS

Dear Editor,

(Re: "Out with the income tax," Brad DeFlumeri, Editorial, September 24)

In his Sept. 24 column, Brad DeFlumeri referred to me as a "far-left wing institution." Although I was flattered, I do take exception to his mischaracterization of the reason I encouraged my class to go to the "No on One" rally the other day.

My class studies the politics of Massachusetts. I thought this rally would be a good example. I also encouraged my class to go to a meeting of the Republican Club that night. Brad should know because he put on the meeting.

It is interesting to me that many of the attacks on partisanship among professors are highly partisan. Most faculty are careful to separate scholarship from partisanship. I wish Brad would be careful that way.

'Sixteen Days' of the undead

"Sixteen Days," a student-made documentary on the popular game Humans vs. Zombies, will screen tonight at Amherst Cinema. The film documents some of last year's game played on the UMass campus.

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

As most returning University of Massachusetts students are aware, it has become somewhat of a tradition that each semester the campus is set upon by a rather odd invader: the shambling undead.

For two weeks, headbands are brandished, lookouts are posted and human participants band together, Nerf guns in hand, to fight off the zombie plague.

Most non-participants have seen a hunting party, an ambush or a Thunderdome battle, but few really know what it's like to run for their lives from a band of bandana-clad ghouls.

With this in mind, MassGames, the sponsoring body of this massive game of manhunt, has created a documentary about their half-month of hell on earth, titled "Sixteen Days."

Created by UMass student Keith Rood, the film focuses in on one particular squad of humans called The Pit Crew. Led by Tim Bain, the team battles against both time and the ever growing zombie hoards for a narrow shot at defeating the undead legions.

The competition can get pretty heated, and during the course of the story, tempers flare and problems occur within the group. Survival is not easy, and not everyone is guaranteed to make it out alive.

For the uninformed, Humans vs. Zombies (HvZ) is essentially a massive game of tag. It was created by Goucher College students Brad Sappington and Chris Weed. Its success at Goucher led them to hit the Internet and spread the good word, helping to start HvZ games at universities across the country.

Here, it was picked up by campus RSO MassGames (formerly the capture-the-flag club) to great success, as UMass has seen some of the highest participation numbers ever.

With a starting population of only five, it is the goal of the zombie team to tag, and therefore, "infect," every human player.

The human team, who during the last game began 600 players strong, can only win by surviving the game with enough people to tackle a desperate final mission.

They defend themselves by "stunning" attacking zombies with Nerf darts, marshmallows or balled up socks (preferably clean ones).

"Goucher College put a documentary online," Rood said. "It was really the main source of people understanding the game."

Although the original Goucher film was only 40 minutes long, Rood's documentary, at approximately two hours, is a full-length feature film.

"The first half of the picture focuses specifically on The Pit Crew, while the second half is a bit wider and has more footage of general players and battles," Rood said.

During the fall, Rood was the squad leader of The Pit Crew, but later left to become an administrator and decided to undertake the project of documenting the game.

"Sixteen Days" is filmed, edited and produced entirely by UMass students, and comes complete with an original score by student Darrel McTague.

A major boon to the project came when they gained the support of the town movie theatre.

"Amherst Cinema has been awesome," MassGames president Devin Ashe said. "They went out on a limb to support us. It is going to be a great cinema experience."

The event is scheduled to help raise excitement for the latest round of Humans vs. Zombies, scheduled to kick off in mid-October.

Segments will be posted on the UMass HvZ website, and DVDs will be on sale, but this will be the only chance to see "Sixteen Days," in all its marshmallow-slinging glory, on the big screen.

If you are a bystander curious about this bizarre campus ritual, a former HvZ-er trying to catch a glimpse of yourself on the silver screen, or just someone who enjoys seeing their peers make fools out of themselves, then this event could be for you.

If you fear the howling, shambling, headband-wearing undead, however, you might want to stay at home.

The film will be shown at Amherst Cinema, located in the town center, tonight at 11:30 p.m. Tickets are $5, with proceeds going to fund the game.

Dekker: rekindling the folk tradition

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

Few genres can match the historical and cultural significance of folk music. During the American folk music revival of the 1950s, an explosion of singer/songwriters in the vein of Pete Seeger and Woody Guthrie emerged into the national discourse.

Combining elements of country, bluegrass and jazz to create a sound and atmosphere, folk music quickly became synonymous with independent thinking and intimate coffeehouses. While time has seen folk in its purest form oft-abandoned or manipulated in favor of changing musical landscapes, the deep-rooted tradition the label carries still remains.

Canadian-born songwriter Tony Dekker is a man immersed within this tradition. A self-proclaimed advocate for independent mentalities, he says his gravitation towards the culture of folk is a natural one.

"The mindset behind do-it-yourself lifestyles is one I believe in, and in my opinion mirrors the very beginnings of folk music," Dekker said. "So a deep respect for traditional folk is there."

Dekker channels this bond through his current musical project, Great Lake Swimmers. The band, composed primarily of Dekker, Erik Arnesen and Colin Huebert, makes prominent use of banjo, glockenspiel and pedal steel while crafting somber, often haunting, vocal melodies in the spirit of traditional folk music.

"We're using old tool to tell new stories," Dekker said of the process.

In March of 2007, Dekker released his latest work, "Ongiara," named after the Toronto harbour boat that carried the band to their initial recording sessions. The album features Dekker's unmistakable vocals with accompaniments ranging from minimal to the extravagant (including string arrangements from Owen Pallett of Final Fantasy and Arcade Fire) over a backdrop of natural reverb.

"It's hard to wrap it up in a sentence," Dekker said of the album's sound and direction. "It's really about differing environments, both internal and external experienced and discovered while traveling North America."

"Ongiara's" opener, "Your Rocky Spine," illustrates Dekker's aptitude toward lyrical allusions to nature, comparing the discovery of new physical landscapes to that of exploring a lover's body.

"And the mountains said I could find you here / they whis-

A 'grand' celebration

By Vinh Nguyen
Collegian Correspondent

The impressions grandmothers leave on their posterity often linger quietly without ever being fully acknowledged or appreciated; their stories are easily forgotten. To finally understand them, however, is to feel the tragedy that you didn't – perhaps couldn't – get before.

The "Nuestras Abuelas: Their Hope, Our Strength" exhibition, running from Sept. 25 until Oct. 25 in the Fine Art Center's Central Gallery, reexamines and celebrates the lives of seven such women and their legacies, through the perspectives of their granddaughters.

Displays, consisting of enlarged photographs and stories written in Spanish and English by the granddaughters, highlight each woman's strength and perseverance, emphasizing how their lives have impacted their granddaughters. The collection contains both candid and studio photographs—all black and white.

According to Natalia Muñoz, organizing committee member and editor of "La Prensa del oeste de Massachusetts," the profiles for the exhibition were chosen based on the changing political landscapes from which they came.

"Our grandmothers came to age during a very difficult time when the United States came to power in our countries," said Muñoz. "That formed them, and therefore, that formed us."

Influenced by her grandmother's work in community building, Muñoz created her bilingual newspaper, "La Prensa," as a vehicle to involve herself with the community as well.

The idea for "Nuestras Abuelas," however came in 2007 from a conversation between Muñoz and her associate editor, Noemí Valentín, when she showed Muñoz old photographs of Valentín's grandmother. Subsequently, a committee of community women was formed, consisting Muñoz, Valentín, Waleska Santiago and Revan Schendler.

They charged "La Prensa's" female readership to submit pictures and texts of all kinds – essays, biographies, poems and other creative pieces. In November of 2007, "La Prensa" began running monthly pages of Latin American grandmothers and their profiles. Over two dozen profiles have been published since.

The exhibition, though, will showcase seven new profiles of women from Chile, Guatemala, Mexico and Puerto Rico: María Luisa Barra Barra, María Ausención Benítez Hernandez, Generosa González Cruz, Eustaquia Lajara, Inés María Mendoza Rivera, Felipa Pérez and Natividad Rosario Pérez.

But as much as it honors grandmothers, "Nuestra's Abuelas" also seeks to educate the public about America and its past foreign policies with Latin America, retelling the history of war, depression, dictatorship, social and political tumult that produced these women.

"This is not a historical exhibition, but you can get glimpses of the times when these grandmothers lived," Valentín said.

Following the exhibition on campus, "Nuestras Abuelas" will expand to the Westfield and Holyoke Libraries, where profiles from grandsons and those from grandchildren of non-Latin American descent will also be included.

"We want to strengthen the community, and the community is not just the Latino community but the entire United States," Muñoz said, who eventually plans to publish all of the submissions in a book.

A reception, featuring guitarist Lorena Garay, will be held on Sept. 26 from 5 to 7 p.m. at the Central Gallery. The event is free and open to the public.

Animation modestly dominant

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Correspondent

This Sunday night, Sept. 28 from 8 to 10 p.m., Fox's Animation Domination is back. The four shows include "The Simpson's," "King of the Hill," "Family Guy" and "American Dad."

The night kicks off with "The Simpsons'" premiere of the 20th season. "The Simpsons," which has been on since late 1989, has become one of America's favorite animated families.

Its 20 seasons and 420 episodes are a true testament to the show's success. In the season premiere, Homer finds himself in jail after a St. Patty's Day fight. As he tries to get his bail bond, he meets Wolf the Bounty Hunter and decides that he wants to take up the profession.

The premiere, "Sex, Pies and Idiot Scrapes," is a worthwhile viewing for both big fans and occasional watchers and proves that even after 20 seasons the show still can dish up some fresh laughs.

Next up is the 13th season premiere of "King of the Hill" at 8:30. Unlike "The Simpsons," "King of the Hill" has not received the same amount of critical acclaim, but is entering its 13th season, a testament that the program has maintained a dedicated following.

The debut of the upcoming season, "Dia-Hill-is Shock," isn't the strongest of efforts but does offer a few legitimate laughs. Bill, close friend of Hank Hill, finds out that he has diabetes and refuses to stop eating junk food. His doctor tells him he may lose his legs if he doesn't control his diet. Bill is prescribed a wheelchair and then the story ensues. While by no means a highlight, "King of the Hill's" premiere serves as a strong enough transition between the Fox's two heavyweight animated franchises.

The most anticipated premiere, of course, is "Family Guy's" sixth season which airs at 9. The first episode, coined "I owe Blactuals," lives up to "Family Guy" standards. Brian falls for a cute atheist girl named Carolyn who he meets in a book store. They start seeing each other, but Brian wants to take things slow, as perscribed by Stewie, in order to maintain a long-term relationship.

When Brian finds her with another man, he becomes determined to win her back. Family Guy has tailed off during its last few seasons, failing to live up to the standards set by the show's original season, but, it is certainly back to its true form in this episode and is full of non-stop laughs. If you are planning to watch only one of these shows Sundays night, make sure it's "Family Guy."

"American Dad" ends the night with its fourth season premiere at 9:30, but when greeted by its opening theme the smartest maneuver would be to change the channel. American Dad has long been muddled in mediocrity, and by the looks of the premiere, the fourth season is no different.

It's hard to postulate how Seth MacFarlane is responsible for both "American Dad" and "Family Guy." Regardless, the episode is about Roger's 1600th birthday and Steve's first pubic hair. For a night full of quality humor, "American Dad" proves to be a bitterly disappointing conclusion.

per the snow and the leaves in my ear."

The use of nature as inspiration is a constant theme throughout his work, dating back to his earliest release, 2003's aptly self-titled "Great Lake Swimmers." Dekker's continuous use of nature-inspired metaphors is perhaps exemplified best on "Moving Pictures, Silent Films."

"Oh when the ice is melted away and the hunger returns / I will be the same but older and maybe twice the bear that I thought I was."

While a wealth of Dekker's writing uses extensive amounts of first person, the songwriter is quick to dispel the notion that he lyricizes through an autobiographical lens.

"I don't write confessionals, the songs are intended more to be ideas or ways of looking at certain things," Dekker said. "I purposely write with universal themes so that the 'I's' and 'me's' are not autobiographical, they are more about seeing something in a specific way."

Tonight's stop at the Iron Horse marks the band's first trek to Northampton, but the venue's relative small-scale and intimate setting is in line with what Dekker is drawn to when showcasing his music.

"Smaller venues are the ideal place for us to perform," Dekker said. "If we could get away with it I think we'd only play places like that."

Fall-themed cookbooks inspire amateurs

By Amy Scattergood
Los Angeles Times

Encapsulated beet-juice spheres under verjuice ice and lemon-thyme froth. Torchon of monkfish liver cooked sous vide in an immersion circulator at 64 degrees Celsius. Jamon iberico consomme.

Ah, fall, the season of college football, PTA meetings and high-profile chef cookbooks.

But entertaining as it may be to leaf through hotly anticipated new books by Thomas Keller and Ferran Adria, Grant Achatz of Alinea and the Fat Duck's Heston Blumenthal, the home cook is likely to leave the cooking of the complex recipes in those volumes to the professionals.

So instead of enrolling in culinary school and purchasing the special equipment and ingredients (liquid-nitrogen canisters, toad skin melons) called for by some chef-authors, consider that this fall's dazzling cookbook line up has many impressive offerings for the amateur. Six books, some debuts and some by chefs who've penned previous cookbooks, are welcome additions to any home cook's library.

Nate Appleman of A16, an Italian restaurant in San Francisco, and David Tanis, longtime chef at Chez Panisse in Berkeley, Calif., New York chef (at 50 Carmine, Il Buco and others) Sara Jenkins and Los Angeles' "Two Dudes," Jon Shook and Vinny Dotolo of Animal, have all written first cookbooks happily suited to the home cook.

Add new family-focused books by British chefs Jamie Oliver and Hugh Fearnley-Whittingstall, and you have an impressive list of accessible cookbooks to choose from.

Of these six, three – by Appleman, Oliver and Tanis – were the most consistent, intelligent and creative.

"A16: Food (Plus) Wine" is the best of the bunch. This debut book by chef Nate Appleman and wine director Shelley Lindgren with Kate Leahy strikes a satisfying balance between simple and complex. It reads like a road map to the food and wine served at A16 (which is perhaps fitting, since the restaurant was named for a road in southern Italy), combining recipes and terrific photography by Ed Anderson with primers on wine by Lindgren and tutorials on ingredients from Appleman.

Even the novice cook can make Appleman's raw zucchini salad with green olives, mint and pecorino. It's an easy no-cook recipe, but one that combines technique (briefly salting ribbons of thinly sliced raw zucchini to soften them and remove water) and sophisticated flavor combinations, with impressive results.

A recipe for bucatini with tomatoes and bottarga combines pasta and a sauce made with Roma tomatoes that are salt-roasted with a grating of bottarga (pressed, cured fish roe). Taken individually, each ingredient is rich in flavor. The tomatoes are velvety and dense, the pasta is simple, and the bottarga is unusual and complex; the three together are magnificent.

Monday meatballs is another basic dish, covered by canned tomatoes and baked under foil. But Appleman's extras – grinding the meat (use a food processor), and adding ricotta and bread crumbs – elevate the simple to the extraordinary.

Advanced cooks can opt for Appleman's recipes for squid-ink pasta or pizza baked on a grill. Or try grilled shrimp with pickled peppers, preserved Meyer lemons and toasted almonds.

Jamie Oliver's eighth book, "Jamie at Home: Cook Your Way to the Good Life," is billed as an homage to his garden. In the preface, television's former "Naked Chef" explains that he's fallen in love with his "veg." The book, photographed by David Loftus, is an exploration of what he does with that garden windfall.

A salad combines whole carrots roasted – with a halved lemon and orange – in a spice blend. The juice from the citrus forms the base of a quick vinaigrette. Tossed with garden greens and avocado, the salad gets another dimension from a dollop of sour cream and a sprinkling of toasted seeds.

Oliver's grilled lamb kebabs – skewered meatballs grilled and wrapped in flatbread, salad greens and homemade condiments – are fun to prepare and eat.

"A Platter of Figs and Other Recipes" is the first cookbook from Chez Panisse's David Tanis. Like the restaurant, the book offers simple menus of three or four courses for eight.

Tanis' book, interspersed with a narrative of the chef's ideas and back story, is a lovely read. The recipes are simple too, although the book can be frustrating for those cooking for fewer than eight.

Zuppa di fagoli, served with garlic-rubbed toasts, is a well-executed white bean soup heightened with fennel seeds and rosemary-infused olive oil.

On the suggested fall menu that includes the soup recipe, the dessert is a deft almond biscotti, but the first and third courses are composed of salumi and olives, and pears and cheese.

Tanis' minimalism doesn't always serve him well in other ways. Some menus are too barebones, some dishes a bit flat. A blueberry-blackberry crumble is so berry-heavy it seems more an enormous compote than a structured dessert, and a honey-lavender ice cream is nuanced but too sweet.

The books by Sara Jenkins, Hugh Fearnley-Whittingstall and the Dudes, Jon Shook and Vinny Dotolo, are less reliable but often inspiring.

"Olives & Oranges: Recipes and Flavor Secrets From Italy, Spain, Cyprus and Beyond," by Jenkins and Mindy Fox, has a Mediterranean spin. It's Jenkins' first book, though she's cooked at New York restaurants (her restaurant, Porchetta, opens this fall).

Jenkins' dishes are straightforward, interesting for often-striking flavor combinations. But the recipes can be hit-or-miss. Cantaloupe gazpacho is a blend of melon and cucumber with olive oil, sherry vinegar and shallot.

Topped with prosciutto and Aleppo pepper, the soup is easy and shot with flavor. But although a fattoush, or Middle Eastern salad of toasted pita and chopped vegetables, looked nice on the plate, it tasted flat.

"The River Cottage Family Cookbook," by Fearnley-Whittingstall and Fizz Carr, is the latest book by the British chef and television personality. It's geared to parents and their kids – somewhat of a departure for Fearnley-Whittingstall, who has frequently appeared on Gordon Ramsay's expletive-filled television shows, and whose first book, "Cook on the Wild Side," discussed preparing road kill.

The book does a great job of hitting its target audience, with short tutorials on subjects such as flour and chocolate, recipes for smoothies and ideas for kid-friendly projects.

A basic chocolate mousse is so easy your kids could start their careers as pastry chefs with it. But the honey fudge never set, remaining a sticky goo. A roast chicken turned out undercooked, bland even for kids; and though the accompanying gravy was tasty, there was only a tablespoon's worth.

Shook and Dotolo's first book, "Two Dudes, One Pan: Maximum Flavor From a Minimalist Kitchen," is as colorful and scruffy as the chefs themselves. The book is a happy mishmash, with recipes ranging from spicy citrus-glazed duck breasts to basic buttermilk pancakes.

Some recipes are successful riffs on the traditional: Bacon-wrapped meatloaf is shot with herbs, moist and deeply flavorful. But other dishes are disappointing.

Vinny's spaghetti Bolognese was too heavy, thickened with unnecessary butter and cream. Pan-roasted eggplant with shallot vinaigrette turned out underseasoned and undercooked.

Although some new user-friendly cookbooks are uneven, the standouts – Appleman's and Oliver's – are practical yet imaginative, with accessible instructions and helpful tips. They're also a bargain compared with many of the for-pros books. All six hardcovers come in at below $40 each.

Meanwhile, chefs, wannabe chefs and collectors willing to spend a little more money ($250 for Blumenthal's "The Big Fat Duck Cookbook") or who have a handy immersion circulator (needed for Keller's sous vide book) will have a stack of great cookbooks this fall too.

Set pieces help UMass

SET PIECES from page 12

This season the Minutemen have just started to take advantage of set pieces, although they aren't lacking the opportunities. Compared to last year the Minutemen have had 10 more corner kick opportunities, and more chances (34) than their opponents (29). UMass' opponents have committed more fouls (76) than UMass (67), giving the Minutemen another advantage.

This season, they have not gotten a goal off of a corner kick, but Arikian has created two successful opportunities off fouls. He shot a free kick to the box where senior Chris Brown headed in the game-winning goal against Siena on Sept. 6 and last weekend in the 2-1 loss against New Hampshire.

Arikian served a free kick to senior Mike DeSantis for his first goal of the season.

"I think we're certainly creating a lot of chances [off set pieces]," Koch said. "We need to do a little bit better job on them. I think its one of those things as the season goes we will get better and better at it."

This weekend, set pieces will be crucial, especially for the Minutemen who have spent most of the season focusing on their defense and haven't had as many goal-scoring opportunities.

"To beat Hartford's goalkeeper [junior Nenad Cudic] we're going to have to be a little bit better at our execution because anything that's off he'll be able to gobble it up, he's a solid keeper," Koch said.

If Mark DeSantis and Arikian (DeSantis takes corner kicks from the right side shooting left and Arikian takes the kicks on the left shooting right) service the ball where the Minutemen have practiced and the team is making solid runs they will have better success on the set pieces.

"I think both of them [DeSantis and Arikian] serve a very good ball into the box," Koch said. "But we're going to have to have perfect execution on the timing of the runs and the service."

The Minutemen are hoping to use set pieces as scoring opportunities during the tournament this weekend, but other teams will try and take advantage of them too, so the Minutemen's defense has to be aware of opponents' attacks on set pieces.

UMass defends every corner kick the same way: by setting up in a shell zone defense. Redshirt senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons is responsible for a specific area, as is the rest of the Minutemen's defense.

"I look for the exact same thing every time in that I make sure my defenders are in the exact same spot and I'm ready to cover my area," Simmons said. "Outside of that, you look for any particular targets that might be especially dangerous and you kind of point them out and are aware of where they are. For the most part it's the same every time."

Because the Minutemen have struggled to put balls in the back of the net it is important that they continue to take advantage of set pieces, as well as defend them properly.

Senior Chris Brown (5), junior Brian Hogan (11) and junior Stuart Thompson attempt to gain control of the ball in UMass' 1-0 win against Siena on Sept. 6.

Senior Prince Otosu leads the Minutemen in goals (two), both were scored in UMass' 3-2 win against Boston University on Aug. 31.

Evenly matched for Friday

since last season, so the team doesn't quite know what to expect Friday, though they do have an idea of who they need to stop.

Hartford forward Carlos Villa, who has scored eight goals out of the 12 the Hawks have this season, will be the player that Brown and the defense will have to focus on because he is known as a threat.

"[Villa has] put some balls in the back of the net, has he done it against very good, solid defensive teams? I don't know, I can't really tell because we haven't seen the teams they've played against," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

The matchup against Vermont pits two teams with very similar styles and philosophies. Neither team is an offensive powerhouse (UMass has seven goals in six games, Vermont eight in seven games), but they are both defensively sound – each allowing eight goals against them this season.

One advantage that UMass brings into every game is goalkeeper Zack Simmons. He was the UMBRO National Player of the Year and NSCAA/adidas Third Team All-American last season, and holds school records for career shutouts (24), career wins as a goalie (34) and single-season wins (17). It will be important for Simmons to live up to his reputation as a top goalkeeper if the Minutemen are to go 2-0 this weekend.

Simmons claimed both games matched up fairly evenly for the Maroon and White and felt the winner of each game will be determined by who does more of the little things right.

"UL, Hartford and Vermont are not the most technically skilled teams in the country for sure. I mean we're not unskilled, but we are not going to be able to play toe-to-toe with the teams that can recruit the best players coming out of high school," Simmons said. "So I think that if we're going to limit our giveaways, limit our turnovers and just play within our ability, we should do well."

With two games in a three-day span fatigue could become a major concern for the Minutemen. This will affect Koch's in-game coaching, his substitution patterns and the challenges it poses to the staff.

"Using the bench is important. Jay [a] making sure you rest some of the starting players a little bit more than you would otherwise, but the game dictates how you're going to make substitutions," Koch said. "If you get a group that's playing really well you don't want to take them off, but you also know you've got a game in two days, so you don't want to completely wear them out. It's one of those things where you just have to go with how the game is going."

The trip home comes at an opportune time for the Maroon and White, who have been struggling on the road this season going 1-4-1. However, at home the Minutemen are a sparkling 10-1 dating back to last season, including a 1-0 shutout against Siena this year.

There are many obvious explanations for why UMass is better at home ranging from the support of its fans and the rest from players sleeping in their own beds, but one overlooked advantage of being home is being able to play on familiar natural grass, as opposed to artificial turf.

"It's tough when you go from this field to the practice field then we were on the lake [fields] last week and it's like, where are we?" Koch said.

The Minutemen are interested in getting a chance to watch Rhode Island play as it is a conference opponent and will host UMass in two weeks. Koch hopes he can get a chance to see them play.

Offense too successful

ing it has great talent across the board and that it has the ability for the big play.

During the first three weeks of the season, the Minutemen had 17 scoring drives. Of those 17 drives, only three drives consumed more than five minutes of the clock, while 12 were fewer than three minutes. The average scoring drive for the Maroon and White's offense took barely over seven plays and ate up just three minutes, 10 seconds of clock.

Coen and the rest of the offense may be taking the title of Minutemen too literally (three of their scoring drives have taken up a minute or less).

That doesn't give the defense much time to rest.

The defense's conditioning is not being questioned here, it's just when a defense was on the field for any period of time and the offense can't give them a little bit of rest, they will get tired.

Here's some proof: on seven different occasions after the Minutemen had a scoring drive, the opposition answered on the immediate drive with a touchdown. Five of those UMass scoring drives took under three minutes.

One reason for the Minutemen's efficiency is the big plays. Eleven of the UMass' 17 scoring drives had at least one play of 20 yards or more, four of which had two plays of 20 yards or more. When the offense moves down the length of field in such large chunks, the defense pays because they are on the sideline for less time.

Let's not forget to mention the offense has yet to score this season in the first quarter (the defense scored on a fumble recovery against Texas Tech for the team's only points in a first quarter).

That is more its lack of efficiency, but it forces them to go for bigger plays later in the game because the team has dug itself into a hole.

Now it may sound crazy to be complaining about an offense performing too well, but when the defense's biggest issue all season has been its inability to tackle, it isn't because they forgot how to.

These guys have been playing since they were kids, in most cases and they have been tackling for years. It's not even that the opposition has learned to juke like Michael Vick in Madden (back when he was actually in the game).

But when the defense isn't given a break in-between drives, they are going to lose that half step that enables them to make those tackles, tackles that they are more than capable of making.

Redshirt senior defensive lineman Darnel DeLaire got his career-high four tackles against Albany on Aug. 30. DeLaire and the Minutemen are 2-2 this season.

game against Albany. The uncertainty surrounding Coen's targets has vanished.

Victor Cruz, Jeremy Horne and Julian Talley have displayed themselves as formidable threats on the field.

Cruz totals 405 yards over four games, which averages to over 100 yards a game. Two of Cruz's 23 receptions have been for touchdowns.

Horne has been just as dependable tallying 269 yards and three touchdowns.

The youngest of the receivers is Talley. The redshirt freshman has caught nine balls for 109 yards.

Red-zone specialist Ian Jorgensen doesn't go unnoticed either. The redshirt senior tight end is a force inside the 20-yard-line. Jorgensen's frame makes him harder to defend in tight situations. The tight end has caught nine balls, for 55 yards and two touchdowns.

DOWNWARD SPIRAL

With last Saturday's loss to Texas Tech, UMass once again has dropped in the Sports Network's Top 25 poll. The Minutemen are currently in the No. 18 spot dropping from their previous, No. 9 ranking.

The Maroon and White started the season at the No. 4 spot then moved up one after their last second game-winning field goal over Holy Cross. Since then the Minutemen have fallen steadily. After their tough 52-38 loss to James Madison, UMass fell six spots to No. 9 and the pattern has not stopped.

The FCS Coaches' Top 25 poll is a lot more forgiving. The coaches' poll has the Minutemen ranked at No. 10, two spots ahead of next weekend's opponent Delaware. James Madison is ranked No. 2 in the Sports Network Top 25 poll and No. 1 in the coaches' poll.

SIDE NOTES

Massachusetts cornerback Courtney Robinson moved to fourth in UMass' all time kick return list against Texas Tech. Robinson tallied 44 return yards to up his amount to 1,130.

Robinson passed Adrian Zullo's career total of 1,123.

Brian Ellis' fumble return of 53 yards for a touchdown against Texas Tech were the first points UMass has put up all season in the first quarter.

Eagles survive without Foster

has been made possible by the outstanding play of senior quarterback Antonio Heffner.

Heffner has become one of the top dual-threat quarterbacks in the FCS, averaging 264.5 yards passing per game and 45.8 yards rushing per game. The 6-foot-2 passer has received national attention, most recently as I-AA National Player of the Week after his 312-yard, three-touchdown performance against Eastern Kentucky.

EAGLES FALLING

During the 2007 season, Georgia Southern flourished as one of the most improved teams in the country. Led by the 2007 Walter Payton Award winner, quarterback Jayson Foster, the Eagles improved from a 3-8 record in 2006 to 8-4.

Foster, however, has moved on. The Eagles, on the other hand, have not yet returned to form without their leader.

Currently ranked at No. 22, Georgia Southern remains one of the most highly touted teams in the country. However, the team is not playing at the level it did a year ago, and with the Eagles ruthless conference they must improve quickly in order to stay ranked.

The Eagles have struggled to return the form since the loss of Foster, but his successor, sophomore quarterback Antonio Henton, is currently the team's leading rusher and passer, putting up 49.8 yards per game on the ground in addition to 175 yards per game in the air.

Defense needs resting time

Jeff Larnard

There is an obvious problem with the Massachusetts football team's defense.

It was the strength of the team coming into this season, and always known as UMass coach Don Brown's specialty, but has struggled through the first four weeks of the season.

Well, struggled may be an understatement.

They were run all over in Week 1 by an Albany team that plays in a much inferior conference (Northeast Conference). Despite a UMass win, the Great Danes ran for 181 yards on the Minutemen's defense and threw for another 199.

That game was seen as just a warm up, a game so the team could work the kinks out for its next game against Holy Cross.

Well, the Crusaders not only ran well on UMass, they also threw well. On the day, Holy Cross gained 126 yards rushing and threw for 249. The numbers aren't gaudy, but the Crusaders did just about what they wanted to on the Minutemen's defense.

Again, the Minutemen escaped with another win, on a last-second Armando Cuko field goal, but the defense came away looking poor.

One week later, the Maroon and White played its first conference opponent in James Madison, who dropped 52 points on the Minutemen while only completing four passes. The four passes were good for 85 yards and a score, but the real damage was done with the Dukes' running game.

JMU's starting running back, Griff Yancey, ran for 88 yards and three scores while back up tailback, Jamal Sullivan, ran for 40 yards and a touchdown. But the Dukes ran for a total of 338 yards on the Minutemen's defense in their 52-38 win.

The other 206 rushing yards came from the Walter Payton Award Candidate, Rodney Landers. The quarterback carved up the defense as he ran for two touchdowns, giving JMU a total of six rushing scores on the day.

The most recent game for the Minutemen, against Texas Tech, was not even a close game, but that was expected. The Red Raiders scored on every offensive possession they had in the first half except one (where UMass forced a fumble and returned it for a score), en route to a 56-14 win.

It was your modern day David and Goliath, except this time Goliath prevailed, as he should.

For the sake of argument we can forget about the Texas Tech game because the Red Raiders are the No. 10 team in the Football Bowl Subdivision, and boast arguably the nation's top offense, while the Minutemen were ranked No. 9, but in the Football Championship Subdivision.

Just looking at the first three weeks of the season, the Minutemen's defense was burned in every way possible. And this is the defense that returned eight starters from last season, has one of the best cornerback tandems in the FCS (NFL-prospect Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson) and is loaded with talent from the defensive line all the way to the secondary.

But the defense's problem is not within the defense, it's the offense.

UMass offense is too efficient. Despite being questioned at the beginning of the season, the offense is showing that they surely aren't proud of. The defense has allowed halftime point totals of 42 against Texas Tech, 31 against James Madison and 28 against Holy Cross. All are records for a team coached by Don Brown.

See LARNARD on page 10

Offense successful for UM

Texas Tech, James Madison show team's weaknesses

By Ryan Fleming
Collegian Staff

UMass Football

The Massachusetts football team had a rollercoaster of a season so far. The Minutemen have lost their last two games to formidable opponents, Texas Tech and James Madison.

The glaring hole for UMass is its defense. In the past three games, the Minutemen have set records

Fortunately for UMass, it has a bye week this weekend. It gives them time to regroup, rest and get ready for next weekend's vital home game against Delaware.

No offensive problem

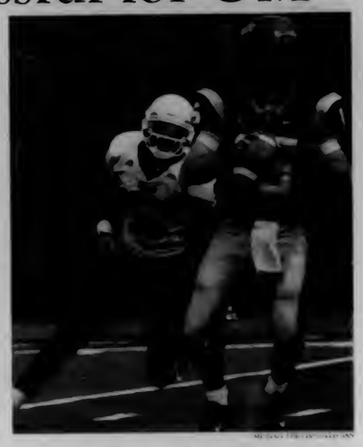
Senior quarterback Liam Coen threw for 734 yards and six touchdowns combined in the games against James Madison and Holy Cross.

Despite his poor performance against Texas Tech, one has to keep in mind that Texas Tech, now ranked No. 10 in the country, is anything but a push over. The Red Raiders are not renowned for their defense since its plays in the shadow of the superior offense.

Tony Nelson, UMass' starting running back, has rushed for 232 yards and four scores in those three games. Nelson isn't accumulating as many carries as he might be if Coen wasn't throwing the ball so well.



Comparatively Coen has 95 passing attempts to Nelson's 54 rushes.

Experience gained

Coming into the season, the Minutemen's starting wide receivers either were new to the school's offensive system or haven't seen a lot of playing time.

There were many question marks surrounding the corps, even still after the team's first

Junior Jeromy Miles and the rest of the Minuteman defense has allowed high numbers to be scored on them this season.

UMass returns for 2 games

Hartford challenging in weekend tournament

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

Last season, the Massachusetts men's soccer team was 2-4 after playing five of its first six games on the road. Once the team returned home, it reeled off a six-game winning streak and eventually made the NCAA College Cup. This season, UMass finds itself in a similar situation, and is hoping for a similar outcome.

The Minutemen (2-3-1) are hosting the UMass Classic this weekend and will face Hartford (3-2-2) Friday, then get right back on the pitch Sunday to take on Vermont (3-2-2).

Also competing in the tournament is Rhode Island. The Rams face Vermont on Friday and Hartford on Sunday.

Hartford has been a consistently challenging opponent for UMass. Each game over the last three years has ended in a 1-0 score, with the Minutemen winning the two most recent matchups.

However, UMass' defensive leader Chris Brown noted that several players have graduated

DeSantis, Arikian take kicks

By Melissa Turtinen

With two home games this weekend and a chance to boost its record, the Massachusetts men's soccer team will look to set pieces to increase its scoring chances.

Set pieces are like set plays. Having successful strategies and executions are an important goal-scoring opportunity that the Minutemen have begun to take advantage of.

During a match, it can be a struggle to move the ball down the field and finish shot attempts. But with set pieces, a team has a much better chance to follow through and score goals.

Set pieces come off corner kicks or free kicks, giving the team a chance to set up and create chances. The person taking the kick, usually junior forward Mark DeSantis or sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian, know where the rest of the Minutemen will be making their runs. They know where to put the ball even before they take the kick.

"If you execute [the kick] correctly, as far as the timing of the runs and the service, it's a very good opportunity to get a good chance on goal," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

In the past, the Minutemen have been very dangerous on set pieces. Towards the end of the 2007 season, the Minutemen became more successful on kicks, scoring multiple goals off set pieces in postseason play.

See SET PIECES on page 9

Sophomore Ben Arikian has been a key player in set pieces this season. He has tallied two assists and a game-winning goal in six games.

UMass coach Don Brown has seen his defense allow record-setting point totals in the first half of game in the last three weeks.

Mountaineers lose ground

CAA teams top FCS polls

By Nick O'Malley

FCS Top 25

Ever since its stunning victory over FBS powerhouse Michigan last year, Appalachian State has been the premier football program in the FCS. With three consecutive national champions currently under its belt, it has well warranted attention.

Recently, however, the Mountaineers (1-2) have lost ground on the rest of the division and have allowed other programs to step into the spotlight.

Many of the nation's top FCS football programs currently reside in the CAA. The conference currently holds the top two spots in the college rankings, James Madison and Richmond. There are a total of seven CAA teams in the top 25 rankings, including No. 8 New Hampshire, No. 10 Massachusetts, No. 12 Delaware and No. 19 Villanova.

JMU (3-1) dethroned ASU from the top spot during a thrilling 35-32 win, in which the Dukes came all the way back from a 21-0 halftime deficit.

While the CAA holds the most teams in the top 25, the majority of the Southern conference is currently ranked. Six out of the conference's nine teams are in the top 25, including Appalachian State, Wofford, Elon, Furman, Georgia Southern and Citadel.

Outside the CAA and Southern, there are numerous FCS programs that are perennially atop the polls and have continued the trend this year. Teams like ASU, No. 3 Montana, No. 5 Northern Iowa and No. 15 Southern Illinois Furman are consistently among the top teams in the nation.

Pounding the rock

Many of today's college offenses employ a spread scheme that incorporates multiple receiver sets, shotgun formations and throwing the ball down the field.

Texas Tech of the FBS is perhaps the best example of such an offense, as the Red Raiders have averaged 426.3 yards of offense through the air so far this season.

Many top 25 FCS programs, however, are determined to have success through a strong running game.

James Madison has dominated a pass-happy college landscape by averaging 250 rushing yards per game. No. 11 Wofford, meanwhile, has put up a staggering 327.8 yards on the ground per game, which is good for second in the country behind Virginia Military, which averages 390 rushing yards per game.

Wofford's success has come from their unconventional wing bone offense that was devised by coach Mike Ayers. The offense incorporates the contemporary aspects of a triple-option offense and the modern aspects of a shotgun spread.

Tigers on the rise

Tennessee State has emerged from mediocrity in the little-known Ohio Valley Conference to one of the top FCS teams in the country.

The Tigers (4-0) were picked to finish fourth in the conference in preseason polls this season. After four wins to open the season, the Tigers cracked the Top 25 in the coaches' poll.

Rising into the top ten team rankings

See FCS FOOTBALL on page 10

Tennessee State's Antonio Heffner averages 264.5 yards passing per game and 45.8 yards rushing per game. The Tigers (4–0) were picked to finish fourth in the conference in a preseason poll.

UMass gets 'green' report card

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has received a C+ on the 2009 College Sustainability Report Card, which is used to rate the nation's greenest colleges and universities.

The Sustainable Endowments Institute, based in Cambridge, Mass., graded 300 schools in nine categories: climate and energy use, green building, food and recycling, transportation, administration, student involvement, endowment transparency, shareholder engagement and investment priorities.

The results said UMass excels in climate change and energy, as well as food and recycling. The University received an A in both categories. However, the overall grade was brought down with Fs in endowment transparency and shareholder engagement.

"The campus is pleased to have been rated well in categories that make a major difference, such as climate change and energy, and food and recycling," said Ed Blaguszewski, director of the Office of News and Information. "We expect to work more on student involvement, where we can certainly improve our performance."

Despite scoring well in some categories, some students are displeased with the overall outcome.

Junior Justin Trenga and senior Weston Neff, both environmental design majors, said they are "disappointed" and "ashamed" at the University's C+.

"I don't think we're very green," said Adrianne Ecomoriu, a senior

First Cuban-American judge

UMass alum comes back to alma matter

BY GISEL SAILLANT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Before the Honorable Judge Eduardo Robreno became the first Cuban-American appointed to the Federal District bench, his journey began here at the University of Massachusetts as a graduate student in Professor Dean Alfange's class.

He was invited last week to give a lecture in the 4th annual Dean Alfange Jr. "Lecture in American Constitutionalism." The Amherst room in the Campus Center was crowed with faculty, students and a high school class from Northampton.

Robreno said he was honored and moved to be back at UMass. Robreno shared how it has been almost 40 years since he has been to UMass and had to adjust himself to the New England weather after living in Pennsylvania for some time. He noted the "tremendous expansion" the University has gone through.

He said that coming back to campus has brought back pleasant memories, especially the learning experience he had in Professor Alfange's civil liberties class.

"[It was] very inspiring because he was serious and demanding," said Robreno.

Their class met at 7 a.m. regularly. Understandably, only a small amount of students attended, which allowed Robreno to engage and be challenged intellectually by Professor Alfange.

Robreno also spoke about his arrival in 1960 to the U.S. from Cuba through Operation Pedro Pan. This operation brought about 14,000 youths to the U.S. Robreno said he was brought to Massachusetts where he lived with foster parents before attending Northampton High School and received his B.A. from Westfield State College.

The lecture also outlined the process by which federal district judges are appointed. Robreno shared his experience of attending law school and serving as a trial attorney for the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, after which he entered a private practice in Philadelphia. But before he could pursue being considered for nomination, Robreno sought the support of the senate and Hispanic community in Philadelphia.

Judge Robreno explained how there is a state as well as a national process involved during the nomination process. "[There] are a lot of forces between the states that come to play," Robreno said.

To get appointed to the federal courts, the president makes the nomination and the Senate confirms the nomination. He also touched upon the increase of minority and female judges appointed to the federal bench after President Carter.

Male birth control research

BY MATT BIGHFORD
UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN U. KANSAS

LAWRENCE, KS. — Right here at the University of Kansas, researchers are working to provide another option when it comes to contraceptives.

In the 1960s, a revolutionary new pill came onto the market and changed the way the world — and especially women — thought about sex. It has liberated millions of women over the years, putting the power to decide when, or if, they would have children squarely in their hands. The same option could soon be a possibility for men.

Joseph Tash, Gustavo Blanco, William H. Kinsey and Leslie Heckert make up the core unit currently working on this project at KU Medical Center. The project's original leader at the University of Kansas, Gunda Georg, has since become head of the department of medicinal chemistry at the University of Minnesota, where her new position has brought extensive new resources to the project.

Tash is quick to point out that this is not a typical birth control pill. While chemical birth control options for women use hormones to trick the body into ceasing ovulation or make it more difficult for sperm to reach the egg, the male pill takes a completely different approach.

This chemical compound directly targets the creation of sperm cells, and this targeted approach greatly reduces the chance of side effects.

By effectively reducing the sperm count to zero, the drug reduces the chance of conception to zero. Rather than making it difficult for sperm to reach the egg, it takes sperm out of the equation.

Everything else functions normally, Tash says. Semen is still produced, but without the sperm cells necessary to fertilize an egg. Tash also says there was also no discernible change in the sex drive of the test animals.

If this drug continues to proceed through tests without showing side effects or failures, it could be available for purchase in five to seven years. Tash warns, however, that the timeline for any drug's development is very unpredictable.

Are we ready?

Apart from abstinence, condoms and surgical sterilization are currently the only ways a man can prevent pregnancy on his own.

A male contraceptive pill would be welcomed by many men who find condoms an uncomfortable, inconvenient or even risky solution. They're still essential in preventing sexually transmitted diseases, but using condoms can get old pretty quickly in a monogamous, committed relationship known to be free of sexually transmitted infections.

And because this pill would allow fertility to return in a short amount of time by ceasing to take it, it's a great alternative to vasectomies — something most men don't like to think about, and very few men seriously consider until after they've fathered all the children they want.

With a male contraceptive pill possibly becoming available in as few as five years, the question of whether men, women and society as a whole will be ready to embrace it is coming to the forefront.

Shirley Hill, professor of sociology, says she thinks most men won't be ready to use something like this within the next five to seven years.

Hill says because women would still carry the bulk of the responsibility of pregnancy, childbirth and raising children, a woman would need to be in a relationship in which she could trust that her partner was responsible enough to remember to take the pill.

Uncharted territory

First reactions to this new concept are typically cautious.

"I think that would be a possibility, something I may want to take," says Matt Hamje, Leawood freshman. "But there are many other things to consider. If there were bad side effects, condoms are always an easy way without side effects."

Other men, however, found it to be an appealing proposition.

"It would be something that would probably help everyone sleep better at night," says Jordan Smith, Wichita freshman. "It would be another precaution to take, and if it's safe and works, then it would be a great thing."

Smoking ban for U. Penn

BY NICK PLATT
THE LEDGER-ANQUIRER U.

WASHINGTON, DC — Pennsylvania's decision to ban smoking completely at 14 of its state universities has given rise to the question of whether students have a fundamental right to light up on their campus grounds. Most of the American University students who were interviewed opposed the ban.

The anti-smoking ruling in Pennsylvania state universities (except for Pennsylvania State University, which is not part of the state university system and still allows smoking) is part of a more encompassing law that bans smoking from many businesses and most public spaces, USA Today reported.

College administrators have taken much of the blame for interpreting a law, the Clean Indoor Air Act, as applying to outdoor spaces as well. Many Pennsylvania students have expressed grievances with that change, according to USA Today.

One student from Bloomsburg University of Pennsylvania, who wanted to remain anonymous, said, "If you want the entire campus to be a non-smoking area then just say there is no smoking on campus and stand up to people and take the heat yourselves."

Isabel Moris, a sophomore in the School of International Service, said she questions the policy of regulating open spaces.

"I understand the regulations, but outside is outside," she said.

Jonathan Southgate, a sophomore in SIS, said he supports the regulations, but not on the scale utilized in Pennsylvania.

"Regulate it, but don't make it all or nothing," he said.

Some students both from AU and Pennsylvania universities said they agree smoking policies should not be "all or nothing" and supported compromise.

David Taylor, AU President Neil Kerwin's chief of staff, said the issue of a campus smoking ban has come up several times throughout his career but emphasized that it has always come up from the faculty, staff and students not the administration.

Teachers Unions demand new contract negotiations

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts teachers unions are nearing the end of their pages after over six months of failed contract negotiations with the state legislature.

Previous contracts for 11 unions representing Massachusetts teachers are now expired according to Max Page, president of Massachusetts Society of Professors, which represents UMass. Most of those contracts expired in June or July of this year.

Both the Massachusetts Society of Professors and the Massachusetts State College Association (MSCA), which represents the nine state colleges, said they've been meeting with the Board of Higher Education (BHE) since January and February respectively. Their hope was to have the contracts finished before their other contracts expired. But now, nearly six months later, the unions are taking more extreme steps. Because public employees cannot lawfully strike, they're turning to other options.

In early August, the 11 teachers unions that represent all of the teachers and staff at three of the University of Massachusetts campuses and all nine state colleges filed an unfair labor practice complaint against the BHE, according to the Boston Globe.

A statement from the MSCA reads, "the BHE has failed to bargain in good faith as it is obligated to do under the state's collective bargaining law. This failure consists of refusing to bargain over economic matters and refusing to send representatives to the negotiating table with the authority to bargain over economic matters."

Earlier this week, Westfield State College professors and staff formed a picket line on campus.

Max Page said over 100 faculty and staff from UMass Amherst are travelling to Boston today to sit in on the Board of Trustees meeting "to basically tell them off for having failed to present offers at all and in a few cases, awful offers. That's our message tomorrow. ... We're giving them a chance before taking further action to come to the table with fair offers," he said yesterday.

"My union has not actually gotten a full formal contract offer even though we started bargaining late January," said Page. "What happens is the governor sort of says 'these should be the economic parameters,' but the board of trustees is our actually employer ... they have the obligation to make whatever offers are necessary to hire and retain a good faculty."

According to the MSCA, Governor Deval Patrick just released those parameters earlier this month, but the MSCA said they are no where near adequate, especially because the pay increases are scheduled for Jan. 1 and would not be retroactive.

MSCA President Christopher O'Donnell said administration stalled on the negotiations and then offered a proposal that does not account for the fact there were no contracts for six months.

Page said he doesn't know why the negotiations have been so contentious. "We have a democratic governor, who wanted to make public education a top priority and whatever else you have to do if you want to attract and retain top staff and faculty, [you have to pay them well], and UMass staff and faculty are well below their peers [in salary] at every level."

"[UMass] Chancellor Holub, who I like very much, wanted to turn UMass into Berkeley, but you can't do it if you make staff take pay cuts," said Page. "If cost of living inactreases 4.5 percent, and you get a 2.5 percent raise, it's actually a cut."

O'Donnell agreed and said there are numbers saying state faculty salaries have been underpaid by 10 to 20 percent dating back to 2004. He said some junior faculty members are leaving because they're underpaid, and it makes hiring of new faculty much harder.

"We want to make inroads on that problem too," he said.

Page and O'Donnell both commented that it is frustrating that while the faculty and staff have received nothing, the administrators, presidents and state colleges have received cost of living raises.

Even when unions have been able to arrange meetings with the BHE, things haven't always gone as planned.

The most recent round of negotiations between the MSCA and the BHE occurred this Wednesday, marking the first meeting since the parameters had been released by Patrick. However, O'Donnell said the meeting wasn't what he had hoped.

"On Monday we were told we would not get a comprehensive proposal, we were told to get a financial offer, we didn't get a financial offer, [so the] meeting lasted 30 minutes," he said.

O'Donnell said there is another meeting scheduled for Monday to exchange proposals.

There are other things the MSCA hopes to get out of negotiations as well.

"Certainly expecting retroactivity back to 2008 and a cost of living increase at minimum," said O'Donnell.

The comment from the Executive Office of Education hints that the faltering economy may have played a role in the delay coming out with a proposal.

"We are committed to negotiating a fair and reasonable contract," said Spokesman Jonathan Palumbo, "that respects our union members, recognizes their hard work and dedication to educating our students and is mindful of the current economic situation."

majoring in hospitality and tourism management. "I don't see much effort around campus."

Last year, the five UMass campuses were assessed as one group and also earned a C-. This year only the Amherst campus was reviewed, and received the same grade. In comparison, two thirds of the schools earned higher scores than a year ago, according to the analysis.

Lisa Tuska, a research fellow for the Sustainable Endowments Institute, said one way UMass can boost its marks for next year is to, "get the administration's policies for sustainability out to the public."

Though average, other nearby schools outranked UMass overall.

UMass ranked 14th out of 21 schools surveyed in the state and 24th out of 37 in New England.

Smith College and Amherst College each received a B+. Mount Holyoke College posted a B. Hampshire College was not included in the survey.

The University of New Hampshire and the University of Vermont were two of 15 schools qualifying as College Sustainability Leaders by earning the highest overall grade of A-.

Complete results are available at GreenReport.org, an interactive Web site which launched Wednesday morning. The site allows users to search the report card's three-year history, filter the results, and compare schools side-by-side.

"This Web site will help high school students make an educated college choice," said Mark Orlowski, executive director of the Sustainable Endowments Institute.

"We hope the schools can use the site as a tool for improvement and learn from each other," she said.

Bidding for emissions

New front of war on greenhouse gases

By David Funkhouser
The Hartford Courant

Friday morning, Laurence DeWitt plans to sit down at his computer in Albany, N.Y., and start bidding for the right to emit a thousand or more tons of carbon dioxide.

DeWitt, an environmental consultant, will be joined by many others including the companies that produce most of the Northeast's electricity from fossil fuels.

This groundbreaking event, the first auction of carbon allowances in the United States, is the first step in a broader plan by 10 New England and Mid-Atlantic states to curb the emissions scientists say are contributing to global warming.

The immediate goal is to cut carbon dioxide emissions from the region's power plants by 10 percent by 2018 which, in effect, puts a price on the greenhouse gases the region's power plants pump into the air.

Friday's auction will have implications far into the future, affecting what we pay for electricity, where it comes from and how we manage our use of it.

"It's the kickoff of the first mandatory cap-and-trade program for greenhouse gases in the United States. It's an historic day," said Jonathan E. Schrag, executive director of the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative Inc., or RGGI, the company the states have set up to run the program.

The program dubbed "R(e)GGI" sets an annual cap on carbon dioxide emissions from all plants in the region producing 25 megawatts or more of power at 186 million tons.

After several years, the cap will shrink, driving up the cost of the allowances and giving power companies further incentive to reduce emissions and invest in cleaner energy-producing technology.

Up for sale Friday are allowances, sold in blocks of 1,000, to emit more than 12.5 million tons of carbon dioxide.

Connecticut and five other states – Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Vermont – will participate in this first auction. Four other states in the coalition – Delaware, New Hampshire, New York and New Jersey, are expected to join in for subsequent auctions, which will be held quarterly.

The bidding is not limited to power companies. The bidders include manufacturers, financial companies and individuals, anyone willing to put up money or collateral in advance was eligible to apply to bid. DeWitt, for example, wants to learn the inner workings of the system and, perhaps, turn a profit.

Proponents say the efficiency programs can help wean people off fossil fuels and lower greenhouse gas emissions, and lower their energy bills. They argue that the conservation programs funded by the auctions will ultimately lower customers' energy costs by far more than any increase in their electric bills.

The effect of the auctions on electricity prices is unclear, in part because no one knows how much bidders will be willing to pay. Experts say the price is likely to fluctuate during the initial auctions, and then settle down.

Networking alerts

Facebook finds new role

By Jessica Trehy
FSView & Florida Flambeau, Florida State U.

TALLAHASSEE, FL — The social networking sites Facebook.com and MySpace.com are the latest additions to a list of 26 ways Florida State University notifies students of emergencies. The two Web sites are now linked to the university's alerts system.

The Florida State Environmental Health and Safety department implemented the new system on Sept. 8. It links Facebook.com and MySpace.com to www.alerts.fsu.edu.

"The information that we post on www.alerts.fsu.edu is automatically posted on Facebook and MySpace," said Dave Bujak, emergency management coordinator at FSU.

There are four aspects of Facebook.com and MySpace.com that are particularly attractive, Bujak said.

"The first is that it is a Web site that most students go to on a very regular basis," said Bujak.

Facebook.com has quickly become a way that many students find information. This is important if the department wants to get information out to a lot of students quickly.

"I'm on Facebook.com more than I am on Blackboard," said FSU junior Greg Hunt. "I feel like I hear about a lot of information through Facebook.com."

The second aspect is that Facebook.com and MySpace.com become an alternative source of communication if the official university alert Web site fails due to an overload of traffic.

"It gives us the advantage that should the Web site get lots of hits, as was the case with Virginia Tech and Northern Illinois as their Web sites crashed, the information would be replicated on Facebook.com and MySpace.com," said Bujak. "It is almost like a mirror of information on Web sites that will never crash."

The third aspect of Facebook.com in particular is that it allows students to ask university officials questions through the discussion board.

"It allows students or any other Facebook members to actually ask questions and you will receive official, professional answers from university officials," said Bujak.

The final aspect of Facebook.com and MySpace.com that university officials like is that there is information to prepare for emergencies.

A concern for some students is allowing the university to have access to their Facebook.com profile. However, according to Bujak this should not be a concern.

"Most people who are security conscious already take the necessary precautions," said Bujak.

According to the Facebook.com Web site, users can control what others are able to see.

Osama bin Laden archive at Yale gets mixed reaction

By Basak Otus
Yale Daily News

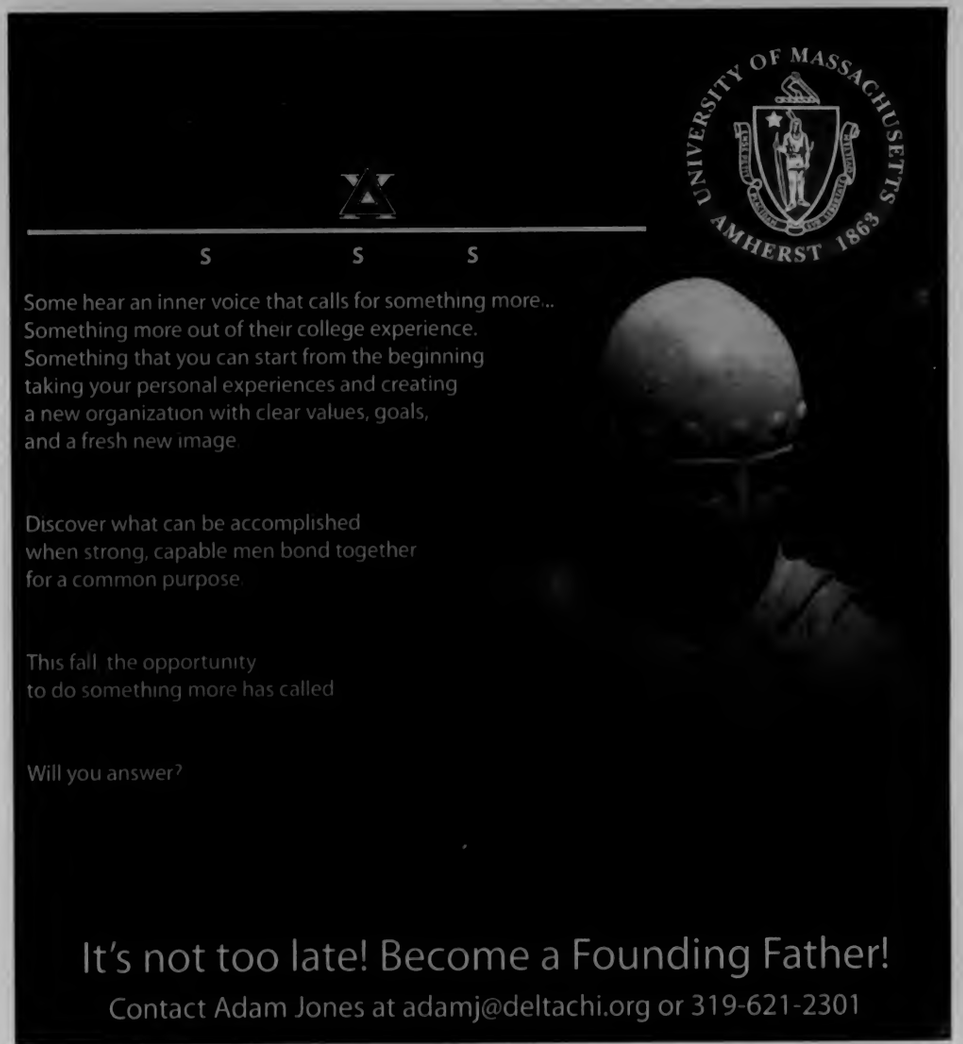
NEW HAVEN, CT — English majors getting tired of Shakespeare and Wordsworth will soon be able to turn to Yale's libraries for a poet of different kind altogether: Osama bin Laden.

The University is currently in the midst of processing, preserving and archiving 1,500 audio tapes recorded in bin Laden's Afghanistan headquarters from 1988 through 2000 — a collection that includes recordings of everything from celebrations after militant actions to religious sermons to, yes, bin Laden's poetry. The University has already digitized 335 of the tapes and will have the rest of the project completed in a few years, said Yale spokesman Tom Conroy. Once the archiving is finished, the entire collection will be available to researchers and students.

"The library's duty is to ensure the long-term preservation and access to these and other materials for decades and centuries to come, and for future generations of scholars," Conroy said.

The tapes took a roundabout route to New Haven.

After the December 2001 fall of the Taliban, bin Laden and his cohorts fled his Kandahar compound, leaving behind hundreds of audiotapes of gatherings, speeches and sermons that would be unearthed by CNN in the ensuing weeks. The network turned over the tapes to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which decided to release the tapes after concluding that the recordings did not contain any sensitive intelligence.



David Edwards, director of the Williams College Afghan Media Center, obtained the tapes with the intention of preserving and cataloging them. Edwards, a professor of anthropology and sociology, alerted his colleague Flagg Miller, an assistant professor of religious studies at the University of California at Davis, of the tapes' availability for research purposes.

But Edwards subsequently determined that the tapes, having been tossed around and kept in a damp and dusty environment, were in fragile condition and required treatment. He said he thought they would be accessible to a wider range of people at a large research university – particularly one with a strong interest in Middle East collections, such as Yale. In 2005, he offered the audiotapes to the Yale Library Manuscripts and Archives, and later that year they made the trek from Williamstown, Mass. to New Haven.

William Massa, head of collection development for Yale libraries, said that while the original audiotapes are being kept in a Yale library shelving facility in nearby Hamden, researchers, including those without a Yale ID, are welcome to use Yale's digital archive to access the tapes that have already been restored and processed.

"Anybody who registers to use Yale's resources can have access to the digital recordings," he said.

Skateboarders start new RSO

UMass students practice longboarding and build camaraderie through skating

By Oliver Scott Snure
Collegian Staff

Next time you are out walking about campus, take a look around and count the number of skateboarders you see. There is no denying it, skateboarders are everywhere these days. I'll admit, I am a big fan of skateboarding, as to whether that qualifies me to fill this page with my expounding shall be determined by you, my reader. So in the mean time, let me expound.

There are basically two kinds of skateboarding that you need to know about, longboarding and shortboarding, also known as freestyle skateboarding. Both styles are prominent here on the University of Massachusetts Campus.

Longboarders can be seen on their long skateboards with big, soft wheels cruising the sidewalks with ease.

The shortboarders, can often be seen near the bus stop at the Haigis Mall improving their skills at ollies, kickflips and various other tricks with names like "no handed boneless" that boggle my mind and twist my tongue. It's amazing, really, how often they are there, I sometimes suspect they take shifts.

One of the most fascinating aspects to the sport, is the camaraderie between skateboarders. Believe it or not, skateboarding is a great way to make friends. Like many other activities, skateboarding is an enabler for people who have similar interests in the sport to meet and become friends.

I spoke with a freestyle skater, Harrison Gering, a sophomore here at UMass who said that he was able to establish a circle of friends here at school through skateboarding.

"I was able to meet a community of kids that skate," Gering said. "The friends [I have] here are the kids that I skate with."

What is special about the bonds formed between skateboarders is how quickly and easily they are established. Even without a skateboard of my own, I found that when I spoke to skaters on campus the mere mention of having an interest in the sport and that fact that I was working on an article about it gave me a sort of instant free pass to being their best friend, if only for a short while.

It seems I was not the only one to benefit from this social phenomenon. The Umass Longboard Club, a relatively new RSO on campus has hit the ground running and exploded onto the RSO roster with a current membership of over 75 within only a year.

The club president, Pete Rizzo, and treasurer Jeremy Ross, as well as the other senior members of the club are very pleased with the way things have been going, particularly this semester.

"Compared to last year, we're getting a lot more positive response from kids we see. A lot of kids this year are very, very interested," Rizzo said.

The last facet of the social entity that is skateboarding that I'd like to talk about, if you will, is a bit of a touchy subject. I couldn't help but noticing while I was out shooting skateboarders that there exists a tension between some skaters and the area law enforcement.

I had the chance to speak with individuals from both sides of the issue, and as it turns out, problems on campus, though definitely present, seem minimal. I spoke with Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald and he seemed like a pretty chill guy, to put it candidly. He expressed an understanding for both his officers and skateboarders alike.

"They [skateboarders] want to do things that are challenging to them, and officers know that. We have a pretty young force here, were pretty in tune with what kids like to do," said Archbald. "The officers know that people need something to do, they need an outlet."

He explained to me that the reason sparks are ignited between officers of the law and skateboarders is that officers get tired of getting called to the same place for the same skaters. For that reason, they come across angry or annoyed to those skaters they have to deal with.

"There's officers out there who have been out there for a long time and have lost their patience for skateboarders. Which isn't a fair thing to do and I try not to encourage my officers to do that," Archbald said.

And it seems Deputy Archbald is doing a good job maintaining amiable relationships with students. I asked Gering about the topic and he said that he thinks the officers are doing fine.

"They are just doing their job. The cops on campus are nice," said Gering.

I hope by contributing this photoessay that I have helped students on this campus to better understand the noticeable surplus of students on four small wheels. And hey, maybe you, my devoted reader who has read through all 812 words of this article, will someday try riding a skateboard yourself. You will have practiced all that the art, the sport and the social entity that is skateboarding has to offer.

Josh Slocum and Max Fernandois met each other skateboarding at the North Parking Lot. The inherant camaraderie that develops almost instantly between skateboarders is one of the many fascinating aspects of the pastime. ## Parking disservices

Rachel Dougherty

If campus police were as tough on underage drinking as they are on parking violations, the Pioneer Valley's liquor stores would go out of business. It's an experience any licensed undergraduate can probably relate to: you innocently leave your car in what looks like an empty, unmarked parking space and come back not an hour later to find that your reckless parking has earned you anything from a $40 citation to a $100 towing fee.

My first experience with parking services was the latter. I wasn't lucky enough to make it back in time to see the obnoxious yellow citation the police stuck on my window, and was panicked to come back to the empty space where my car had been. Ironically, I didn't know whether to call the police or if the police had taken it.

I, like hundreds of other UMass students, was left staring at an empty space with no idea who took my car, where it was or how to get it back. The "who" answer is easy. Getting it back is difficult.

Parking Services didn't just take my car. Oh no. These people are vindictive. They took it and dumped it a couple miles off campus, in a fenced-in outpost of hell known as the Amherst Towing Company. It's a scary place where not even the PVTA will go. I went up to the lady behind the counter and told her the campus police took my car. I explained how I never meant for it to end up in her lot and it was taken without my knowledge or permission. If she would just open the gate, I could go in there to get it and she'd never have to see me again.

She looked at me, popped her gum and said, "That'll be $116." I looked at her like she was crazy because she seriously thought my car was worth that much. I wanted to tell her she could keep it. It's been nothing but trouble anyway. I didn't say this though, because I already bought the stupid yellow parking pass. Plus I didn't want to walk three and a half miles back to Northeast.

So, now I've wasted almost $116 on a car whose net worth is probably no more than $500. I took my barely functioning VW Jetta and parked where I was supposed to – in the abandoned lot in the middle of nowhere where girls go to get abducted.

You see, parking services didn't just take my car. Oh no. These people are vindictive.

In all seriousness, the parking situation on campus poses a serious problem for students. Approximately one third of UMass undergraduates have cars on campus, according to Commuter Options Program Coordinator Robert Hendry. There are three general areas available for undergraduate parking and some of them are as much as a mile away from the motorists' residence halls. Lot 13 isn't even on most campus maps. It's about half a mile up the road past Sylvan, on a road without sidewalks or street lights.

This can be a real problem for students coming back late at night who have to walk back to their dorms on unprotected streets in the dark. When Jennifer Moore disappeared in New York in 2006 and was found dead, the media raised the question of responsibility in abduction and rape cases. The rationale was that a girl who is irresponsible enough to wander out into the streets alone after dark probably deserves to be abducted. If a college student is assaulted because they have to walk a mile in the dark back from their parking lot at night, who is responsible?

The streets of Amherst may not be comparable to those of New York, but UMass isn't exactly a place you go walking alone at night. Coming back in groups isn't always a possibility. I work off campus on Saturdays and sometimes get back at 11 p.m. or later. What choices are available to students in that position? Take advantage of the free parking by the dorms between the hours of 5pm and 8am? That's fine if you're able to get up at 7:30 in the morning to move your car back to its lot or if you don't mind waking up to a 10 a.m. citation and a trip to Amherst Towing Company.

There's no free parking on campus between the hours of 8 a.m. and 5 p.m., unless you know about the one spot in the lot by the library where the meter is broken. There is also no clause telling police how long they have to wait between issuing a citation and towing a car, according to Rupert Hendry, which means that they could potentially have a car towed within 10 minutes of issuing a citation, turning a $40 parking ticket into a $156 towing fee.

I'm not advocating a change in the parking dynamics on campus so much as an increased tolerance of parking violators. Extend the free parking hours from 8 a.m. to 10 a.m. Give students time to see the citation before towing their cars. We understand there's only so much Parking Services can do with over 20,000 undergraduates and a limited number of parking spaces, but students have limits too and allowances should be made for the less-than-ideal reality of parking on campus.

Butterfield's legacy

Matthew M. Robare

Our fair campus is home to many fine dorms, but there is one in particular around which legends swirl like the autumn leaves, viewed as a land of paradise lost for college students – Butterfield.

Many stories are told about that dorm. Stories of how it had it's own meal plan and dining hall that was a front for drug selling, how it was discovered when it made more money than all other student businesses combined, how all who lived there were so different from the rest of the school and how the dorm secceded from UMass once. All these legendary stories took place in the 1970s.

Though it's a cliché, it's true that all legends have a basis in fact. Solving the mystery of Butterfield, revealing the dorm behind the paradise and whatever perfidious fate that caused its downfall all must have had some bases in truth. The story about Butterfield that interested me the most was of its secession. I mean, that's not a usual political activity even for this campus. Not to mention, how was it possible, or permitted by the administration?

Through UMasswiki.com, I was able to track down the man who was there from the beginning – Marc J. Randazza, First Amendment lawyer and adjunct professor at the Barry University School of Law. Professor Randazza was enormously helpful. I owe this column to him. His story was simple. Back in the days when George H. W. Bush was president, Butterfield had no house council; so the residents half-seriously decided to make one. Professor Randazza was elected president of the council, a throne was made out of a La-Z-Boy chair and he was invested with a Burger King crown.

They were crazy in Butterfield, but not fraternity house insane. People walked down halls smoking pot in the nude, but no one was ever unsafe.

One of his friends climbed to the roof and hoisted a pirate flag over the building. Area Coordinator Matt Ouellette turned it into an incident by having the flag removed by a crew with a cherry picker. The next night during a rainstorm, Randazza and a few friends climbed the roof with a new flag and hoisted it on the shortwave radio antenna. Later, because the housing office's authority ultimately descends from the government, the Butterfield House Council declared independence, not only from the school, but also from Massachusetts and the United States.

This was accomplished by sending then-president Bush a letter which never received a reply. Randazza maintains that his failure to answer the letter means that the secession was recognized and is legal. He even offered the US embassy space with Canada in the basement. Randazza also purchased a Scottish lairdship through a magazine ad, so each successive house council president has been a member of Scottish nobility.

That's the story of Butterfield's secession, but what were the reasons behind it? Was it just a prank the administration took seriously? In Professor Randazza's eyes, it was both a joke and a protest. At the time, Butterfield was not taken seriously by the Student Government Association, the administration or housing, which Randazza describes as "self-important" and "far-left leaning" who didn't like anyone challenging their authority. When housing pushed Butterfield, the residents reacted like the college students they were and went out of their way to give the middle finger to the administration.

Housing never liked Butterfield. It's still the smallest dorm on campus. At that time, it had its own kitchen and meal plan. The residents lived together and, more importantly, they ate together. So, the relationships between the residents grew to resemble a family rather than the artificial community spirit attempted by the dorms today. They were crazy in Butterfield, but not fraternity house insane. People walked down halls smoking pot in the nude, but no one was ever unsafe. If anyone ever was threatened, the family banded together for protection – as Randazza said, "violent hippies with Frisbees [are] a force to be reckoned with."

As housing and the administration became more Draconian towards the dorm, things changed for the worse. UMass magazine relates the story of a couple of students who attempted to set fire to a sofa in a hallway. But when you think about it, it's the way 19-year-olds would react when not treated with respect. Housing also killed Butterfield by closing the kitchen. It became freshman-only housing, long-time residents were kicked out, and the building was renovated. Sic transit gloria mundi.

There are lessons that can be learned from Butterfield. A heavy-handed attitude can provoke much behavior authority does not tolerate. Most importantly, it betrays a good deal of hypocrisy on the part of the college administrators around the country.

Community has been a buzzword used to justify many things over the years. Events are planned to build community, but here in Butterfield they had more than a community – they had a family. That family was not the university's idyllic notion of a family, not was it constructed on their terms. So, it had to be destroyed. That's the way of all authority. They'll give an inch, but fight for the mile.

Long live Butterfield.

America: No longer the land of opportunity?

Seyi Obasa

Recently collected data has shown a declining trend in the number of immigrants migrating to the United States. The number showed substantially in 2007 as the population of legal immigrants has only grown by about 511,000 people, compared to 1 million in 2000. A total of 14 states have reported a recent decline in immigrants including popular gateways such as New Jersey and Illinois and newer popular immigration locations such as Nebraska, South Dakota, and Kansas. The data draws from various demographics which transcend different social, economic and housing characteristics.

Many speculate that immigrants are keeping an eye on the economic situation in America, which is currently mired in many foreclosures and bank bailouts. Numerous sectors of the economy, such as retail and service jobs that many immigrants would generally be attracted to, have yielded less potential jobs and opportunities than in years past. Some attribute the declining legal immigrant population to the federal government's enforcement of immigration laws.

To add to the woes of potential immigrants, high gas prices, carpool lanes and other incentives aimed to reduce gas and transportation prices have proven futile –of new cultures. America itself must get back to the beloved world superpower status it once was and revive its currency to be as strong as it used to be.

Obama or McCain's first priority should be creating a diverse range of jobs for individuals of various education and skill levels. Job opportunities in differing job sectors have been declining across the board, and such improvements would be beneficial to the economy for current cities and potential immigrants. Outsourcing via legislation should be vastly reduced to keep jobs in various sectors, including declining blue collar jobs that are beneficial to both our citizens and immigrants.

These new jobs should be located in more urban areas where many Americans and immigrants alike are likely to live, so they are less dependant on cars and expensive gas to get to their jobs. Closer jobs would lead to less gas usage, which would presumably lead to less of a demand and lower gas prices. All of which would allow consumers to feel relief at the pump as the next administration works to wean us away from our dependence on foreign oil.

Although America boasts some of the finest institutions in the world, institutions at multiple levels should receive more funding to meet the demands of a globalizing economy. Strong investment in education, especially in math and science at the elementary through collegian level would give immigrants a stronas 76 percent of U.S. workers continue to commute to work – a number that has remained stagnant from 2000-2007. Most Americans, including immigrants, are limited in their choices of convenient transportation to get to their jobs, which are mostly in suburban areas requiring mobility. As the price of gas continues to increase, it's become harder for current immigrants to make ends meet, which might also be deterring immigration.

America, a country built on rugged individualism, the dream of prosperity and social mobility, would not be what it is today without immigration. However, this decline in immigration may not be as bad a predicament as it seems. America has the opportunity to choose a leader who can allay the woes of the public by enacting many monetary and fiscal policies to improve the economy – and hence improve immigration.

One the many things that should be top priority for the new president is the welfare of current American citizens. As much as America has been accommodating for immigration and the immersion ger incentive to immigrate to America and contribute their talents to help and stimulate our economy.

Although immigration has been declining in many areas of the country, both in popular immigration getaways and in other less populous locations, this situation can allow us to improve the nation's economical infrastructure from within. Improving the country by creating more jobs and providing more funding for education on all levels, as well keeping jobs here in America for ourselves, will help ease the concern of Americans and help reestablish ourselves as the land of opportunity and promise.

America must not forget what made it the land of success and must continue to try to attract and retain immigrants from all over the globe. The cultural melting pot as we know it will continue to simmer with various reforms and changes to the overall structure of the economy.

Legalizing the oldest profession

Shruti Sehgal

As an American expatriate, I have lived in six countries and visited countless more. Yet, the prospects of rape, physical violence or any threat from a man never lured me until I moved back to the United States for college. Trying to understand this circumstance, it dawned on me that I've also never lived in a country where prostitution is illegal. To most American college students, the relationship between these two revelations is unclear. I hope to change that.

Besides two counties in Nevada, prostitution is criminalized in the United States. Most Americans support this prohibition citing the sex trade as a dangerous and demeaning practice for women. Feminists in particular jump to a defensive that prostitution allows men to objectify women and abuse their bodies, and such allowances should be avoided. Other stances are based on assumptions that prostitution increases violent crimes, spreads sexually transmitted diseases including HIV/AIDS, and can tear families apart by leading men astray.

These concerns are understandable. But if they were empirically supported reasons, why is prostitution legal in developed and developing countries in every continent? Moreover, why does the United States possess more alleged prostitution-related social catastrophes such as violent crime, disease, and divorced families, than the countries that let prostitutes walk their street corners?

Part of the answer to these enquiries lies in one simple fact. It's the oldest profession in existence today and it will still exist tomorrow. Regardless of what the national law dictates, women in the United States do and will sell their bodies for money. Police records provide evidence – more than 80,000 prostitution-related arrests are filed annually. Somehow the sex trade still thrives with up to 100,000 American women illegally prostituting themselves each year. The attempt to uproot women from the sex trade seems to be an admirable but futile effort.

Many developed countries, including Canada, England and France have accepted this grim reality. But rather than engaging in a perpetual cat and mouse game, these nations regulate prostitution to curb negative externalities. Compelling governmental statistics on crime rate, HIV/AIDS deaths and divorce suggest that these nations are justified in doing so.

Countries with legalized prostitution, like France, Israel and Singapore, have a fraction of the per capita rape, murder and violent crime rates the United States has. England has less than half the number of reported rapes than the United States. Canada has half the number of murders. In an investigation conducted by the Liberator electronic magazine, the United States had the highest divorce rate when compared with 10 developed and democratic countries that have legalized prostitution. In the study, the United States also had the highest percentage of HIV/AIDS deaths.

Why does the United States possess more supposedly prostitute-related social catastrophes – violent crime, disease, divorced families – than the countries that do let prostitutes walk their street corners?

Prostitutes are attractive targets for physical abuse, rape, murder and robbery, because they work in dangerous areas or get into cars with strangers. Established red light districts in countries like Singapore give prostitutes safe locations to work in. Criminals often choose prostitutes for their victims because they know these women will not report them for fear of involvement in illegal activity. Legalization allows prostitutes to file complaints on pimps, criminals and customers without this worry. Ultimately, this dynamic provides safety for prostitutes, works to deter perpetrators from causing harm and helps the police capture criminals.

By mandating health regulations, legalized nations require prostitutes to receive STD tests and pelvic exams. Without legalization, prostitutes are free to act and do as they please without knowledge of their sexual systems. Medical examinations allow prostitutes to maintain good sexual health and receive treatments. These check-ups also help the state identify prostitutes with HIV/AIDS to prevent circulation.

Based on these ideas, the earlier feminist stance is easily refuted. Prostitutes who would otherwise be uncared for are provided with legal, health and safety benefits through legalization. Other American women also gain an advantage. Legalized prostitution decreases rape rates because more sexually frustrated men can fulfill their needs. According to a paper entitled "Prostitution and Sex Crimes" by Kirby R. Cundiff of Northeastern University, legalized prostitution in the United States would lead to a decrease of 25,000 rapes a year. In a controlled environment such as a brothel, prostitutes provide services to men so they are less inclined to prey on women.

The family-oriented critique can also be rejected because prostitution does not increase divorce rate. Here, common sense prevails. If a man wants to have an extramarital affair, he will have one whether or not prostitutes are available.

I realize that causations amongst anti-prostitution laws and various indicators cannot be pinpointed. While pro-prostitution arguments help explain the statistics, I can't prove that the patterns came about for my specified reasons. I can boast, however, empirically that legalized prostitution doesn't make countries any more dangerous or socially unstable than the United States is now.

As a final note, I want to assert that legalized prostitution provides so many benefits that political affiliations do not even factor into the controversy. The Republican residents of Churchill County in Nevada support prostitution. Iran's religious dictatorship allows men to have "temporary wives" akin to prostitutes. There is a brothel 30 minutes away from my house in authoritarian Singapore – and, as this articles suggests, for good reasons.

War, sex, conspiracies this weekend

Spike Lee hopes to bring his directorial talents to the war genre for the first time after his largest boxoffice hit "Inside Man."

Sam Rockwell stars as Victor a sex addict who chokes in restaurants so people will save him and then send him money after.

Indie and Blockbusters look for gold

By Kevin Koczwara
Collegian Staff

This weekend is full of Oscar-hopeful films, but the season will be slow compared to last year's fall lineup.

Directors Spike Lee ("Inside Man"), Fernando Meirelles ("City of God"), authors Chuck Palahniuk ("Fight Club") and Jose Saramago (Nobel Prize Winner in 1998), and actor Shia LaBeouf ("Disturbia") each have a new movie opening this weekend, and are counting their fingers for a box-office smash.

Miracle at St. Anna

This Spike Lee Joint is far away from Lee's hometown of New York City. The film takes place in Italy during World War II, and is Lee's imposing tribute to the unknown of the past that neglected the African American contribution to the great war of the century. The story is based on the novel by James McBride, who also wrote the screen for the film. Set 'God in Harry' division becomes trapped in a small Tuscan Village when the German SS officers surrounded Italian civilians. One of the soldiers saves a young boy from the massacre and the unit must work on to save themselves.

Shooting a war movie in Italy is foreign territory to Lee. Like many of his other films, Lee struggled with finances and tried to make due with what he had. The movie features a strong cast, including Joseph Gordon-Levitt and John Leguizamo.

Blindness

Based on the critically acclaimed novel, "Blindness" is the story of an unnamed city inexplicably overcome with a mass epidemic of blindness.

The novel followed a select group of characters banding together to overcome the epidemic.

One of the main characters, a doctor, is mysteriously free of the ominous virus. The government tries to control the situation as the city unravels.

The book was written by Nobel Prize winning author Jose Saramago, and adapted by Don McKellar ("The Red Violin").

The movie is directed by acclaimed director Fernando Meirelles ("The Constant Gardner," "City of God") and stars Julianne Moore ("Magnolia," "Children of Men") and Mark Ruffalo ("Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind").

Mark Ruffalo and Julianne Moore try to bring a novel to life in "Blindness."

Eagle Eye

Shia LaBeouf tries to prove that he is box-office gold with the thriller, "Eagle Eye." The film's premises are far-fetched. In fact, it's nearly impossible to explain where it will go. The movie is about two people, LaBeouf and Michelle Monaghan, becoming America's Most Wanted because they are constantly being set-up by a mysterious woman on the telephone.

They are tracked and controlled by this voice that saves their lives but also gets them into trouble. If they don't listen to the voice, they will be caught and interrogated by the FBI.

The movie is directed by DJ Caruso, who struck it rich with LaBeouf with the release of, "Disturbia." Written by a slew of people, the film has a powerful cast, including Rosario Dawson ("Clerks II," "Sin City") and Billy Bob Thornton ("Sling Blade," "Bad Santa").

Shia LaBeouf tries to become the next blockbuster star this fall in the thriller, "Eagle Eye," a story about two people are stalked by a mysterious woman on a phone.

Choke

First-time director Clark Gregg reveals his adaption of Chuck Palahniuk's hit novel about a sex addict, named Victor, who chokes on food at expensive restaurants.

Choking Victor (Sam Rockwell) is saved by a fellow patron who becomes his hero, and sends Victor checks due to the grief and heroism he undergoes.

In turn, Victor pays for his mother's (Angelica Huston) hospital bills with the checks he received.

In order to get his point across, Gregg will attempt to capture the sardonic humor Palahniuk uses in his far-fetched novel. Huston is expected to bring a fair amount of dry humor to the table in addition to Rockwell's talent.

Washington Post reporter brings out true Cheney

Tim Rutten
Los Angeles Times

If you decide to reorganize your library, it probably won't take much of a shelf to accommodate all your vice-presidential biographies.

There are, of course, plenty of books about men who served as vice presidents: John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Theodore Roosevelt, Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson, among others, come easily to mind. Their stories, however, tend to focus on what happened before and after their occupancy of the nation's second-highest executive office.

Barton Gellman's carefully reported and vigorously written account of Dick Cheney's role in George W. Bush's administration, "Angler: The Cheney Vice Presidency," is unique because the subject and his conduct in office are singular. No previous vice president has wielded the sort of influence and exercised the sort of power Cheney has for most of the past eight years. It seems likely, in fact, that many perhaps most of the policies and initiatives for which President Bush will be remembered originated with Cheney and his hand-picked, like-minded, fiercely loyal staff.

The general outlines of Gellman's account of what ought to be called the Bush-Cheney administration will be familiar to anyone who follows national news closely, because the book grew out of a series of Pulitzer Prize-winning reports the author and then-partner Jo Becker produced for The Washington Post. Arranging those reports in narrative fashion, however, creates valuable clarity and perspective and enables Gellman to supplement his reportage with information gleaned by Post colleague Bob Woodward, The New York Times' Eric Lichtblau and The New Yorker's Jane Mayer and Sy Hersh.

The Cheney who emerges from Gellman's portrait is something rare in American politics: a man who systematically sought power because he was ambitious for his ideas rather than himself. Indeed, despite all the muttering about Cheney's connections to his former employer Halliburton, and to the oil and gas industries, Gellman shows conclusively that he never profited from either. In other words, in an era and setting, in which venal self-dealing is virtually a given, Cheney's record is free of taint.

What the vice president appears to have been after was the power to redirect a national government he believed he had watched go badly astray while serving as chief of staff to President Ford. The legislative and judicial restraints imposed on the imperial presidency in the post-Vietnam War period were, in Cheney's estimation, a fundamental historical mistake. That impression was reinforced when he re-entered government as President George H.W. Bush's secretary of Defense. In the years after that, Cheney found a theory to fit his conclusions: the so-called Unitary Executive concept popular among members of the conservative Federalist Society, and seems to have conceived a method by which it could be implemented: stealth.

As Gellman sketches things, Cheney assigned by George W. Bush to vet his vice-presidential hopefuls, made the process so bureaucratically burdensome for the obvious candidates that the choice fell naturally and effortlessly on him. In this, as in the years ahead, the vice president functioned as the "ultimate staff man": the powerfully knowledgeable insider, pulling unseen levers with an invisible hand. He also made sure that he salted the incoming administration's departments and agencies with well-situated loyalists and helped select a presidential staff that was less experienced and assertive than his own.

And he did it all without leaving tracks. As Gellman writes:

"Cheney, at bottom, did not prioritize secrecy for fear of embarrassment. Neither his advisers nor their advice embarrassed him. Cheney favored stealth, in part, because it gave him practical advantages. ... It was easier to win a battle when the opponents did not show up. For the vice president, however, there was a much larger question of principle at stake.

"In Cheney's estimation, a president's authority was close to absolute within his rightful sphere. ... Cheney believed that the president's inherent functions: command of the Army and Navy, direction of the Cabinet, execution of the law, were indivisible. Exercise of those powers was beyond the reach, in principle, of legislative or judicial review."

All-around effort

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

At first glance, the success of the Massachusetts field hockey team could be attributed to the team's revamped offense up front and lockdown defense in the back. The team's backbone, however, lies somewhere in the middle.

The midfield of the Minutewomen was the team's most experienced and successful unit coming into the season. Seniors Mary Shea and Erin Parker along with sophomore Makaela Potts encompass the talented unit that does not make headlines, but is vital in producing wins.

In addition to sharing the same position, however, the three share a title: captain.

"[Erin and Mary] work tirelessly every single game and every single practice," Sowry said. "You can rely on them to be there. They're never going to have a bad game. So, they're part of the engine room of this group."

Potts is currently tied for fourth on the team with five points but is by far the leader in shots with 23. Though only a sophomore, Potts is one of the team's smartest and most balanced players, providing leadership to an inexperienced defense.

"Makaela is versatile, she could play from fullback position to a forward position," Sowry said. "Having such a young defense, we needed someone with great knowledge, and she carries that all over the field."

It's easy to overlook the midfielders contributions with the successes of younger players such as sophomore forward Katie Kelly, freshman goalkeeper Aleshia Widdall and sophomore defender Jaime Bouranzeris. It's particularly easy to overlook a player when they focus on defense in the midfield and take few shots on offense like Shea, who has only registered one point so far this season.

"That's the game of field hockey," Shea said. "That's what people see, scoring goals and people may not understand the defensive end as much, so it doesn't get as recognized."

Parker, meanwhile, has a more attack-oriented style and has been able to put points up on the board. She is currently second on the team in points with nine and first in assists with three. She understands, however, that she and her teammates must adjust their play as newer players come in.

"I would say that we're more versatile this year, so our role has to be more versatile," Parker said. "But it's definitely a benefit, even though we have been changing, it's in a better direction."

Parker, Shea and Potts have led the team to an outstanding start. At the end of Wednesday's practice, the players could be heard chanting "Parker, Parker, Parker," as the team wrapped up the day's session.

In addition to the midfield, one of the team's unheralded stars is senior forward Katelyn Orlando. "KO" is currently tied for fourth on the team with two goals, one of which was the game-winner against Vermont.

"Katelyn, on the forward line, her work rate is phenomenal," Sowry said. "She produces so many turnovers, she's vocal, she's aggressive, she's energetic and she's definitely a reason why we've been successful."

Cher King has scored only one goal so far this season for the Minutewomen, but has played an intricate part in setting up the UMass offense this season.

UMass to take on Syracuse

In the Great Danes, UMass faces a team with a powerful offense that takes a lot of shots early on in games, 60 percent of them being on goal. In comparison, UMass shoots just over 50 percent of its shots on goal.

The playing style of Albany is centered on speed, aggression and break-away opportunities while the Minutewomen have scored most of their goals off corners. The Great Danes have no goals this season off of corners. A weak point the Maroon and White should look to exploit is the fact that Albany tapers off in the second half and scores less goals, yet has a stout defense.

Even so, opposing teams have scored on the Danes 10 more times in the second half than in the first.

Albany gets most of its goals from a strong midfield, led by seniors Michele Poltons (seven goals) and Michelle Simpson (three goals and seven assists).

Senior goalkeeper Ashley Ross leads the Great Dane defense, starting in eight games this season and amassing 43 saves. Albany is a young team, though. Ten of 17 total players are either sophomores or freshmen.

The inexperience is felt in the back line, with only two true defenders listed on the team. UMass should look to be relentless against a defense that has allowed 60 percent of shots faced, go on goal.

Syracuse is an entirely different team. With the strength in recruiting that the Orange has, four international players are on the team, three of which have scored multiple goals this season.

The Minutewomen will face an experienced midfield in Syracuse, led by senior Shannon Taylor (10 goals and six assists).

The Orange have incredible depth at every position, with at least eight players on both the forward and back lines.

Senior goalkeeper Heather Hess is a force between the pipes, tallying 36 saves with a 0.84 goals-against average in eight games this season.

"This weekend will present a whole new set of challenges," said Sowry about the quality of the Minutewomen's opponents this weekend. "In terms of player-for-player, the individual skill levels that these teams have are some of the best in the country."

They are some of the best players in the country, and Syracuse has beaten one of the best team's in the country this season, defeating No.1 Maryland, 2-1.

Syracuse's 48 total goals this season dwarf the Minutewomen's total of 16.

The focal point in this contest will be the defensive corps of each team. There is little difference in the goals-allowed-per-game total between Syracuse (0.75) and UMass (1.0).

With sophomore fullback Jackie Tait healthy, the Minutewomen have an increasingly-improving back line and the players are learning each other's tendencies more and more with each practice.

"Because these are two tough teams, we're doing everything that we can to prepare," said Tait of how practice went this past week.

"We get free time during practice to work on individual [skills] so I'm definitely working on some things. We definitely have started getting a lot more with all the practicing and all the repetition we've been doing. We've really started working together well."

The Minutewomen will have to play to their strengths and not break the rhythm that the team has worked to attain with all of this year's new faces.

In her first year as a Minutewoman, junior transfer Jill Powers is tied for second on the team for goals with three.

Passing the ball effectively will be crucial for UMass against the up-tempo playing style of the Orange.

Also, execution on penalty corners is a must for the Maroon and White. The Minutewomen have done well with confusing opposing teams with their tactics off corners and the strong shooting skills of UMass will be tested in each game this weekend.

Sophomore midfielder Kelsey Anderson and the Minutewomen have struggled with injuries this season, but have managed a respectable 2-1-2 record thus far.

Flexibility vital to win

Field. Rudy compares the field to something a club team would play on because it's much smaller than most collegiate soccer stadiums.

Last year, the Owls tied Saint Louis at home, despite being much weaker statistically.

However, he prefers it much more than the astro-turf stadium in downtown Philadelphia.

Temple plays much of its defense from midfield. On some possessions, the Owls won't play defense to get a head start on offense because of the small field.

Another thing UMass will have to get used to is the frequent substitution patterns Temple makes. Rudy said the team will play its entire roster and swap several players in at a time without having to do too much adjusting.

"[The Owls] sub more than a subway system," Rudy said, referring to their substitution pattern. "They don't really lose a level of competence when they do that."

If UMass expects to be successful this weekend, Rudy believes the defense will need to stop the occasional deep ball that finds its way into the net.

"We're playing really good defense," Rudy said. "It's just those occasional ones where someone pops in on a long one."

The Minutewomen witnessed that situation against Providence where a shot deflected inside the net and gave the Friars the only goal they would need to clinch the victory.

Minutewomen must deal with adversity

With injuries to key players, UMass has to be creative on the field

By David Branch

Lima doubtful, Ruggles set to return

The Massachusetts women's soccer team will be without one key midfielder while welcoming another back today against St. Bonaventure.

Redshirt senior Vanessa Lima will most likely miss the Minutewomen's (3-2-2) Atlantic-10 opener scheduled for noon at Rudd Field with a high hamstring pull, according to UMass coach Jim Rudy.

"It started with a little something, and then it twanged the other day. I think it's going to be longer [rather] than shorter," Rudy said.

UMass Soccer

Lima is third on the team in scoring with three points and has been successful on both sides of the ball. If she's out for an extended period of time, however, the Minutewomen will need someone to compliment senior forward Vanessa Patry as a team leader and force on offense.

"We don't have that second impacting frontrunner right now to go with Patry," Rudy said.

"A second impacting frontrunner is going to move their defense, create havoc and create space for both of them to get in and get people from behind, and with Lima out, we don't have that, so it's a work in progress."

With Lima probably out against the Bonnies (5-3-0), Rudy will look to get production from either freshman forward Natalie Muka or junior forward Cristina Adams on the offensive side of the ball.

"They both bring differences because if you use one, you set the team up for the other one," Rudy said.

Muka has played in all seven games but has not recorded a point despite taking six shots. She has provided a spark off the bench for Rudy, including her corner kick that found Patry in the overtime win against Holy Cross on Sept. 14. Adams has had one goal in seven games, including one start and is more experienced in the third offensive role.

The Maroon and White also got some good news this week with the return of midfielder Katie Ruggles from a wrist injury.

With the junior playing either defense or offense on the left side of the field, the adjustment will allow sophomore midfielder Therese Smith more opportunities on offense. Having Smith around the net has been beneficial for UMass, as she scored two goals in a win over Albany on Sept. 17.

"Ruggles changes a lot of stuff because it means we can use her at left back or at left midfield either way," Rudy said.

"It means Collins can stay in the back or move up the left midfield or give us an extra central mid."

UMass hits road

After today's game, the Minutewomen will travel to Philadelphia to face Temple team that's undefeated at home, on Sunday at 1 p.m.

While most teams fly across the country to compete in road games, UMass will trek by bus to the City of Brotherly Love for their game on Sunday.

"One issue is playing here, then driving all the way down there and playing the next day," Rudy said.

"They are coming back from Xavier, but they're flying, so there's a big difference."

The Owls (2-5-1) have only traveled out of state one time this season, going to College Park to face Maryland on Sept. 7.

The Minutewomen have played five games out of state, which is something Rudy feels his team must play through, especially with their next home game coming on Oct. 10 against Xavier.

"I think we have the tougher travel schedule. It's a five hour trip and I'd rather fly, but we're going to try to make the best of it," Rudy said.

Senior captain Melissa Toulouse has displayed her leadership on the field, guiding the UMass defense to two straight wins including a shutout over Bryant.

Conference matches set to begin today

Postseason path, division importance

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy should know exactly how little the non-conference record means when its goal is to make the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The Minutewomen went into last year's conference schedule undefeated and had a very good chance of qualifying for the A-10 Tournament. That was until UMass lost Meghan Gould and Sydney Stoll to injuries.

Those setbacks plagued the Minutewomen for the remainder of the season, finishing ninth in the conference with a 4-6-1 A-10 record.

This season, UMass is battling even more injuries, but it has managed to stay in every game against its opponents. Rudy stopped short of saying the non-conference schedule doesn't matter, calling it "an extension of the pre-season."

Coming off a loss to Providence, the Minutewomen will have their first A-10 test of the season against St. Bonaventure today at Rudd Field before hitting the road to face Temple on Sunday. Their history against either team is lopsided, with a combined 22-5 record.

UMass hasn't played the Bonnies (5-3) since Oct. 2, 2005. The Minutewomen won that meeting, 2-0. Last year, St. Bonaventure won five games all season. Two of those were against A-10 opponents.

The Owls (5-4-1) weren't any better with their lone conference win against Dayton, 2-1, on Oct. 26.

The Bonnies got even younger than they were last season with 11 freshmen on the Hornies' entire roster. They have two juniors and return no seniors.

St. Bonaventure's youth earned them a 12th place spot in the A-10 Preseason Coaches' Poll, but its non-conference record thus far indicates a much improved team. The Bonnies are currently on a three-game winning streak.

What St. Bonaventure lacks in experience, they make up for in talent. Sophomore Anna Cunningham is the top offensive weapon in the A-10, leading the league in points (15) and goals (6).

Rudy believes that the key to the game is not necessarily stopping her, but knowing where she is on the field at all times.

"She's good because she has a supporting cast in there," Rudy said.

The challenge for the Minutewomen will be keeping the other two forwards (Tori Berchett and Courtney Bosse) in check so that Cunningham is not set up for an easy scoring opportunity. The forwards have a combined four assists this season.

"Bosse is a really good speed package – fast as hell," Rudy said.

Temple will challenge the Maroon and White with a significant home-field advantage at Ambler.

Vanessa Parry and the Minutewomen take on St. Bonaventure and Temple starting today. These matches are important if UMass wants to make it to the postseason.

The Massachusetts field hockey team led by Erin Parker are set to face No. 18 Albany and No. 2 Syracuse this weekend. Parker has tallied three goals and three assists so far this season.

Tough test ahead for Minutewomen

BY MIKE GELMINSTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend will be the biggest test of the 2008 regular season for the Massachusetts field hockey team as it faces No.18 Albany on Saturday and No.2 Syracuse on Sunday.

The Minutewomen (6-2) host the Great Danes (5-4) tomorrow at 12 p.m. and the Orange (8-0) at 1 p.m. on Sunday.

These are two teams that UMass would likely see in the NCAA tournament, should it make the tournament. UMass coach Justine Sowry wants to treat this weekend as a tournament situation, playing the first game against Albany as if the Minutewomen will be eliminated with a loss.

Because of the lengthy weekend schedule, Sowry didn't work the team as hard conditioning-wise during practice. Instead, she focused on situation plays and lineups.

"At the moment, with Albany, we've specifically looked at some of their strengths and how we're going to counteract that," Sowry said of the team's preparation for the game on Saturday. "We looked at our previous games and there are a couple of areas where players are combining in units that need a little more communication and sorting out."

Car, train crash

Amtrak's Vermonter line crashed into a woman's car this Friday afternoon in North Amherst. Delays amounted to one hour.

A southbound train struck a minivan with one female passenger at the Bridge Street intersection in North Amherst at approximately 1:40 p.m. Friday afternoon.

There were no injuries to the woman or anybody on the train according to Brendan Davis, who was working in the nearby Cushman Market at the time of the incident.

Davis said he looked up to see a grey minivan in a ditch on the far side of the tracks with smoke coming from the hood. He said although the train goes by fairly often, he looked up this time because the train was slowing down, whereas it usually travels by between 50 and 60 miles per hour.

Davis said he immediately went outside to check on the drivers. He saw people milling in front of and behind the car on their cell phones. He then saw the woman get out of the car and begin walking around the scene.

"I looked in the car to make sure it was empty, she was really flustered, she was like, 'Oh my

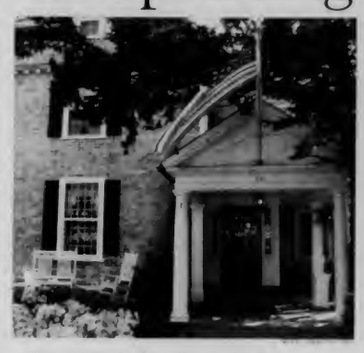
The enchanting, colonial style Lord Jeffery Inn has housed guests for over 80 years. Built in 1926 with 48 guest rooms, the inn also includes Elijah Boltwood's tavern, where one can overlook the hidden garden while eating meals concocted purely from scratch. Located in the heart of Amherst Common, guests can stroll down Boltwood Avenue or visit one of the five colleges, located minutes away from the inn itself. Ranked seventh of 11 Inns in Amherst, this bed and breakfast owned by Amherst College will soon undertake a major renovation.



Some 20 million dollars will be spent on the project, with half the expenses going toward construction and the other half towards renovation. The college had no problem getting approval for the renovation from the town of Amherst, but it didn't get any funding from the town either.

Spokesperson for Amherst College Caroline Hanna said, "Amherst College felt it was time to make the Lord Jeffery Inn more eco-friendly, modern and accessible while preserving its history and charm as well."

The inn plans to renovate the main part of the building and replace the Street Spring Wing, which will include a new ballroom. There will be an addition of 25 more bedrooms, several small function rooms and a fitness room. Photovoltaic panels on the inn's south-facing roofs will generate electricity from the sun. There will be energy-efficient windows, improved insulation and healthier indoor air quality for ventilation.

The landscaping will use local, reusable materials for construction, minimizing the need for irrigation. More importantly, a ground source heat pump will be used, which will run on geother-

Maresco was not the only athlete involved. Aiyeku was a UMass football player and Vaz played football and basketball at Commerce High School in Springfield.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team had a no goal, double-overtime weekend, to finish in last place as the host for the UMass Classic this past weekend.

The Minutemen (2-4-2) lost on Friday afternoon to Hartford, 1-0, in double overtime. Hartford finished the weekend 1-1-0 to tie Vermont (0-0-2) for second place. Rhode Island took the tournament title after it beat Hartford, 1-0, on Sunday and tied Vermont, 0-0, on Friday.

On Sunday afternoon the Minutemen tied Vermont in double overtime, 0-0. This weekend showed the Minutemen that they struggle getting the ball in the back of the net. The Minutemen had numerous chances throughout the match, taking 14 shots to Vermont's 13, but were unable to finish on any of them.

UMass started out Sunday's game strong, using the sides of the field and increasing ball movement past Vermont, but it wasn't enough for the Minutemen to come out of the weekend with a win.

Both teams played an aggressive game. Vermont totaled 12 fouls to UMass' eight, taking turns dominating play, but toward the middle of the second half it looked like UMass would take the lead. Mark DeSantis took a corner kick to an open Stuart Thompson who headed the ball towards the left post, but Vermont's goalkeeper, Roger Scully, caught the shot. ## Zip car extention to pick up residents

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As of Wednesday Oct. 1, Amherst town residents who are Zipcar members are permitted use the Zipcars on the Amherst College campus.

The college started using the Zipcar program at the beginning of the 2006 school year. While originally only having two Toyota Priuses, the school will add to its fleet due to expected increase in demand now that the service will be available to more people.

"Part of the plan is to add another car," said Amherst College Police Chief John Carter.

There are 279 members registered to use the Zipcars at Amherst College, and they are well-used on the campus.

"Encompassing both vehicles, there are usually between 400 and 600 hours a month that are reserved," said Carter.

Amherst College had invested in the program two years ago in hopes that the cars would lessen the demand for parking on campus, that students without cars would have access to a vehicle and carbon emissions and pollution from the school would be lessened.

"The college provides a guarantee of a certain amount of money," said Carter. "If the cars are rented, then there is no cost to the college."

According to the police chief, the cars are rented out everyday, so there should be no financial burden on the school.

The Amherst College Zipcar fleet currently includes two Toyota Priuses. The plan is to add more as residents start requesting them.

Finn still taught carefully

By Kate Farrish
The Hartford Courant

In the "Adventures of Huckleberry Finn," the title character and Jim complete a harrowing journey down the Mississippi River, but their story continues to hit snags and obstacles today.

The book has been banned frequently since its publication in 1885. At first, libraries censored it because author Mark Twain didn't use proper English, then because Huck's cheating and lying made him a poor role model for boys, said Craig Hotchkiss, manager of education programs at the Mark Twain House and Museum in Hartford.

Since the late 1950s, the novel has been pulled from school shelves across the country because of objections to racial stereotypes and Twain's use of the word "nigger" more than 200 times.

Nine months ago, the school system in Manchester, Conn., began navigating the choppy waters of teaching Twain's most admired and vilified book. School officials temporarily removed the novel from the approved list of books at Manchester High School after a parent complained about the frequent use of "nigger." The book, according to the complaint, is demeaning to blacks, and, therefore, unfit to be taught in school.

The person who complained could not be reached for comment.

The book was being taught in two honors classes without supplementary essays to provide context about racial themes, school officials said. Now, after months of study, the school system is training 11 high school teachers in how to teach the novel in a broader context that includes discussions of Twain's era, satire, white privilege, diversity and social change, said Ann Richardson, assistant superintendent for curriculum and instruction, to the Board of Education on Monday.

The teachers are to receive two days of training before bringing the book back to classes in October. A note will be sent home to parents alerting them that the book will be taught, and students can choose not to participate in the lesson plan.

"Huckleberry Finn" uses the colloquial speech of the 19th century to tell the story of a white runaway boy, whose view of blacks evolves during his travels with an escaped slave, Jim. Experts say Twain intended the book as satire, poking fun at racial stereotypes, but some African-Americans find the book offensive.

"It is a complicated, problematic and sometimes painful book to read," said Kerry Driscoll, chairwoman of the English department at St. Joseph College in West Hartford.

Huck spouts the stereotypes about blacks he has heard growing up, but as he travels with Jim, he learns that all his assumptions are wrong.

"The book is about transcending racism on a one-on-one basis through the development of a friendship," Driscoll said. "What better book to read?"

Educators still tred lightly when it comes to Mark Twain's classic. Teachers cite issues of race and say many cannot handle the racial dialogue.

the surroundings in which Emily Dickinson grew up.

"I thought it was a really great film," said visitor Julia Metzidakis. "I really didn't know a ton about her life. It told you about the area during her life, both in the bedroom and outside in her community."

Metzidakis, University of Massachusetts alumna, was in the area from Somerville for the weekend and noticed the events on the museum Web site.

"I never had the time to go when I went to school here, so I figured this would be a good opportunity," said Metzidakis.

During the marathon reading, visitors were seated in a circle and read from "Poems from Emily Dickinson," which was edited by R.W. Franklin.

"It is the most recent edition, so it is considered the most accurate and most complete," said Dickinson.

The marathon reading is an annual event that typically takes 16 hours to finish. It was not planned to stop until 11 p.m. Last year, there were close to 80 people who came to read.

"We are on number 660 now, and we started this morning at about 7 a.m.," said volunteer Burleigh Muten at 2:00 p.m.

The readers were a varied group of fans. There were plenty of people of all ages and from different areas.

"I know we have a couple in the reading from Canada," said Dickinson. "I would guess that most people are from the area though."

While some visitors heard about the event through the Web sites, others are much closer to hear the news.

"I've lived in Amherst for 35 years," said visitor Mary Wentworth who lives nearby the museum.

Staff and visitors celebrated the fifth anniversary of the Emily Dickinson museum on Saturday.

"The first time I came to the house was about 12 years ago when a graduate student held a six-week seminar here on Emily Dickinson's poetry. We even used the same dictionary as Emily Dickinson."

Wentworth read about the event through the newspaper last week, though she has been a fan of the museum since her seminar.

"I keep an eye out for what goes on here because it is such a wonderful thing," Wentworth said.

The museum was opened five years ago, using both the Homestead that Emily Dickinson grew up in, as well as the Evergreens, the home next door that her brother lived in. Though originally two separate museums, Amherst College brought them together in 2003. The museum is located on Main Street in Amherst.

"We have been very pleased with the turnout today," said Dickinson. "It is hard to estimate, but I wouldn't be surprised if we have 350 people."

mal energy. The $1 million spent on these energy-efficient improvements alone will make the inn one of the greenest inns in the country.

It is expected that the improvements will pay for themselves overtime with lower energy bills.

"Three major goals of the Lord Jeff project are to enhance the quality of services, increase room capacity, and provide much-needed function space," Hanna said. "Since the capital investment needed to achieve these goals increases overhead costs, the profitability of the inn is not projected to change."

Many believe that the inn will enhance the downtown district and Amherst College by attracting more tourists, businesspeople and the parents of college students.

"Since the upgraded Lord Jeff will have more space for large gatherings, the hope is that the inn will attract more conferences and events to Amherst and more tourism for the town as a result," Hanna added.

On Sept. 17, 2008, the work began with the setting up of construction fences, site clearing, tree removal and well drilling. Once the site work is completed within 6-to-8 weeks, the immediate renovation of the inn is anticipated to begin on Nov. 9, 2008. It will reopen in spring of 2010.

Although the current employees of the inn will not be needed during the renovation process, the former workers will be encouraged to reapply once the inn reopens.

No one injured despite car's jumping Amtrak railroad

God, I can't believe that just happened," he said.

Davis said police, followed by a two ambulances and a fire truck came by three or four minutes afterwards.

In his estimation, the train had struck the back bumper of the minivan after it had partially passed over the track and then was spun around, smashing the passenger side, where he observed most of the damage was.

"Part of the complication may have been the train was coming form the north, most of the time comes from the south, the Vermonter ... if she had seen the flashing lights she may have looked at to the right and not seen [the train]," said Davis.

The two Amherst crossings, at Bridge Street and Pine Street, about 200 feet from each other, both use flashing and chiming signals rather than gates, to alert cars of an oncoming train.

It was also raining at the time of the incident.

Davis said in the past few days every train has been coming to a complete stop at each crossing and sounding signals before crossing slowly and continuing.

Amherst Police Department could not be contacted in time for printing. The case is under investigation.

because of how easy they are to use. Membership can be gained by going online to zipcar.com to register and then going online to reserve the car anytime that it is needed.

Amherst College faculty, staff and students can become members for a yearly rate of $35. After that, it costs $8 an hour or $68 a day. Residents of Amherst can become members for the regular rate of $50 a year.

These prices cover insurance, gas and reserved parking. Members must be at least 21 years old, to the chagrin of underclassmen.

As for the cars, there is no extra cost to the college. The company provides the cars and takes care of any problems that occur with the vehicles.

"They are very good at maintaining them," said Carter. "There have been a few fender-benders, but Zipcar fixes them immediately."

The idea for Zipcars came about in 1999, and in June of 2000, the company had the first cars out. Today, the company has 5,500 cars and 225,000 members using them. They have also won multiple awards every year since the startup.

According to the Web site, the vision for the company is to "provide reliable and convenient access to on-demand transportation, complementing other means of mobility."

Zipcars also provide a green alternative for the residents who want to be environmentally friendly. The cars on the Amherst College campus are gas-electric hybrids. According to the company Web site, estimates show that for every one Zipcar 14 privately owned vehicles are eliminated, reducing carbon emissions.

Spots are reserved for zip cars on the Tufts University Campus. Amherst College is now sharing their resources with the town.

Students at Amherst College should not worry about what the possible increase of users will do to the availability of the vehicles, though. If the program is successful, officials say there will be more cars to go around.

"If usage indicates popularity, then Zipcars will add more vehicles," said Carter.

Harvard pulls calorie cards

University says too much info for anorexics

By Melody Y. Hu
Harvard Crimson

After students and parents raised concerns about displayed calorie counts leading to or worsening eating disorders, Harvard University Dining Services removed the index cards detailing nutritional information from dining halls this year.

HUDS spokeswoman Crista Martin said several students and families asked HUDS to consider the impact of making detailed nutritional information known to students.

"The feeling was that for people who have eating disorders or who struggle with issues around the literal value of food, the emphasis on nutrition information does not always lead people to eat in a healthy manner," Martin said.

A committee of representatives from HUDS, the Bureau of Study Counsel, Harvard University Health Services and the College met over the summer to discuss the issue.

"The decision was made that we needed to review the policy based on some of the inquiries from students, the concerns about eating disorders, and what we were doing to support those students in the dining hall," Martin said.

Executive director Ted A. Mayer said on the HUDS blog this week that the dining services needs to address "the challenge a quiet and surprisingly large contingent of our community faces with eating disorders."

"Those individuals can place an undue emphasis on calories and other literal food values, making their placement over every food item a real challenge," he wrote. "We did what we felt best addressed the special health needs of those individuals."

Although the nutritional information, which included number of calories, serving size, grams of fat, and grams of carbohydrates, is no longer displayed alongside the food, students can still look up the nutritive analysis either on the Internet or in kiosks in the dining halls.

In addition to making nutritional information available at the kiosks, HUDS will continue to promote healthy eating among students through forums and information session, Martin said.

"We are talking about the benefits of foods as opposed to talking about their literal caloric breakdown," she said.

Senators Obama and McCain face off

By Michael D. Shear and Shailagh Murray
The Washington Post

OXFORD, Miss. — Sen. Barack Obama sharply criticized Sen. John McCain's judgment on the war in Iraq, repeatedly telling his presidential rival "you were wrong" to rush the nation into battle, directly challenging the Republican nominee on foreign policy as the two met in their first debate of the general-election season.

McCain aggressively pushed back, accusing Obama of failing to understand that a new approach employed by Gen. David Petraeus in Iraq would lead to victory and mocking him as naive for his willingness to meet with some of the world's most brutal leaders.

With 40 days remaining before Election Day and the U.S. economy teetering, the two clashed on taxes, energy policy, Russian aggression in Georgia and the threat posed by Iran. Neither made a serious mistake in an encounter that capped one of the most chaotic weeks of the campaign, nor was either able to claim a decisive victory.

The debate itself almost did not happen. McCain's dramatic mid-week announcement that he was suspending his campaign to focus on the nation's financial crisis left the face-off in limbo as both candidates rushed back to Washington on Thursday and plunged themselves into the acrimonious negotiations over a $700 billion economic bailout.

On Friday, McCain reversed his pledge to stay in Washington until those negotiations concluded. And once on stage at the University of Mississippi, it was the exchanges about how to keep the United States safe that put the starkest differences between the two men on display.

"Senator Obama said the 'surge' could not work, said it would increase sectarian violence, said it was doomed to failure," McCain said, focusing on recent improvements in conditions in Iraq. "But yet, after conceding that, he still says that he would oppose the surge if he had to decide that again today."

"John, you like to pretend like the war started in 2007," the senator from Illinois shot back. "The war started in 2003."

In rapid-fire succession, Obama accused his rival of being in the wrong as President Bush led the nation to war in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"You said we knew where the weapons of mass destruction were. You were wrong. You said that we were going to be greeted as liberators. You were wrong. You said that there was no history of violence between Shia and Sunni. And you were wrong."

Later, McCain's voice dripped with derision as he questioned Obama's statement that he would meet with the leaders of rogue foreign countries, including Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"So let me get this right. We sit down with Ahmadinejad, and he says, 'We're going to wipe Israel off the face of the Earth,' and we say, 'No, you're not?'" the senator from Arizona said, as Obama tried to object.

Obama pushed back on McCain's criticism, saying, "I reserve the right, as president of the United States, to meet with anybody at a time and place of my choosing if I think it's going to keep America safe."

In the opening moments of the debate Friday night, Obama and McCain immediately discarded the scheduled topic of foreign affairs and waded into a discussion of the nation's financial crisis, with both saying they are optimistic that Congress will agree on a financial bailout plan in the coming days.

The Republican nominee said bipartisanship would carry the day. "We have finally seen Republicans and Democrats sitting down and negotiating together and coming up with a package," McCain said.

Obama laid out his own priorities for the federal bailout plan before framing his fire on McCain, linking him to the unpopular president.

Push came to shove in a hot debate between presidential candidates Barack Obama and John McCain.

Preparation v. education

Nick O'Malley

While college students tend to forget their first 12 years of education in favor of four years of glorious university life, the primary education system in this country remains an issue.

If college students are aware of any issue in the primary school system, it's the intense pressures that are involved in the college application process. Recommendations, GPAs and stress over admissions have dominated many a senior year. All the while, the students are told, "it's the best time you'll ever have."

Since we in the collegiate ranks have left high school, however, these issues have only grown. The standardized tests that seemed like a mere deviation from the usual schedule have become the norm in today's schools.

Spurred by the controversial No Child Left Behind Act, schools are shifting focus from socially-applicable learning to simple preparation for tests. This genius plan was only one of the questionable policies implemented by our ever popular Commander in Chief.

The No Child Left Behind Act puts an emphasis on tests like the MCAS in Massachusetts as a way to gauge and reward schools that perform well. However, with schools desperate for funding, their only option is to groom students for taking tests, rather than for lifelong learning.

The current goal isn't to educate students for the rest of their lives, it's to get them past standardized tests. Schools are cutting recess and other programs so that there's more time to teach students how to answer multiple choice questions and write a five paragraph essay.

Students today are learning how to answer, "expunge is to eliminate as initiate is to ____" instead of learning how to enjoy a book. Teachers are being forced to remove all of the joy from learning. Social skills and life lessons are being forgotten in favor of college preparation.

Students today are learning how to answer: "expunge is to eliminate as initiate is to ____," instead of learning how to enjoy a book.

Elementary school students are receiving more homework now than in the past, as part of recent attempts to improve standardized test scores. A report in the Boston Globe showed that some schools are adapting a "10 minute rule" for homework. Through the rule, which was cited by a Duke University Professor, first graders receive 10 minutes of homework each night, and as students advance, receive 10 more minutes per year.

Our current school system is looking at giving sixth graders an hour of homework each night. College professors would be ecstatic from a half hour on their subject. At this rate, many kids will get burnt out from learning by the time they reach high school.

Now, at first glance, elementary and high school students studying more would seem like a great thing. But is academic success worth the price of a childhood?

It's no wonder that there is a childhood obesity problem. We may blame fatty foods and video games for the lethargy of youths, but sending kids to spend all day in their studies is not a recipe for good health. Kids need to play and parents shouldn't have to get them away from the desks and off of the couch.

In addition, with the introduction of the computers and Internet into more and more homework, kids will become more acclimated to sitting in front of the computer screen. A third grader on the computer checking Facebook and playing Snood is not a benefit to anyone. Younger students shouldn't be chained inside when it's already nearly impossible for kids to get their necessary exercise.

Universities don't need robots. It's creativity and a good work ethic that lead to success in college. But the latter with former is useless unless there are a lot of students specifically looking for a job in a cubicle.

Your costly meal plan

Paul Payer

Students spend about 15 weeks a semester chowing down on Blue Wall burritos and shuffling through the lines at Berkshire. Depending on what plan they choose, students pay up to $2,090 a semester to make use of dining services at the University of Massachusetts.

Although criticisms could be levied against the residential meal plan for its high cost, it would be quite unfair when considering the cost and quality of comparable meal plans from other universities as well as the fact that students are able to get quite a bit of food for their swipe.

Rather, it is the inexcusable exploitation of student's money facilitated by the University's Your Campus Meal Plan program which warrants the most public attention and criticism. Students are charged $1,800 a semester to participate in the program, which credits 200 "flex swipes" to the participant's UCard. Each flex swipe is valued at $7.75 and can be used at the numerous retail outfits around campus.

Upon first glance it seems like a decent alternative to the monotony of the dining commons, but it doesn't take an economics major to deduce that the cost of each swipe, multiplied by the number of swipes, does not add up to the $1,800 charged by Dining Services. In fact, it adds up to $1,550, meaning that Dining Services profits at least $250 on each student who enrolls in the program.

Furthermore, Dining Services collects the difference between the amount of money you spend with a swipe and the $7.75 value of that swipe. It is incredibly unlikely that every student will always spend exactly $7.75 on his or her purchase, and Dining Services stands to profit on any discrepancy resulting from such situations.

With a program that enrolls thousands of students, those dollar amounts accumulate rapidly over the course of the semester, yet they are never acknowledged or addressed by the University or by Dining Services.

Another way to look at the issue would be to contrast the weekly cost of a meal plan with the cost of living without one and relying on, God forbid, groceries and personal cooking. In lieu of purchasing the 200-meal YCMP plan a student could operate upon a whopping $120 grocery bill each week. I personally do not know anybody who spends that much money on groceries and if they do, I'm sure stops to Liquors 44 and Spirit Haus are included during their trips to Big Y and Trader Joe's.

In lieu of purchasing the 200-meal YCMP plan a student could operate upon a whopping $120 grocery bill each week.

With that kind of change available each week, a student could eat out reasonably often at fairly decent restaurants. Even if a student had no interest outside the world of Pita Pit, they would still save hundreds of dollars by simply placing their dining budget on their UCard as a debit amount. Furthermore, one would never have to encounter the problem of having 32 swipes left with four days left of school, resulting in explanations to friends and family members about the six cases of Diet Coke and 86 bags of Lay's sour cream and onion potato chips. No matter how the issue is angled, YCMP simply represents poor budgeting and wastefulness.

On its Web site, Dining Services counters criticism of YCMP by pointing to the contributions it makes to this campus, such as offering employment to hundreds of students. For Dining Services to parade such contributions as somehow indicative of its goodwill to campus is truly an example of bureaucratic mismanagement and dishonesty. Dining Services may claim to invest a portion of its profits into student services, but such efforts are no less similar to a multimillionaire CEO donating $5,000 to a charity and spending $50,000 to advertise X goodwill.

It should be noted that the actual food available for purchase through the program is actually quite good. Students are offered a fair variety of choices ranging from the delicious new French Meadow Bakery sandwiches available in the Campus Center to all sorts of great snacks offered by the various student run businesses located on campus.

The awards and accolades Dining Services has received for the quality of food offered across campus are documented, and deservedly so. The cost of a residential meal plan ranges from $1,795 for a 224-meal option to $2,090 for an unlimited meal option. By every metric, these prices reflect a fair and accurate charge for the services offered in the Dining Commons around campus. It seems only logical that Dining Services should apply the same logic and methods in developing the cost of its other major meal plan program.

YCMP thrives not because it offers any convenience or value, but rather because the general population remains either unaware or unconcerned. When faced with a decision over what meal plan to choose next semester, students should consider the realities of the YCMP program before making an uninformed and potentially wasteful decision.

Google: everybody's big brother?

Ben Moriarty

Welcome to the Google information superhighway. For a Web site that is simply a white background with a search bar and occasionally a news oriented cartoon above it, Google has been making some serious headlines lately.

We must admit, though, that Google is more than just a blank and sometimes blindingly bright white page, and is, in fact, a twenty-something billion dollar company which brought in almost $17 billion last year. It is doing pretty well for what most people see as just a damn search bar.

In the past month alone, Google has made headlines for its new Web browser, Chrome, its new face recognition software, its controversial advertising deal with Yahoo! and now for it's announcement that it's new phone software system, Android, will be used on the T-Mobile Smartphone. It seems like its expanding its image well.

Being the scientifically hesitant and skeptical person I am, this doesn't come as super news to me, for several reasons. I can only ask myself, "What the hell is going on?"

As far as I know, it would not be bewildering to hear someone speaking ill of or wishing illness to fall upon the now retired penny-bags Gates or any part of Microsoft – that monopoly playing, monopoly ruling monopoly. And I'm not just talking about the college Mac users who would make passionate love with Steve Jobs given the opportunity, to music they made on Garageband. I'm talking about everyone.

For some reason, everyone is head over heels with Google. It is consistently at the top of consumer approval and satisfaction polls. This isn't surprising, considering it owns and controls some of the most popular Internet sites and tools around: YouTube, Gmail, Google Earth (obviously) and possibly not too far in the near future, a cell phone service which could expand its information empire.

In fact, it does plan on using information on cell phones just like it has with computers. It loves information about people. It brings in advertisement revenue. It seems like a stretch, but really, it wouldn't be surprising to see Google become a wolf in sheep's clothing, or at least a government tool. Key word there, people: become.

Yes, Google has foosball, ping-pong, a dinosaur skeleton and probably all these cool gadgets at the Googleplex, but now its just getting a little fishy. The first thing I thought of when I heard the face recognition software in their photo program, Picasa, is "creepy." What this program does, is analyze a face and take measurements, allowing it to tell you all the pictures that the person is in that you have on your computer. You don't need me to tell you where creepiness can come in to play here, especially once it becomes further developed and publicized, utilized on a site like Facebook, or used on the amazing information superhighway.

Picasa isn't the only awkward issue that Google is part of. For those with Gmail, how often have you received an e-mail about something then had the side of your browser plagued with advertisements having to do with that specific topic? Every time Google scans every e-mail for key words in order to choose advertisements that might apply to you.

It seems like a stretch, but really, it wouldn't be surprising to see Google become a wolf in sheep's clothing.

Does no one see anything wrong with this? Not only are the people who are sending you e-mails not consenting to this loss of privacy, but if you check out the Google Privacy Policy, there are even more little tidbits which, if you knew about them, might make you not want to use Google anymore. It tracks what links you clicked, what sites you go to or give information to, what kind of browser you're using and all those things you want no one else to know about. Every time you visit Google, it saves the cookies which record what you searched, how often and when for up to two whole years in order to "give you a better experience."

Or maybe it's just so they can make more money from its advertisements at the sake of your privacy and information?

Speaking of money, have you heard about the Yahoo-Google deal that is being protested by none other than the dreaded Microsoft?

It's probably hard to not blush when Microsoft is talking about you and antitrust issues. It's probably especially harder when the deal is that Yahoo is going to start using your advertisements on its site as made possible by Google's Adsense. This will supposedly help Yahoo's profits out by nearly a billion or so, but even better, it will make, as some reports are saying, nearly 90 percent of the advertising on the Internet Google's. Since most of Google's ads are pay per click, they can set the price to whatever they want. This may slightly resemble what people here hate about big businesses.

My point is this: if you ever want to be famous one day, you better watch out for the bones in your closet that people online are saving. That is, if you have any.

Genres mash with jazz duo

Bobby Previte sets up his drumkit before the crowd had arrived at Bezanson Concert Hall in the Fine Arts Center on Thursday night. Previte along with bassist James Saft were the first group for WMUA's "Solos and Duos" series.

WMUA's 1st concert in series infuses metal and jazz together at Bezanson Concert Hall for unique experience

By Ben Axelson
Collegian Correspondent

Swami LatePlate kicked off the "Solos & Duos" series on Thursday night with music that was dark and unexpected.

Just sitting in on the sound check was enough to send shivers of excitement down the spine. The pair worked with its echoing reverb to create a haunting sound.

"If [the reverb] seems excessive, it's right," said the Bobby Previte (drums) to one of the University's sound engineers. And indeed, the dark sound created by the reverb permeated every aspect of the performance.

That malevolent echo was used for the next hour and a half, combined with a deep bass and a creepy piano/keyboard combination to give the impression of a horror movie at times and a suspenseful thriller at others. But more often than not, it gave the impression of something completely unclassifiable.

The moniker "Doom Jazz" is actually misleading. Though as promised, the bass brings a decidedly black metal sound, while the drums tend to remain inside traditional jazz rhythms. The fusion of the two seems to have created not "dark jazz," but something entirely new.

"This is new music," said Jamie Saft (bass/piano/keyboard). "Jazz. Metal. Those words don't mean anything to me. The music is what you heard tonight, not those words on the poster."

Though the music is something completely different, metal and jazz do have quite a lot of representation throughout.

The bass has both that gritty, feel-it-in-your-chest quality which is typical of metal, while keeping up a jazz bass pump. The drums are heavy in the metal style, but keep a slow jazz rhythm throughout and then pick up the pace for fast solos. The interaction between the two, constantly playing off what the other is doing, is also typical of jazz. This is very much a duo, not just two soloists going back and forth.

However, much of what they played didn't fall under the "traditional" description for either genre.

Saft really speaks with the bass, but doesn't make it talk in a jazz style. Instead he uses it to create agonized moans and high-pitched, tortured whimpers. In the fourth number in particular, Saft took a bass solo where he combined a screeching grinding sound with some furious fretwork that was truly remarkable, but again, not identifiable as "Jazz" or "Metal."

The piano work is also a nice and much needed touch in music that drowns the audience with heavy darkness. Saft's manipulation of the keyboard was masterful and, at the same time, altogether different.

Throughout the performance, the piano's range was used to add an eerie effect to the otherwise demonic darkness of the show. The first number ends with a piano descent. In one of the later pieces, Saft actually reaches inside the piano and plays its strings like a harp.

Saft has great talent with his manipulation of the keyboard, using it to create a variety of effects and sounds that added a truly unique element to the performance, especially during the second number. The electronic effects were all over the place during this solo, at times creating rapidly pulsing, high pitched, ear-splitting vibrations and at others creating decidedly Sci-Fi sounding noises. It was well done, but in general it didn't keep with the overall tone of the performance.

Previte's expert drumming remained strong throughout the performance. He is a master of mood change and contrast. One minute he'll be murdering his kit in a solo, and the next he's barely noticeable as he gently brushes a cymbal while Saft takes it away, but the transfer never seems choppy. It's always smooth and refreshing. He uses the pounding kick bass in sharp contrast with a light cymbal and high hat to sculpt a heavy sound with a jazz feel.

While the mood was right with the nearly non-existent light and the ambient (and unanticipated) red glow cast by the Exit signs, it seems that Bezanson Recital Hall may not have been the best choice of venue for this type of music. It's the kind of thing you might like to have a larger hall for, but it certainly didn't ruin the show.

This was an impressive performance, but needs to come with a warning. This music is clearly not for everybody. Don't be thrown off by "a fusion of heavy metal and jazz." This is something very different.

Fans of only one of those genres who think they might like to hear their favorite music with a twist are in for a shock.

"Doom Jazz" may maintain elements of both, but it's really genre all of its own.

It was evident by the slightly diminished audience at the end of the show that not everybody had gotten what they bargained for.

"There was a great use of dynamics," said audience member Josh Woodard. "I kept getting lulled into a sense of security, and was surprised at how many times I was jolted out of it."

Saft and Previte gave the impression, however, that they weren't out to attract a broad audience, but to create something unique and specific to them.

And they certainly have. While the music has the darkness of metal and a nice jazz club feel, Saft and Previte introduce a unique batch of sounds into the mix which are purely "Saft and Previte."

Bobby Previte plays drums with a grace and power mixing metal and jazz which is what Doom Jazz combines to create a unique blend of music that is all its own.

HvZ documentary brings game to life

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

This past Thursday night at Amherst Cinema, after most of the projectors had cooled off, something strange happened. The niche theatre began filling up again. This time with a very peculiar crowd: the zombie enthusiasts.

They were there to lay their eyes on "Sixteen Days: The Documentary of Humans v Zombies at UMass," and it was clear from their dress and their attitude that none of the attendees were strangers to Humans v Zombies. Many were decked out with Nerf guns, event T-shirts and the signature HvZ red bandanas. Although the crowd was not exceedingly large (it managed to fill two thirds of the theatre), it was certainly enthusiastic, yelling out with chants of "The zombies must die" and "What do we want? Brains." When do we want it? Brains."

The documentary, created by HvZ administrator Keith Rood, is a chronicle of the spring 2008 game and focuses mainly on one squad, The Pit Crew, as the protagonists.

The film starts with footage of large-scale battles, dozens of survivors and ghouls going at it across campus and a single statement: "Every zombie must feed."

After an explanation of the rules and origins of the game, the focus narrows to the Pit Crew. The film follows the 15 members, starting two days before the outbreak as they coordinate their schedules, arrange for class-to-class escorts and discuss escape routes from any locale on campus.

Other characters do play a part in the story. Interviews with past survivors and current players are frequent, as they share their war stories and tactics. Zombie general Jessie Punch makes several appearances, as does game organizer Devin Ashe. This leaves the viewer with the impression that HvZ is a living, breathing game.

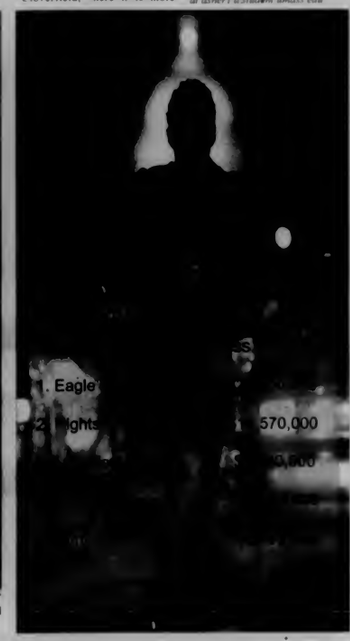
As the game progresses, squad members slowly disappear, either through undead infection or administrative disagreements. As the squad shrinks, the focus shifts to the main missions. They tend to be giant, organized battles with occult themes and creative goals. The battle scenes, however, are extremely shaky and often drag on for too long. Although hand-held-camera cinematography has become popular in such films as "The Blair Witch Project" and "Cloverfield," here it is more of a necessary nuisance than a stylistic choice.

Due to the non-existent budget, it was difficult for the film to fill in all the necessary technical needs of a two-hour documentary. The film also could have benefitted greatly from further editing.

For anyone who is simply curious about the game, be aware that "Sixteen Days" will really only appeal to its core audience. It is not "Dawn of the Dead" and anyone who has not played HvZ will likely not be interested by the survival stories, the stealth scenes or the drawn-out encounters. It is a niche film and must be regarded as such.

With these criticisms in mind, however, the film has a lot going for it as long as it peaks your interest. The home-made nature, while sometimes distracting, lends a familiar feel to the proceedings. The characters are all likeable or at least interesting, and the film is packed with dark humor. The score, provided by Darrel McTag, was completely original, if not a bit repetitive.

Some of the best parts of the film focus on the Thunderdome, a pre-determined battle arena used to settle disagreements between players. The humans involved are only allowed one piece of ammunition per challenging zombie and the fights are genuinely exciting, if not a bit ridiculous.



In the midst of the war, the more noble aspects of the game are also brought to light. The canned food drive, which was conducted during a one-day ceasefire, raised over 2,000 pounds of food for local shelters.

On day 16, the game concludes with one last, winner-takes-all mission and anyone who played already knows how it turns out. Although it ends with a sense of finality, the closing statements remind the viewer that the game will, as always, begin again.

Plans have already been made for a revamped HvZ to start Oct. 15, with new rules, new missions, and a new theme.

MassGames, the organizing body behind HvZ, intends to have DVD copies of "Sixteen Days" available for sale during the upcoming game, but no plans are being made for another big-screen showing. It's probably for the best as this movie belongs not in theatres, but in the hands of its followers, the unique breed known as the zombie enthusiast.

Reality television host talks 'Race' and travel

BY NANCY PALM
THE WASHINGTON POST

Since 2001, "Amazing Race" host Phil Keoghan, 41, has traveled the circumference of the world 80 times, has been to more than 100 countries, has been held by Ukrainian immigration overnight because he didn't have the right papers and washed his hair on the side of the road in China. Keoghan (pronounced KOH-gahn), a New Zealand native who lives in Los Angeles with his wife and daughter, begins his 13th season with "Race" Sunday night on CBS.

Q: HOW MANY FREQUENT-FLIER MILES DO YOU HAVE?

A: I have three accounts with about half a million each. But I use my miles all the time. As fast as I fill them up, I'm using them.

Q: WHAT'S IN YOUR CARRY-ON BAG?

A: I always travel with earplugs, an eye mask, noise-canceling headphones and my iPod. I always travel with my computer, a good book, a journal, some Sudoku and movies. ... I really enjoy traveling because of the opportunity to escape communication. ... I'm dreading that there may come a time when people are going to be allowed to use cellphones on planes. I think it's absolutely insane.

Q: HOW DO YOU THINK YOU'D DO AS ONE OF THE RACERS?

A: I have absolutely no desire to race around the world for $1 million. It's not on my list of things to do before I die. ... I enjoy watching these racers go around the world because I think it's unique for them. I like watching what they do and their reactions. I don't really want to subject myself to being under a microscope for 30-something days.

Q: ONE OF THE THINGS "THE AMAZING RACE" IS KNOWN FOR IS ITS PRETTY CHALLENGING DETOURS AND ROADBLOCKS. ARE THESE ACTIVITIES SELECTED BECAUSE OF A CERTAIN FEAR A RACER MAY HAVE?

A: There have certainly been times – because we know going into the race what people are afraid of – where they end up facing those fears. But to me the best challenges are not necessarily things like bungee-jumping but the more indigenous challenges; milking a camel, for instance. Pretty much all us can go bungee jumping somewhere. It's more predictable than finding out what happens when you take a bunch of Americans to Africa and ask them to milk a camel. That's so out there and so different that to me, the reactions, the television moments, are inherently more interesting.

Phil Keoghan has been hosting 'Amazing Race' for 13 years.

Mary Shea dribbles around two defenders in a game earlier this season. The Minutewomen have got off to a 7-3 start this season, after ending last year at 14-9 with a trip to the NCAA tournament.

Comeback falls short

In the first half, UMass played impatiently and desperately after falling behind by two within the first 12 minutes of the game. Syracuse, meanwhile, showed patience and efficiency with picture-perfect passing and execution in the circle.

"They press in numbers," Sowry said. "They really swarm a lot of numbers around the ball, and we weren't hitting the ball where we should have been hitting it through."

Down 4-0, halftime could not come quickly enough for the Minutewomen. During the break, Sowry addressed her players.

"In a game where [Syracuse] was up, it was just to compete," Sowry said of her halftime remarks. "And, at the end of the game that they knew they played a game against us."

It didn't take long for the Minutewomen to turn it around in the second half. A mere minute after halftime, junior Jill Powers got a hold of a rebound off of Orange goalkeeper Heather Hess and put it into the back of the net.

The early goal was the spark that led to a rejuvenated UMass team in the second half.

"The first half didn't matter. The score was 0-0 for us and we were just trying to put points on the board," Potts said. "Once we got that first goal in the first minute it just raised our hearts and we started to believe again."

The Minutewomen shifted the movement of the game immediately by eliminating the turnovers that plagued the first half and began to put offensive pressure on Syracuse, outscoring them 4-1.

UMass cut the lead to one with seven minutes left. However, Syracuse held to the ball and milked the rest of the clock to hold on for the win.

While UMass was playing catch-up for the Syracuse game, it controlled most of its Saturday matchup against Albany.

The Great Danes were the third ranked team that UMass has faced so far this season after No. 10 Boston College and No. 5 Connecticut. The difference however, was that the Minutewomen pulled out their first win of the season against a ranked opponent, 2-1.

The win did not come easy for UMass, as Albany had the advantage in corners (13-4) and forced the Minutewomen to eliminate scoring chances. Albany's corner play, however, did not present a great challenge for the Maroon and White.

"Defensively, I thought it was very easy to read what they were going to do," Widdall said. "They only got off a few corners, but I think we set up properly each time."

Neither team scored during the first half as both offenses failed to cash in on any of their scoring opportunities. The Minutewomen, however, turned it around in the second half.

"We were playing by ourselves in the first half," senior Katelyn Orlando said. "I think in the second half we finally started playing together, shifting the ball and the things we've been told to do."

UMass took the lead in the second half with goals by Potts and Orlando, both of which came off of corners. Despite having fewer chances, the Minutewomen executed off of their corner chances.

After this weekend, UMass looks to crack the Top 25 rankings for the first time. Up next for the Minutewomen is a weekend pair of home games against Siena and Georgetown.

Corner defense aids in win

The game on Saturday against No. 18 Albany (5-5) had a stronger defensive showing from UMass.

Cher King had two defensive saves, a rarity for a defender not in goal. Widdall saw 13 penalty corners from the Great Danes, a team that before this game had not scored a penalty corner goal all season. She made 11 saves on the day and allowed one goal in the 2-1 victory.

"Giving up 13 penalty corners is not acceptable," Sowry said of the Minutewomen's miscues that lead to the advantages for Albany. "Another team on another day would have punished us."

The UMass defense was tough in the circle. The backs stayed close to Widdall and prevented the Great Danes from having an opportunity to shoot on her blind side.

The Maroon and White failed to catch Albany on many disadvantages but capitalized on nearly every penalty corner earned.

The fast-paced Great Danes forced mistakes on the Minutewomen, a team not used to opponents who play at such a high-tempo.

A bright spot for UMass was the composure of the players in front of the goal. Sophomore backs Jackie Tait and Jaime Bourazeris kept the ball away from the opposition after deflections from Widdall. This eliminated second-chance opportunities for most of the game, with the exception of Albany's lone goal, which came off of a deflection.

Also positive for the defense against Albany was its communication under pressure. Tait, Widdall and Bourazeris made sure the rest of the team knew how the Great Danes were attacking, making a big difference on defense.

The strong defensive work translated into offense for UMass and completely disrupted the strategy of Albany – ultimately leading to the victory.

Sowry's tenure short, but sweet

But what concerns Sowry is how her team does against some of the other teams.

"We've proven that we can play against any opponent now, but we need to learn how to beat the middle-of-the-road teams," she said.

Sowry said that in reference to the overtime games against both Brown and Harvard earlier this season – games in which the Minutewomen found a way to win.

"Mental toughness is something coach really stresses to us, and it's just great to know that we have it in us to come back like that," captain Mary Shea said after Sunday's game. "I'm really pleased with that we've done so far this season – I think we're so much further along this season than last year."

Just wait until next season, though. And the year after that. This is a team built on youth, a group of players that are only going to get better with each passing year. Losing Shea, Orlando and Erin Parker after this season to graduation will hurt, but the corps of this team will be here for a long time to come.

And Sowry can't wait to see what success will come with it.

"I'm incredibly excited about our future," she said. "Our recruitment has been going well and our freshmen are working hard in practice. It's an exciting future and time for this program."

The young players are doing so well (most notably freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall) that the veteran players on the team sometimes forget how young their teammates on the field really are.

"We're definitely a younger team now compared to last year, but we don't really view people as freshman and sophomores," Shea said. "It's more about what people do on the field. Our younger players are really stepping up."

Sowry doesn't want her team to get ahead of itself, though. She still sees a lot of work that needs to be done.

"We're still behind the best teams, player-for-player and skill-wise," she said. "But where we lack in skill, we make up for with our tenacious pressure and determination."

But even as of this second, they are behind no team currently wearing maroon and white.

UMass starts off A-10s strong

took a pass from Toulouse and hit a 15-yard shot to equalize the game just eight minutes after the first goal.

The Minutewomen continued to put balls forward in the second half and were a presence in the Bonnies' defensive zone.

Despite four corner kicks and six shots on goal, UMass couldn't record another goal, sending the game into overtime.

"We had some great runs going [in the first half], but we didn't play the through ball well, but in the second half we played a lot better," Rudy said.

Junior midfielder Katie Ruggles saw substantial minutes in the game after missing two weeks with a wrist injury. Redshirt midfielder Vanessa Lima also saw some time, even though she was not expected to play in the game due to a high hamstring pull.

Junior goalkeeper Lauren Luckey had three saves, while the Minutewomen outshot the Bonnies 14-11, and led in corner kicks, 6-4.

The weather was just as bad on Sunday at Temple, as the UMass offense was slowed because of terrible field conditions along with tough defensive play from the Owls (3-2-3).

"It was a really ugly game," Rudy said. "We got there and there was standing water almost on the entire field so it was difficult at times to knock it around."

Early in the second half, junior forward Christina Adams had a 1-on-1 with Temple goalkeeper Courtney Douglas. Adams got past an Owl defender, but Douglas had a sliding save to keep the game even at one.

The Owls used a number of substitutions throughout the game, but Rudy knew that was part of Temple's initial game-plan.

"We were ready for it so we played a few more people than we usually do," Rudy said.

The UMass defense only allowed one shot from the Owls in overtime, along with seven in the game. The Minutewomen had five shots, with three coming from Adams.

"Our performances weren't up to the level that we were accustomed to," Rudy said.

Although the Minutewomen did not come away with the victory, Rudy was pleased with how his team played despite the tough road schedule and weather conditions.

"I was proud of them that they could battle through all of this even though it was tiring," Rudy said.

Younger players getting time

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Having more starting caliber players than starting slots can be a blessing and a curse; it's always good to have as many quality players as possible, but it can be a hassle to find enough playing time for all of them.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team finds itself in such a situation. This weekend at the UMass Classic, UMass coach Sam Koch and the Minutemen (2-4-2) needed to mix things up so he gave some of the younger players, such as sophomore Matthew Hess and freshman Chris Roswess, a start over a more traditional line-up of juniors and seniors.

"We need a shake-up, we needed to do something different, and I think the effort [the reserves showed] was very good," Koch said. "We have 15 guys who can start, so if the guys who have been starting aren't getting it done, then we will make some changes and see if we can get a different combination that will get it done."

Both games UMass played in the classic went into double overtime. The Minutemen lost to Hartford on Friday 1-0 in the second overtime, and then played to a 0-0 tie Sunday against Vermont.

Many coaches would have concerns about their team playing two double-overtime games, but Koch feels that for his team, playing to overtime can be a good thing.

"I think that [overtime] gives some other guys an opportunity to play, I think that is a positive because we have a good, solid bench with a lot of depth," Koch said.

While the Minutemen have not had the type of start they would have hoped for, one of the positives has been the surprising play of the reserves, featuring players like Hess, Roswess, freshman Andrew Henshaw and freshman Bryant Craft.

Koch singled out Hess as having a great game Friday off the bench, in addition to playing a solid game yesterday when he was called to start.

Henshaw earned two starts this weekend and provided strong defense against Vermont. On one play against the Catamounts in the 25th minute, Henshaw knocked down the Vermont midfielder while stealing the ball, then made a pass up the field to start a break along the sidelines. It wasn't reflected in the box score, but those are the kind of plays coaches love to see.

Koch doesn't feel the veterans will be too slighted because they did not get the start.

"The guys who didn't start, who have been starting in the midfield still played a lot, whether they start or if they come off the bench they still get about the same amount of playing time, so it's not a big issue," Koch said.

Arguably the most promising young player on the team is sophomore midfielder Ben Arikian. Arikian started 25 out of 26 games last season and scored two goals in addition to notching a team-high six assists.

This season he has scored or assisted on both game-winning goals in the Minutemen's two wins. He scored the golden goal in double overtime against Boston University back in August and assisted on Chris Brown's header in the Minutemen's home opener against Siena. He also led both team in shots (six) against the Catamounts yesterday.

Having a strong core of young players is important, but it is up to the veteran players to provide leadership and help the younger players by getting them familiar with the team's strategies and being a strong example of what to look up to.

"Well, they are taking after us, what we do, we show them things, I mean we are their role models, if you want to call it that, and hopefully they will pick it up as the [Atlantic 10 matches] come along," said senior midfielder Mike DeSantis.

our chances because that's our main problem and I think we'll be fine," senior Mike DeSantis said. "We'll be back in the [Atlantic 10] Tournament again."

The Catamounts had their chances too, but the Minuteman defense proved to be strong, earning senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons his 25th-career shutout. With fewer than 20 minutes remaining in the game, Vermont's Teddy Wingo took a corner kick that fell right in the center of the box, but Simmons punched the ball out to midfield before the Catamounts had a chance to act on the play.

"Defensively, everybody played, and I thought they did a good job. The back four was really solid," Koch said. "I thought we defended well today as a whole unit."

As the game neared the end of regulation, junior Mark DeSantis was moved from his typically forward position back to midfield to create more chances on offense.

"I think he's one of our better players and he's naturally left sided, so it gave us a natural left-sided midfielder and another scoring threat," Koch said. "Defensively we're pretty solid with him there and now offensively we were more dangerous, unfortunately it didn't work."

Although the Minutemen were unable to score, they still improved on many aspects of their game that will help them once conference play begins. They moved the ball around better, made more solid passes and increased their supporting runs. These have been aspects of the game UMass has been working to improve on this season.

"I'm pleased with the fact that we played as a team and the team was behind everybody," Koch said. "I'm pleased with the fact that we played hard for the whole 90 minutes and in overtime, and in the end that is what is going to win games for us, so that was a good step today."

The Minutemen return to the pitch on Oct. 7 when they travel to Winston-Salem, N.C., to play No. 1 Wake Forest, the defending NCAA champion.

Patry, Toulouse sparking team on offense

Britt Canfield had a similar season last year with two-goal performances against Xavier on Oct. 7 and Richmond on Nov. 2 of last year.

Canfield finished with eight goals at the end of the season, a mark that Patry could eventually pass if she keeps up her performance offensively. At this point of the season last year, Canfield scored her fourth goal on Sept. 28 and didn't score again until the game against the Musketeers.

Rudy believes that what makes Patry a dominant player is her ability to play everywhere on the field.

"She's coming along the way we always imagined," Rudy said. "She's a player of great value. At one point [during the game against St. Bonaventure] I said, 'are you OK?' She probably ran more than our midfielders did."

In the game against St. Bonaventure, the Minutewomen focused their out-of-bounds plays on getting headers to Patry. It took five plays before the Bonnies adjusted.

Patry has done more than just score goals for the offense. She also leads the Minutewomen with three assists.

She recorded her first assist on Sept. 10 against Bryant and tallied one in the next two games against Holy Cross and Albany.

If the first part of the season is any indication to how Patry's success will translate later on this year, then Patry should be crucial to UMass' success. The Minutewomen are 3-1-1 when Patry scores a point.

Orange crush comeback attempt

UMass upsets Albany, misses another vs. SU

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team split the weekend series against No. 18 Albany and No. 2 Syracuse in what was likely its most difficult weekend of the season.

The Minutewomen (7-3) won their Saturday matchup against the Great Danes (5-5) by a score of 2-1, in no small part to an 11-save performance by freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall. However, UMass fell to undefeated Syracuse, 5-4, on Sunday – falling just short of a shocking second-half comeback.

| Syracuse | 5 |
| UMass | 4 |
| UMass | 2 |
| Albany | 1 |

After splitting the weekend set against two ranked teams, UMass coach Justine Sowry was proud of her team's performances.

"In terms of wins and losses, if coming out of this game we got one win, I would have been thrilled, and we got that," Sowry said. "We achieved everything we set out to this weekend."

Coming into the game, the Orange (10-0) was heavily favored as the second-best team in the country. SU justified that ranking in the first half by dominating the Minutewomen, 4-0.

"I think the fact that they were No. 2, we just weren't believing in ourselves," sophomore midfielder Mikaela Potts said of their first-half struggles. "We let them get on top of us and we just didn't attack at all. We just defended and defended."

The Orange was dominant in every facet on the first half, outshooting the Minutewomen, 15-4, and out-cornering them, 11-1.

Corner defense a key for team this season

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Mistakes were both a gift and a nightmare for the Massachusetts field hockey team this past weekend. One of the major factors that dictated the outcome of these games was the penalty corners.

In Sunday's game against No. 2 Syracuse (10-0), the Minutewomen (7-3) gave up 16 penalty corners by game's end. The UMass defense seemed confused by the corner offense of the Orange during the entire first half.

Sophomore midfield Makaela Potts slipped into the backfield for this game to aid the young offense of the Minutewomen but Potts was defended well by Syracuse.

"We're still not communicating how I would like us to communicate," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of her young defense. "[Today] gave us the experience, structure and the ability to get the ball out."

The defense gave up 12 shots-on-goal and the speed of the Orange broke the defense of the Minutewomen for most of the game. Syracuse's 11 penalty corners in the first half alone turned the UMass defense into a corps trying to recover from an overpowering assault on goal.

The Orange rarely took a straight shot off of the corner, but rather passed the ball out to the sides to break the defensive formation of the Maroon and White. The Minutewomen struggled to talk and find continuity in the backfield, which led to even more corner opportunities for Syracuse.

Freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall gave up a season-high five goals, while making seven saves, earning the loss.

Best team in Amherst

Eli Rosenswaike

It turns out the best the University of Massachusetts team was playing this weekend, after all.

I'm not talking about the football team. It was off this Saturday with its bye week, still reeling over two consecutive beat-downs.

And no, I'm not even talking about the men's soccer team – a team that reached the College Cup just last season.

The best team Amherst has going right now is the field hockey team. It went out and proved it this weekend – something neither the football team nor the soccer team has done yet.

Led by second-year coach Justine Sowry, the Minutewomen defeated No. 18 Albany at Garber Field on Saturday. But after 35 minutes of play – and a 4-0 halftime deficit – on Sunday against No. 2 Syracuse, that all seemed to be a fluke.

The next 35 minutes proved that it wasn't.

Led by two second-half goals from Katelyn Orlando and Jill Powers, the Minutewomen stormed back to pull within one goal at 5-4 with just over seven minutes to play.

They never scored that goal, but this team scored one for the program this weekend – a program that went through five consecutive losing seasons (with a combined record of 33-72) under former coach Patty Shea before Sowry and her staff took over last season.

And it didn't take her long to change the losing culture. The Minutewomen surprised everyone in 2007, capturing the Atlantic 10 championship for the first time in since 2001, ending Richmond's streak of five straight conference titles.

UMass won its NCAA Play-In Game against Princeton, but dropped its next game against Connecticut. If this year's Minutewomen (7-3) continue to play this well, look for them to make the NCAA tournament again.

But in the meantime, look for this team to finally crack the Top 25 poll when it comes out on Monday.

"It would mean a whole lot," Sowry said of potentially making the rankings. "If the country doesn't stand up and notice us this weekend, then they never will.

"If when it comes out and we're in, fantastic. We will be pretty happy, we'll cheer," Sowry added. "But if we don't take care of business next weekend, it will be the quickest in and out of the rankings that you've ever seen."

UMass has narrow one-goal losses to both No. 10 Boston College and against the second-ranked Orange. Despite the tough decisions, it proved to the young Minutewomen that they can compete with the best teams in the country.

Minutewomen begin A-10 undefeated

Maroon and White defeat SBU, draw tie against Owls

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team has played a school-record six overtime games this season, including eight overtimes in the past 11 games dating back to the 2007 campaign.

This weekend was no different for the Minutewomen (4-3-2, 1-1-0 Atlantic 10), as they opened their conference schedule this weekend with two games characterized by terrible weather, physical play and extra time.

The Maroon and White came away with four points in the A-10 standings, defeating St. Bonaventure, 2-1, on Friday at home before tying Temple on Sunday, 0-0, in Philadelphia.

UMass is now in a three-way tie with Saint Joseph's and Dayton for second in the A-10 with one win and one tie, respectively.

Senior forward Vanessa Patry scored her second goal of the game with 54 seconds remaining in the second overtime to beat the Bonnies (5-5-0).

"I'm really pleased for the team for the win," UMass coach Jim Rudy said Friday. "It was a really hard-fought game in really hard conditions."

|---|---|
| UMass | 0 |
| Temple | 0 |
| SBU | 1 |

The Minutewomen committed 14 fouls to the Bonnies' eight throughout the game.

Senior defender Melissa Toulouse ran up the right side of the field and passed to sophomore midfielder Kelsey Anderson, who crossed to Patry on the far post.

Patry knocked it in for the game winner, recording her fifth goal of the season and second multi-goal game of the year.

St. Bonaventure struck first in the game, as midfielder Marilyn Wargo headed a ball served by midfielder Hannah Lapp into the back of the net to give the Bonnies a 1-0 lead.

UMass responded, as Patry

Patry-Toulouse connection strong

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

There are some things that Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy can't explain about his own team. How seniors Melissa Toulouse and Vanessa Patry connected for two goals in the double overtime win over St. Bonaventure is one of them.

"They're roommates, they're best buddies and they have an affinity," Rudy said. "Some players have that."

Toulouse had a direct assist in Patry's first goal. The defensive stopper moved from the back and got the ball to Patry who fired a shot from over 15 yards out past SBU goalkeeper Nicole Markert.

The second goal came after some on-field adjustments initiated without any input from Rudy. The team made its own decision to move sophomore Alyssa Visconti into the middle with redshirt senior Tina Rodriguez and put Toulouse on the wing.

"I think it's great because their success is my success," Rudy said. "You had mature players making mature decisions."

UMass' (4-2-3, 1-0-1 A-10) adjustment allowed Toulouse to play up more often and played a part in some offensive possessions.

The big possession came with 54 seconds left in the second overtime period. Toulouse went up the right side of the field and passed the ball to sophomore Kelsey Anderson.

The midfielder sent a cross to Patry who kicked the game-winner.

"The good thing about [the goal] is we've really been working on our inside-out runs with our wings getting across and finishing so it finally all came through," Patry said.

The Minutewomen's win marked a number of accomplishments between Toulouse and Patry. It was the first time since 2006 that Toulouse had an assist. She finished that year with four.

Toulouse is used to not recording offensive statistics (besides her lone shot against Maine on Aug. 29) so it was unusual for her to see any sort of statistic next to her name.

"Playing defense, you don't really get the goals, you don't really get the assists," Toulouse said. "You get the stuff that leads up to that. I think I got wide more so it helped me get forward."

Patry reached a milestone of her own, breaking her personal-best for goals scored in a season on Friday when she scored her fifth goal in double overtime. It's also the second time she's scored two goals in a game this season.

The last time she scored twice was in a 2-2 shutout against New Hampshire on Sept. 4. Patry is currently three goals behind the A-10's leading scorer, Charlotte's Whitney Weinraub, who has eight.

It's still relatively early in the season, but the forward is starting to emerge as the Minutewomen's top offensive weapon. UMass alum

SGA election results tallied

By William McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: the following pertains to preliminary election results. Official results and more information on the election, including close contests and candidate comments can be seen in tomorrow's coverage.

Some 1,752 students voted in the latest Student Government Association elections, clearing the percentage needed to make the election legitimate.

Preliminary results are pending ratification by the SGA coordinating council, which could make them official tomorrow night.

The highest percentage of student turnout came from the Orchard Hill and Central living areas, but the greatest number of students voted in Southwest where more than 50 percent of on-campus students live. Fewer than 5 percent of commuters voted.

UMass students selected their area representatives for both the SGA senate and area government. Between both, 47 were chosen.

The number of senators per living area is decided by population.

One senator is allotted for every 500 students. If a residence area contained 350 or more unrepresented residents, an extra senator is granted.

Senate Results:

Southwest South - Akiyah Francis John, Vanessa Andrade, Shannon Weatherup, Tyler Langlais, Daniel Gabel, Ryan McCarthy

Security report released

By Adam P. Coulter
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' Annual Security Report for 2007, which details crime statistics and the campus' crime-related policies and information, has been released.

The report shows a decline in on-campus burglaries and aggravated assaults in the last three years. Liquor law violation arrests have gone up from 204 in 2006 to 245 in 2007, and forcible sex offenses have risen from six in 2006 to nine occurring in 2007. There has also been a rise in drug law violation arrests in the residence halls during that time, according to the University of Massachusetts Police Department's report.

The UMPD prepares the yearly report in compliance with the Jeanne Clery Disclosure of Campus Security Policy and Crime Statistics Act. The report includes statistics from the previous three years concerning reported crimes on and around campus, as well as information about campus crime prevention and safety awareness programs. According to the report, these deterrence tools seem to be working most effectively in the areas of violent crime.

In 2005, the total number of victims involved in aggravated assaults on campus was 14, with 13 reported in 2006 and 8 in 2007, prompting different theories from law enforcement as to why exactly the reduction occurred.

"The University has done a lot with the B.A.S.I.C.'s program and prevention education to curtail binge drinking. Aggravated assaults historically have been fueled by alcohol," said UMPD Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor. "That may be a variable leading to the reduction," she added.

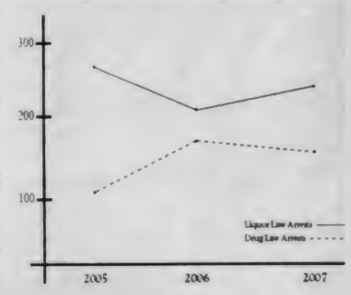
The chief also mentioned that it's hard to decipher the reasons for the decline of these crimes.

"The best you can hope for is that your crime prevention and education programs are having an impact," O'Connor said.

Though a student whose laptop was just stolen from his dorm may not agree, campus burglaries have drastically gone down, according to the report.

"We have taken a very proactive approach to crime prevention around burglary, and that's our program. 'Lock it. Lock it. Keep it'," said O'Connor.

O'Connor explained that the UMPD even has a particular officer whose job is to persuade students to realize the importance of locking up their valuables.



"He goes out and does education in the residence halls and/or the academic area," added O'Connor, referring to the program.

Another aspect of security that the UMPD believes is having an impact on campus burglaries is the recent placement of security cameras in the residence halls and other areas.

"The cameras have helped us to detect and prevent crimes previously unsolvable," O'Connor said.

The topic of security cameras on campus is a controversial one, but some students believe that

UM dining awarded

Local support commended

By Nina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

The director of the University of Massachusetts Dining Services, Ken Toong, received two awards on Friday, Sept. 26, recognizing his support of local agriculture.

A celebration was held in the Berkshire Dining Commons, where Massachusetts Commissioner of Agriculture Doug Petersen presented Toong with the state's Faces of Agriculture Award for his support of sustainable agriculture in Massachusetts.

Toong also received the 2008 Blue Ribbon Award from Amherst-based nonprofit Farm to School Project for encouraging connections between farms and schools. State Rep. Ellen Story presented the award.

"I am very honored to win these two awards. It is humbling to be recognized by the state," said Toong.

The celebration was a culmination of the second annual Massachusetts Harvest for Students Week, Sept. 22-26. The menus of schools, colleges and universities around the state featured local produce. The goal of the Harvest Week, instituted last year by Gov. Deval Patrick, was to encourage "new buying relationships" between farms and schools. UMass Dining Commons took part in the event by showcasing the produce of 15 local farms, including Cook's Honey in Belchertown and Mapeline Farm in Hadley.

Currently, UMass buys approximately $250,000 worth of produce from local farmers, approximately 20 percent of all food bought by the campus.

"We're going to keep trying to improve and even increase the local foods we use this year to 25 percent. This is something the whole university community is proud of," Toong said.

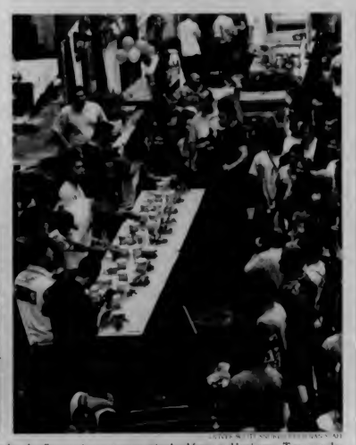
Since 2002, Toong has been working to increase the amount of local produce that the campus purchases, and he hopes to continue increasing UMass' use of local produce in the future.

"Last year we really took action, we have a passion for the project. Our attitude is 'Let's do it.' Let's use as much local produce as possible," Toong said.

UMass buys a variety of produce from local farmers including potatoes, carrots, bean sprouts and broccoli, as well as dairy products like milk and ice cream. The campus has also started to purchase local jam, honey and maple syrup.

Toong refuted the idea that buying locally was less cost effective.

"It's a myth that buying local is more expensive. The prices are very comparable," he said.



Buying locally grown produce does not simply benefit local industry, although that is a strong motivation for Toong's initiative to buy locally. UMass buys produce directly from farmers, so local farms receive all of the profits. He explained that students want better quality food, and that buying locally means the produce is fresher. Also, buying produce closer to campus means that UMass can reduce its carbon footprint.

Toong's efforts to increase the connections between UMass and local farms are part of a larger effort across the state by schools to support local agriculture.

"For more than the 60 Massachusetts family farms providing their products directly to schools, the farm to school connection is generating more than $700,000 in additional revenues each year," Commissioner Peterson explained.

Students react to debate

By Tori Hultzman
Collegian Staff

The first of the presidential debates between Republican candidate John McCain and Democratic candidate Barack Obama was held Friday, Sept. 26, at University of Mississippi.

The majority of students interviewed were in support of Obama and planned to vote for him in November. Despite this, there was a lack of students who actually watched the debate for various reasons.

There were some typical answers for not watching, such as, "I didn't know it was on," "It was on a Friday night," "I wasn't interested," and, "I'm not 18, so I can't vote."

In fact, many students interviewed were surprised the debate would take place on a Friday night because of the fact that many politicians are trying to appeal to a

Afternoon outage leaves campus dark

Yesterday, about 25 buildings at the east side of the University of Massachusetts, including dormitories and academic buildings, experienced power outages for approximately 75 minutes.

The incident occurred from 10:00 a.m. to 11:15 a.m., according to the Physical Plant department.

The loss of power was due to the Western Massachusetts Electric Company (WMECO) loosing its power, which then set off a circuit breaker trip, or shut down of power, throughout the campus.

The breaker trip was set off to protect its wiring from heating and causing damage to the system.

After the WMECO was able to fix their electrical issues, the Physical Plant department immediately reset the circuit breaker and restored power to campus, according to Larry Snyder, associate director of administrative services at the Physical Plant.

In the event of a power outage in dormitories, according to the office of Environmental Health and Safety at the university, students should report losses of power to the residence hall staff and never tamper with or attempt to fix or replace a circuit breaker or fuse box on their own.

the UMPD is doing a good job, and the lowered crime rates, such as burglary, are a result of their efforts.

Ashley Coulombe, a senior journalism major who lives on campus, agrees.

"I feel safe; I read the crime reports online and the crime does seem to be going down. I always lock up my room and if students are smart about it they'll be OK," said Coulombe.

In previous years, the University experienced several brazen armed robberies of campus drug dealers, which consequently forms the foundation for the increased drug law arrests occurring today.

"When you're out there enforcing drug laws and preventing dealing, you prevent people coming onto campus to commit armed robberies," O'Connor said.

Serving warrants and arresting students for relatively minor offenses is a large factor contributing to the anti-police attitudes on campus, and this, O'Connor said, is the area where the department needs the largest improvement.

"I think our biggest issue is reaching out to the 18- to 22-year-olds on campus. We're not the bad guys, and we have the students' best intentions in mind," she said.

Support varied at UMass

younger crowd, and most college students do not tend to stay in on Friday nights.

For the students who did watch the debate, however, the reason was pretty consistent.

"I'm interested in politics," said UMass student Fidd Ricker, 18, from Pepperell, Mass. Devers Talmage, 17, from Northfield, Masachusetts agreed.

Most students interviewed had already decided on a candidate, though the reasons for their own decisions ranged greatly.

UMass student, Edmond Chow, 18, of Wayland, Mass. explained that he's voting for Obama because "I like blue more than red."

Ricker explained that he was in support of Obama's policies on global diplomacy, building the economy, his health care plan and the ideas of people before business and Main Street before Wall Street.

Talmage, who is 17, is unable to vote on Nov. 4, but said he watched the debate anyway, and that if he could vote, Obama would be his choice. When asked he would not consider voting for McCain, Talmage said, "He [McCain] picked Palin as his [vice presidential candidate] in order to please the masses. Palin wouldn't know what to do with herself. There is no way she could be president."

Zach Aggott, 18, from Pepperell, Mass., admitted that he was forced to watch the debate by his roommate, but still gained something out of it.

When asked his opinion of whose performance was superior, Aggot said, "John McCain is an obnoxious public speaker. He talks in circles. I hate it. He goes out of his way not to answer questions. Obama does a good job of answering questions."

Bailout defeated

BY KEVIN G. HALL

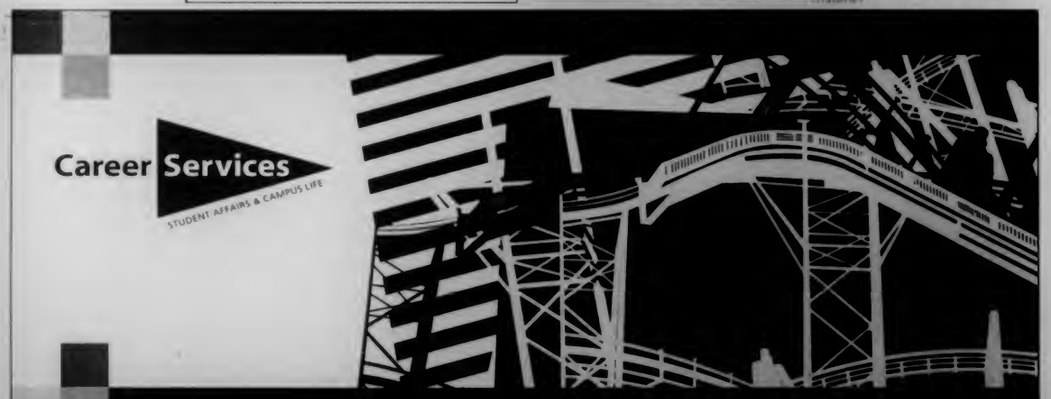
WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders and the Bush administration vowed Monday to try to revive a failed $700 billion rescue of Wall Street after 133 Republicans and 65 Democrats in the House of Representatives defied their leaders and killed the controversial plan, sending U.S. and global financial markets plunging in panic.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Federal Reserve Chairman Benjamin Bernanke warned that failure to pass the legislation would trigger a deep freeze in credit markets, which would shift Wall Street's problems to Main Street in ways large and small.

"I am very disappointed in today's vote," said a visibly angry Paulson, standing outside the White House. "There's been significant turmoil in financial markets in the past few days. ...Markets around the world are under stress. ...Families, too, feel the credit crunch as it becomes more difficult to get car loans or student loans.

"I am committed to continue to work with my fellow regulators to use all of the tools available to protect our financial system and our economy. Our tool kit is substantial but insufficient."



He vowed to keep working with Congress in search of a solution. "We've got much work to do and this is much too important to simply let fail. ...We need to get something done ... as soon as

Obama talks politics in NC

BY NAUREEN KHAN AND WILL ROBINSON
THE DUKE CHRONICLE

GREENSBORO — Following closely on the heels of the first of three highly anticipated presidential debates, Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama made his second appearance in North Carolina within a week with running mate Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., Saturday morning.

Against the industrial backdrop of the downtown train station, Obama honed in on the floundering economy and the current financial turmoil on Wall Street before an enthused crowd of 18,000, attempting to portray GOP presidential candidate John McCain as out of touch with the struggles of middle-class Americans.

"The truth is, through 90 minutes of debating, John McCain had a lot to say about me, but he had nothing to say about you," said the Illinois senator. "He didn't even say the words 'middle class.' He didn't say the words 'working people.' See, I think Sen. McCain just doesn't get it."

Channeling populist themes that every American should have the opportunity to get their piece of the pie, Obama and Biden portrayed McCain as a candidate "tethered to George Bush's failed economic policies" and beholden to corporate interests.

"George Bush has dug us into a deep hole. John McCain was carrying the shovel," Obama said. "I am running for president because we simply cannot afford another four more years of an economic philosophy that works for Wall Street instead of Main Street."

Obama and Biden emphasized the need for oversight and regulation in the market as their fellow lawmakers in Washington were negotiating a $700 billion bailout for troubled financial institutions.

"The era of greed and irresponsibility on Wall Street and in Washington has led us to a financial crisis as serious as any we have faced since the Great Depression," Obama said. "They said they wanted to let the market run free, but instead they let it run wild."

Biden attacked McCain by calling him "wrong" more than 15 times in his roughly 15-minute speech on issues like the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq and homeland security, providing a dose of foreign policy to fire up the crowd before Obama's address.

Despite the rain, the crowd arrived hailing Obama's candidacy with hand-painted signs of "NC for Obama" and "Yes We Will." A contingent of Duke students missed out on Saturday's football festivities to make the drive to see the man who could be the next president.

"It was honestly hard to believe that it was only an hour from Duke- the first post-debate rally," said sophomore Anthony Sanderson, a member of Duke Democrats.

He said Obama capitalized on a strong performance in Friday's debate by criticizing McCain for not discussing the middle class.

McCain's campaign, however, proposed a different one-word litmus to assess the candidates' performances in the debate.

"Barack Obama failed to utter the word 'victory' a single time during last night's debate on foreign policy," McCain spokesperson Tucker Bounds said in a statement Saturday. "And that's failing the commander-in-chief test by any standard."

McCain spent his Saturday in Virginia discussing the financial bailout with his Senate colleagues possible," Paulson said.

After almost two weeks of feverish efforts to draft a compromise bailout that all sides could live with, the House rejected the rescue plan by a vote of 228-205. Republicans defied their president, their presidential nominee and their party leaders, as 133 rejected the plan and only 65 voted in its favor. Democrats voted 140-65 for the plan.

Looming defeat of the plan sent stocks plunging even before the vote was final. The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed down 777.68 points, or 7 percent, the largest one-day point drop ever, but well below the Dow's 22 percent drop on Oct. 19, 1987.

Similarly, the S&P 500 sunk 106.85 points to 1106.42, down 8.8 percent. The tech-heavy Nasdaq took the biggest hit, falling 199.61 points to close at 1983.73, down 9.1 percent.

Investors fled any asset viewed as risky; in after-hours trading, contracts for next-month delivery of oil skidded down $11.45 to $95.44 a barrel. Gold, a safe haven in times of investor fear, was up $23 to $911 an ounce.

All told, markets lost more than $1 trillion in value, analysts said. As stocks skidded, so did the value of 401(k) retirement plans and individual retirement accounts held by ordinary Americans.

Leaders in Washington vowed to go back to the drawing board.

"We put forth a plan that was big because we have a big problem," said a somber President Bush during a White House photo op with Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko. "Our strategy is to continue to address this economic situation head on and we will be working to develop a strategy that will enable us to move forward."

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., sounded a similar note. "The legislation has failed. The crisis has not gone away. We must work together in a bipartisan way to have another bite at the apple."

House Republican leaders also pledged to seek a new bipartisan remedy that could pass, but they salted their remarks with partisan shots at Pelosi for making what they said was a partisan speech on the House floor shortly before the vote that inflamed Republican lawmakers and persuaded as many as 12 of them to reverse their reluctant decisions to vote for the plan.

"We could've gotten there today (except for) this partisan speech that the speaker gave on the floor of the House," said House Republican Leader John Boehner of Ohio. "We've got to put partisanship aside."

Lawmakers won't vote again on any rescue plan before Thursday, since many are returning to their districts for Rosh Hashana, which marks the start of the Jewish New Year.

The House's failure to pass the Wall Street rescue bill was a bitter defeat for Bush and his party's nominee to replace him, John McCain, who had suspended his campaign late last week to push for passage of the plan. McCain's camp on Sunday had bragged that he was instrumental in winning over recalcitrant Republicans.

In a brief appearance before the media at about 5 p.m. EDT Monday, McCain blamed Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama and Democratic lawmakers for the plan's defeat.

"Sen. Obama and his allies on Congress infused unnecessary partisanship in the process," McCain said. Earlier, a statement from McCain's campaign had singled out Pelosi for blame, echoing the House GOP leaders.

In an angry response, Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., the chairman of the House Financial Services Committee who helped craft the compromise, said that means GOP lawmakers ignored warnings from Paulson and Bush that financial ruin could follow if the plan didn't pass, and they rejected the plan "because somebody hurt their feelings."

"I think they are covering up the embarrassment of not having the votes," Frank said.

Obama said "there's a lot of blame to spread around" and appealed for "the American people and the markets to stay calm" while leaders continue trying to craft a bailout package that can be enacted.

"Step up to the plate. Get it done," he had said earlier in Wisconsin.

In a sign that America's financial crisis has spread far and wide, the governments of Belgium, Holland and Luxembourg on Monday nationalized some banks or insurance companies in moves that parallel recent actions by the U.S. Treasury Department and Federal Reserve. On Tuesday morning in Asia, the Tokyo and Hong Kong stock markets opened down sharply.

Before U.S. markets opened Monday, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., a federal bank regulator, announced that it had brokered the purchase by Citigroup of the banking operations of Charlotte, N.C.-based national bank Wachovia for just over $2.2 billion, or about $1 a share.

In anticipation of a volatile day, the Federal Reserve early Monday announced that it was tripling one of its emergency lending operations to $75 billion, raising to $300 billion the amount it has available in 84-day lending to struggling financial institutions.

Underscoring the global nature of the financial market that's now in turmoil, the Fed also boosted complicated reciprocal swap agreements with the central banks of Canada, England, Japan, Denmark, Norway, Australia, Sweden, Switzerland and the European Union.

Global warming never before so high

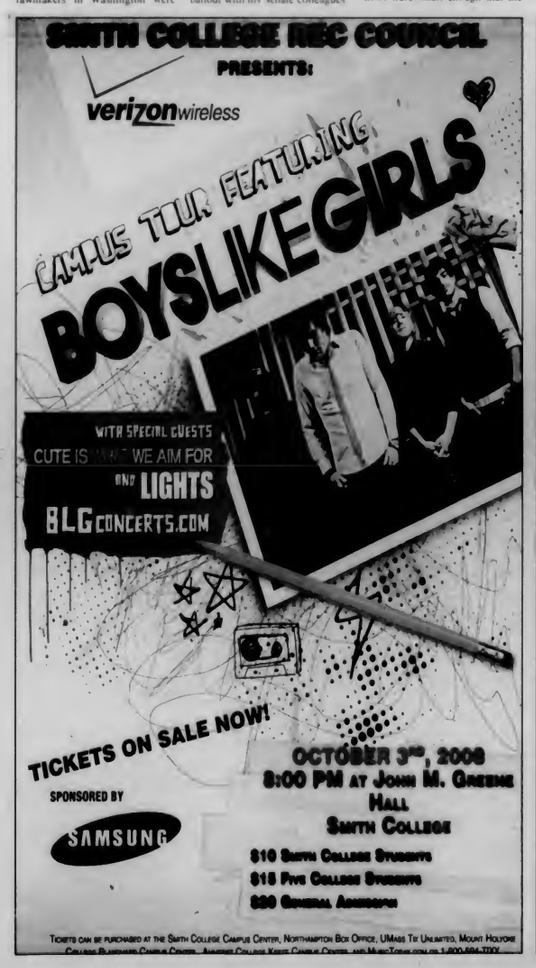
BY RENEE SCHOOF
(MCT)

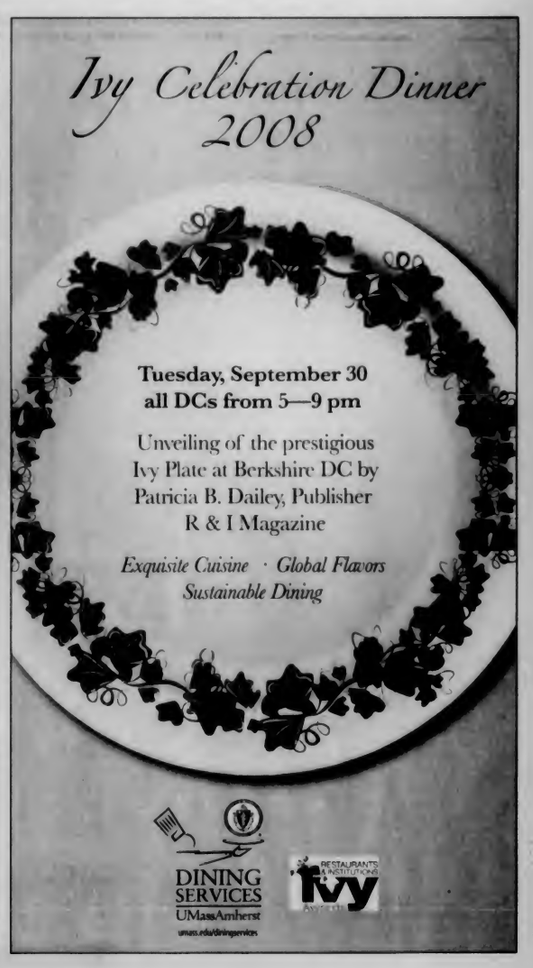
WASHINGTON — A new scientific study adds evidence that temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere fluctuated a bit over time, but that the sharp increase during the past few decades is bigger than anything in at least 1,300 years.

The report was published Tuesday in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences. Its conclusion is that temperature increased and decreased a little over the centuries, but the fluctuations were small enough that the line was roughly flat, like the shaft of a horizontal hockey stick. Then, from about 1980 to now, temperature increased sharply, more than any increase before, like the blade of the hockey stick.

For the past 10 years, climate-change skeptics have been calling the hockey stick bogus. Now the scientists who studied the climate record and produced the original hockey-stick graph have done a new study using more data from more sources and they got the same pattern.



The new study "establishes further evidence that the recent warming isn't just part of a typical cycle," said climatologist Michael Mann, director of the Earth System Science Center at Pennsylvania State University.



"Of course, this alone doesn't establish the cause of that warming – that it must be due to human influences," Mann said. That's left to other scientific studies of the climate.

Forces of nature, changes in the output of the sun's energy and volcanic eruptions, and random variation explain the changes in climate before industrial times, Mann said. But only if human factors are taken into account, particularly the production of long-lasting, heat-trapping gases from burning fossil fuels, can scientists explain the unusually high recent temperature increase, he said.

Mann's group's study collected additional data for the centuries before the mid-19th century, when scientists began recording temperatures.

Their previous study depended on tree rings, and some critics said it was not a reliable way to reconstruct past climate over a long period.

Just Justice

Chris Amorosi

My housemates brought up an anecdote while we debated the right to bear arms, a conversation provoked by the recent school shooting in Finland. The story was about a Texan bank robber who brandishes a gun during the course of his robbery and the several bank customers who responded by whipping out their pieces and blowing him away. Despite their intensions, I thought my housemate's example became an argument against allowing civilians with no respect for life to open fire in a public space.

I don't think anything I own or ever will own should be defended with deadly force. In the case of the apocryphal bank robber, the money in the bank is probably insured and the lone bandit type will almost certainly be caught. Do many robberies end with tellers and patrons being massacred after handing over their money? How can we expect every Joe Six-Shooter to outdraw every robber of every shade without getting himself or others killed?

Vigilante justice is an oxymoron but it appeals to morons when faced with situations that are out of their control. The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, were followed by a few random attacks on Muslims and seemingly Muslim people and property. A similar mentality lurks within those who tote guns. They want to feel in control, regardless if they are or not.

The Batman imitators in "The Dark Knight" were an idealized portrayal of such people, but in real life there is no Batman to shoo them away before someone gets hurt. Even so, Batman himself was responsible for innocent people dying. Batman and a Ku Klux Klansman are two sides of the vigilante coin. Justice becomes lost when life loses value.

Such is the wisdom enumerated in the Declaration of Independence and its iconic phrase that all men deserve "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." It's easy to reconcile that statement with the second Amendment, as the right to bear arms is clearly intended to safeguard those ideals from outside oppression. When the second amendment is twisted to shield those who exact their own justice with a gun, all lives no longer share equal protection.

When the Second Amendment is twisted to shield those who exact their own justice with a gun, all lives no longer share equal protection.

If society decides that it is preferable to shoot rather than apprehend, what incentive is there for the criminal to participate in society? Evidentially about half of released prisoners agree there isn't one, according to recent a Department of Justice study on recidivism. It's ironic considering the idea of a "penitentiary" was created as a place where "penitents" could learn how to be reintegrated into society.

Some years ago, convicts won the right to equal medical treatment when considered for organ transplants in California. Organ failure is a large threat in prisons, where the population is exposed to AIDS and hepatitis C. Last year, Congress authorized a few million dollars in funding for more educational program so convicts can get GEDs and training certificates.

Instead of leaving prison with only training in being a criminal, a convict with some education is more employable. The results of these slight efforts show that there are convicts who, when given the opportunity to gain respect, will do their best to earn it.

"Hah, why should we pay for criminals' education and well-being?" belches Joe Six-Shooter, stroking his diminutive gun barrel. Well, what are the other options? Shall we start killing more convicts? I'd rather not see justice returned to a medieval state as it is in Iran or Saudi Arabia. Shall we solve recidivism by simply imprisoning most felons for life? The costs of supporting that kind of prison system surely eclipses the cost of helping convicts back into society and into the economy.

Just like there are those who will brandish their guns and machismo until they're cold and dead, there will be criminals who are impervious to rehabilitation. Those prisoners, probably with life or very long sentences, shouldn't be given the same benefits accorded to the prisoners with potential.

Let the hopeless cases serve society with labor until they can't anymore, and let them die with minimal luxury because they certainly deserve it. The prison population should be rewarded. Bribing them into good behavior gives convicts as much actual incentive to refrain as treating them like livestock does.

Civilization wasn't created with prisons and punishments but with community and the preservation of life. A community with the most participation from its members flourishes, yet the police state invariably fails to prevent the disorder it intended to quash.

Saving diversity of thought

Greg Collins

I rarely complain. I rarely whine. And I rarely make pleas.

But this simply cannot go on any longer.

Recent news that an instructor from the history department, in conjunction with a chaplain on campus, was going to offer credits to students who volunteer for Sen. Obama's presidential campaign exemplifies the most toxic intellectual aspect of universities today: an implicit but powerful force, which stifles conservative thought and encourages liberal thought.

The credits-for-Obama independent study appeared to be heading toward full implementation until statewide and nationwide educators and concerned UMass students, including myself, began to uncover the program's details.

Not until I asked for more information about the study did I receive an e-mail explaining that students who wanted to work for Sen. McCain's campaign would get credit also, as if supporting McCain were a mere afterthought.

Literally two minutes later after receiving this e-mail, I was sent another message saying that the whole program had been canceled.

Let's reiterate the obvious: the ultimate goal of academic environments is intellectual diversity. Not a climate which encourages just liberal thought and not a climate which promotes just conservative thought.

Instead, an environment in which a wide spectrum of viewpoints is carefully considered, exhaustively discussed and meticulously challenged.

But most of the time this does not happen at UMass because liberal thought is pushed, advanced and endorsed to students in all sorts of ways. Just this week, in addition to the credits for Obama fiasco, Commonwealth College is playing "Fahrenheit 9/11," an anti-George Bush, anti-conservative documentary.

Remember, the important point is not that this movie is being played. Rather, it is that a documentary challenging "Fahrenheit 9/11" will not also be played.

But the problem goes deeper than that. Professors are simply not dedicated to studying the reality of human nature when they teach and write. Instead, they are committed to promoting a way of thinking about the world in an overwhelmingly theoretical and idealistic nature.

They will structure curriculums to reflect this theoretical approach and assign textbooks and course readings to direct class discussions in accordance with this framework.

For instance, in the social sciences, how many times have we talked in class and read in course readings about "rational actors," as if people were robotic thespians on stage making mechanical decisions completely removed from life-and-death situations?

How many times have we been assigned readings by scholars who explain their analysis to fit their own preconceived theories of how they think the world should work, instead of allowing empirical date and historical events to shape these conclusions?

Professors are simply not dedicated to studying the reality of human nature when they teach and write.

Preconceived notions are rampant on campus. For example, common consensus at UMass dictates that blacks are perceived most vehemently by the white establishment as "other."

This is complete nonsense. The biggest bloc on this campus that is seen as "different," "unusual," and "other" are students who hold conservative beliefs. I have had conversations with professors who consider me as such implying that what I believe is somehow alien and intellectually primitive in comparison to conventional liberal wisdom. Professors will talk about conservatism as if it were a foreign ideology with foreign principles.

Just look at what happens nowadays if you dare question the Justice for Jason movement. You are vilified by students, professors and the SGA as a white racist.

News flash: the majority of Americans oppose affirmative action. The majority of Americans oppose gay marriage. And the majority of Americans don't think a woman has a constitutional right to abort her child.

Think to yourself, how many times in class have professors raised the possibility that global warming is cyclical and not an existential threat to our existence?

How many times have your professors said that there are legitimate reasons to oppose gay marriage?

How many times have your professors noted that the unique aspect of American slavery was not that it existed, but that it ended so quickly in the West in comparison to the rest of the world?

This pattern is not confined to professors. The UMass administration as a whole should also be held directly responsible for hosting a large number of liberal scholars and politicians, like Deval Patrick and John Kerry, without inviting a similar number of conservatives.

The fact that diversity of thought is restricted at UMass prevents our otherwise exemplary institution from joining the ranks of other elite American universities, which do encourage freedom of thought.

But until administrators and professors recognize this implicit indoctrination, they are as much part of the problem as the one-sided intellectual environment they encourage.

In the end, they are not hurting themselves. In the end, they are not hurting their salaries. And in the end, they are not hurting their employment prospects.

In the end, they are hurting the people who have the most to gain from diversity of thought.

They are hurting you – the student.

Hope for Democrats in the election cycle

Scott Harris

The final verdict is in and, for the Republican Party, it is not pretty.

For decades we have been told by conservatives that the only way to keep an economy robust and growing was to cut down the regulation, give corporations all sorts of tax loopholes and throw oversight out the window. With the current financial crisis and the $700 billion our generation is putting forth to bail it out, we have seen what the true consequences are under unbridled Republican control over the levels in Wall Street. Failure – complete and utter failure.

Only this failure is not just the kind that gets Republican members of Congress thrown in prison. It is not the kind of failure that can be cleaned up by a "throw-the-bums-out" mentality come Election Day. It is the type of failure that has and will continue to ripple through the urban, suburban and rural communities alike.

The massive spending spree on behalf of the wealthy and well-connected will haunt any ambitious program that Democrats may be interested in for years to come. It will take decades to repair the damage done to our nation's finances. Not to mention, there are many lengths we will have to do to regain the respect around the world that America deserves – if we can get it back at all.

What is even more startling is that there is no evidence to suggest that the Republican Party feels responsible or accountable for any of this. In fact, it looks like they think it is a joke. Last Wednesday, members of Congress, the White House and the Secretary of the Treasury reached a framework deal on the financial sector bailout.

A couple hours after they announced they had reached a deal, John McCain declared that he was suspending his campaign to return to Washington and pull together a bipartisan consensus for the sake of the nation's taxpayers. But when John McCain arrived, he torpedoed the bipartisan agreement already on the table.

The massive spending spree on behalf of the wealthy and well–connected will haunt any ambitious program that Democrats may be interested in for years to come.

By the way, his campaign advertisements never came off the networks, his surrogates never stopped going on news shows to attack Barack Obama and he never stopped giving interviews. His campaign offices never shuttered. His press office never stopped issuing releases.

By the way, the agreement reached on Sunday is basically identical to the one reached on the previous Wednesday. John McCain has voiced his tentative support.

By the way, all of this just happened to coincide with a precipitous drop in the polls and numbers showing that an overwhelming number of Americans preferred Barack Obama to John McCain in dealing with the crisis. An aide to House Republican Leader John Boehner confirmed to Politico.com, a political journal organization based in Washington, D.C., on Friday that the main motivation behind breaking down the deal was to ensure that John McCain got some credit for saving the deal.

It is unclear to me at this point whether McCain's campaign really felt that this reckless stunt would turn the election in his favor, but the results are unmistakably clear. The American people were not nearly as dumb as McCain believed they were, and Obama's lead appears to be growing and consolidating around the magic number of 50 percent.

The Page reported on Sunday that McCain's campaign is worried about the backlash against their stunt and on Monday will seek to begin a new message that centers on attacking Obama for alleged tax increases and issues of national security. Considering that the non-partisan Annenberg Polic Center's FactCheck Web site has listed McCain's attacks on Obama's tax plans and national security positions as among the most untrue and distorted, we can all assume that the Republican's campaign will only get more dishonorable and disgraceful from this point forward.

However, in the final analysis, that really is not the point. The Republican Party has been played on strings by Wall Street and is now suddenly anti-Wall Street. Now, the biggest problem in Washington is earmarks.

Wait. Now the only way to get off of foreign oil is to drill for it here on our coast.

Does that mean tax breaks for record-profit-earning oil companies? No. If you want to know who supported that, look at the Democrats. Perhaps the Republicans believe that if they lie and lie and keeping lying, eventually a few of them will stick, and it will be enough to squeak by in November.

The last week or so in this election cycle has confirmed one undisputable fact – the Republican Party simply cannot be trusted in positions of national power. Americans, in general, seem to be awakening to this fact and now states that we considered lost, even by me, after the selection of Sarah Palin as the Republican vice presidential candidate, like North Carolina, Ohio and Missouri have shown huge surges in support of the Democrat. Of course it is too early to declare Obama the winner, but I doubt we will be seeing Bob Shrum fret and wring his hands over the next few weeks.

That is until, perhaps, John McCain's next irresponsible and immature stunt.

Acknowledging Iran and our future

Ted Rogers

It's too bad about the economic crisis happening this week. With the huge meltdown on Wall Street, the proposed corporate bailout and the ensuing craziness in the campaigns, we missed something really interesting. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the president of Iran, spoke at the United Nations just last Tuesday.

Like any sane person, I am in total disgust over his politics and his militarily expressed form of Islam. He presides over some of the worst human rights violations seen in the modern world. A good deal of his rhetoric is dangerously irresponsible. But, damn, is that dude entertaining.

Can you name another world leader who refuses to wear a tie because it's "a symbol of western decadence?" Is there another world leader who has been laughed out of Columbia University for saying that homosexuality doesn't exist in Iran? Outside of our own president, there is not a politician out there who can gaffe his way around the stage like Ahmadinejad.

His speech was nothing out of the ordinary, really. There were the 60-plus mentions of God's will, the vows never to stand down from starting a nuclear energy program and the expected blaming of Jews for all of the world's problems. Offensive to the extreme? Yes. Foolish? You bet. Should we actually be worried about Iran's mean-spirited president? Well, that question is a little harder to answer.

Americans have always had a troublesome relationship with Iran. In the '70s, there was the revolution and then the subsequent oil embargo and hostage crisis. That did not stop us from selling them all sorts of weapons during the '80s, mainly to fund nun-beheading rebels in Central America and to damage Iraq's military. Yes, mistakes were made.

After that, the relations between the United States and Iran stayed quiet yet frosty until Dubya gave his infamous "Axis of Evil" speech. Since then, citizens of both countries had been placing bets on when America will open up a can of "They Have Weapons of Mass Destruction" on Iran.

History aside, should we be worried about what kind of threat Iran poses to the United States?

Yes. Well, no. Possibly.

The truth is, there a far too many different situations and far too many confounding variables to say one way or another that Iran poses an immediate danger to America that calls for any extraordinary measures.

The first situation that needs to be addressed is the Israel question. Iranian officials have made it a talking point to "drive Israel back into the sea." On their part, the Israelis have vowed to bomb anything in Iran that remotely looks like it could produce an atomic bomb.

Should this concern us?

There are a couple things to consider. First, contentious Arabic nations have been talking about driving Israel into the sea since 1948. The number of times this has been accomplished is significantly fewer.

History aside, should we be worried about what kind of threat Iran poses to the United States?

It should also be noted that Israel's military is quite capable of holding its own. During the Six Day War, Israel trounced several nations in less than a week. In the case of war breaking out in that region, I don't think it is Israel's continued existence that we should be worried about. That's not to say we shouldn't provide support to the only democracy in the region, but we also shouldn't try to exaggerate the threat.

Another situation that needs to be brought up is the possibility of Iran's acquiring nuclear weapons. Should we be worried about this? Yes. City-annihilating bombs are a pretty big concern. How should we go about diffusing the situation? It's complicated.

I don't know if you caught the presidential debates on Friday, but there were two different opinions of how to solve the problem. Obama's plan is to personally engage in high-level talks with the Iranians.

McCain scoffed at this idea, saying it would "legitimize" the rogue nation's status. His plan would be to place more embargoes on Iran and possibly start up a "league of Democracies" to put further pressure on Iran.

Both plans have strengths and weaknesses, but I will say this – if a country can drop a legitimate nuclear bomb on a city, that is legitimate enough for me. I'd feel more comfortable with US dialogues to Iran – no matter who wins our election.

Of course, there are also the Iranian people to consider. Most of them are rational, pro-Western and utterly against any type of military action on either side. Ahmadinejad would have a tough time trying to convince them to engage in a fight to the death with the West.

In the end, it goes like this – Iran will continue to cause problems for us in the future. That's more or less something that we have to acknowledge. How the United States deals with it, however, can be decided. The situation with Iran needs both tact and a certain amount of prodding, and it is up to the next president to deal with it.

Bassnectar and beyond

San Francisco DJ brings his eclectic mixes to Northampton

By Matt Solomon
Collegian Staff

Bassnectar brings the heat to NoHo Northampton's Pearl Street Theater was graced with an explosion of sound, color and light in the form of Lorin Ashton, who gave a sold-out crowd of hippies everything he had to offer Wednesday night.

Ashton, better known as Bassnectar, is a highly-acclaimed and immensely popular San Francisco DJ.

The DJ's Web site refers to Bassnectar as a "freeform project that merges music, art, new media, social involvement, and community values dedicated to a constantly-evolving ethos of collaborative creation, self-reinvention and boundary-pushing experimentation."

Wednesday night was no exception and proved to be a show for the record books.

The record? Sweatiest concert ever.

The dark and murky downstairs ballroom was packed to a sticky, humid brim. Many fans walked into the dance hall dry and left dripping in perspiration.

The bass pounded so hard that the walls vibrated, shaking the audience's bodies to the core.

The music, which sampled from an eclectic grouping of artists including the likes of Nirvana and the Notorious B.I.G., was cleverly wound together. With original melodies and shiver-inducing sound effects, in the end, the performance was a true entity.

In the background, behind his DJ-setup, was a large, three-piece screen, flashing images ranging from current-event news programs from the Great Sphinx of Giza to blooming onions to city skyscrapers to splashing colors.

Some of the images were fairly shocking and could be considered controversial, but this crowd was not easily unraveled by uncensored art. They kept their cool.

Bassnectar balanced his music quite nicely and kept the crowd both amused and in awe.

He typically has a large amount of energy, hopping up and down, shifting side-to-side with his long, brown locks flowing violently through the air.

On this night, Lorin truly had it. Call it passion, talent or divine intervention. To put it simply, he made something out of nothing.

The DJ created an ambience that allowed him to connect with the crowd in a call-and-response fashion, which only fueled the madness.

It is true this concert would not have been anything special without the fans, but Bassnectar made sure to lead the pack.

According to "The San Francisco Weekly," Bassnectar has "probably the largest cult following of any DJ in San Francisco."

It is not surprising after his performance. He brings the funk, and he brings it hard.

During his shows, the energy can be felt bouncing off the walls like static electricity. The excitement level of his loyal fans is through the roof while Bassnectar is on stage, flaring wild and jerky motions, like a mad chemist on acid.

He can't be contained.

"Resistance is fertile!" he exclaimed.

His music has that special ingredient that makes you want to shake and get down to his funky sounds. The music goes all night, and it'll make you feel all right.

Jenny Lewis' latest album sends listeners on ultimate 'Acid' trip

By Joe Stahl
Contributing Staff

Before the release of "Acid Tongue," Jenny Lewis' latest CD, the performer made a YouTube video that flashed a toll-free number for people to call and listen to the album's title track.

Hearing the soulful song over the phone was as if Lewis was singing just for you. Well, she is.

She sings for you and every one else, including the "boulevard freaks" and "housewives losing their minds," as she says on "Sing a Song for Them."

Lewis makes "Acid Tongue" an album to please the masses as she dabbles in various genres from southern rock to chamber pop.

The album is in a far different category than Lewis' solo debut, "Rabbit Fur Coat."

This time, she trades in her ex-counterparts, The Watson Twins, for bigger names like Elvis Costello and She & Him's Zooey Deschanel. Though, Lewis does keep M. Ward and Johnathan Rice around just as she did on "Rabbit Fur Coat."

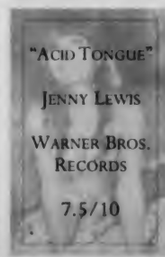
With the influences of these big stars, Lewis loses the quiet, folksy spirit that stretched from beginning to end on "Rabbit Fur Coat."

Looking back on her career as the front woman of Rilo Kiley, Lewis has been known to be a bearer of musical surprises and a definite risk taker.

She took a gamble with Rilo Kiley, transitioning from the craftily narrated "More Adventurous" to the funk-pop fusion, "Under the Blacklight."

"Under the Blacklight" was not anticipated by die-hard Rilo Kiley fans, but it was well-received by critics and gained the band a larger mainstream fan base.

Whether Lewis is off on her own or with Rilo Kiley, she doesn't fall short when it comes to her songwriting.



She cuts deep with sharp-edged lyrics that span from dramatically self-absorbed ("Acid Tongue") to muscular and rough ("The Next Messiah").

The singer-songwriter isn't afraid to roll in the mud as she sings all over the spectrum, from addiction to politics.

She even sings about her mom on the high energy, Little Richard-esque song, "Jack Killed Mom," a song that violently and humorously defends the honor of her mother.

Because this isn't a folk album, the songs aren't as densely packed with complex verses.

On the happily reminiscent piano ballad, "The Black Sand," Jenny croons "on the black sand" over and over.

Though her lyrics will always serve as her greatest craft, Lewis makes a fair tradeoff by diversifying soundscapes instead.

She develops a genuine southern-rock style with dark, syncopated foot drums and electric guitar plucks on the beefy and rugged, "The Next Messiah."

On "Carpetbaggers," when Lewis trades off vocals with Elvis Costello, the English musician's distinct nasally voice is resurrected with up-tempo country.

"Acid Tongue" was completed in a mere three weeks.

Recording at Sound City Studios in Van Nuys, Calif., it is evident that much of the album was recorded live by how unrefined it turned out.

Nevertheless, the album does have a few cleaned-up tunes.

The two most polished and mature songs on the album are the ones that strongly emulate the Adult-oriented rock sound of Fleetwood Mac. "Godspeed" and "Sing a Song For Them," serving as the middlemen of the album's ranging styles.

"Pelican Bay," the bluesy-sexy song only available via the Web, is filled with reverb, lush vocalizations and a heavy bass guitar that sure to make you sway from side to side and snap your fingers.

Lewis has served as one of the greatest spectacles in music today.

Despite her well-known influences, she mystically pulls off a fresh sound with every album she creates.

As Lewis' musicianship grows, she is free to try anything and don't think she won't. She is a renegade – and she isn't going anywhere.

Jenny Lewis' latest album, "Acid Tongue," released on September 23, has a refreshing, new sound and draws inspiration from all genres.

Flu to reach record high

By Kristen Gerencher
MarketWatch

SAN FRANCISCO – Americans ready to take up arms and noses against the bug that causes the seasonal flu have plenty of ammunition this year.

The federal government expects a record amount of flu vaccine to be on hand at clinics, doctors' offices, drugstores and certain retail outlets in the next few months.

About 140 million to 146 million doses will be available through the end of the flu season, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Most vaccines are in the form of injectable flu shots, but up to 12 million doses can be applied as a nasal spray in healthy people ages two to 49.

There are six manufacturers for this year's supply and no production bottlenecks reported so far, said Tony Fiore, a medical epidemiologist for the CDC in Atlanta.

"We've been lucky and were able to produce it quite effectively and ship it out in late August," he said.

Consumers who haven't done so yet can get vaccinated right away since the immune response lasts throughout the flu season, Fiore said. Influenza typically doesn't peak until February, but some years it starts early and strong, such as the severe flu season that struck suddenly in October, 2003. Vaccination is available later in the season, but it often pays to act sooner.

"Getting it done earlier is better for two reasons. It means you don't forget and don't find your physician stops vaccinating or doesn't have it," Fiore said. "The other is you never know when we'll have an early season. If you've made the decision to get vaccinated, there's no reason to delay it and risk having, in your particular community, a peak in October."

Each year, influenza sends 200,000 Americans to the hospital and kills 36,000 on average, most of them elderly or with compromised immune systems.

The CDC says anyone who wants to reduce their chances of getting the flu and doesn't have an allergy to chicken eggs can get vaccinated, but certain groups should make sure they don't miss out.

The agency recommends that all children age six months through 18 receive immunizations. The CDC also urges pregnant women, people over 50, residents of long-term-care facilities, those with chronic medical conditions and those in close contact with any of these vulnerable groups to get a vaccine.

"Essentially what they're saying is everybody should get a flu vaccine," said Dr. Paul Gleaves, professor of microbiology and pediatrics at Baylor College of Medicine in Houston.

Making the recommendations simpler and urging the vaccination of all kids six months of age and older is likely to benefit people over 65 as well, he said. "They'll be less likely to be exposed to the virus."

Some parents and health-care providers underestimate how serious flu complications can be for children under five, Fiore said, noting their flu-related hospitalization rates approach those of the elderly.

During the 2006-07 flu season, about one in five children age six months to 23 months were fully vaccinated, according to the CDC. Only 17 percent of children age two to five had protection.

"The coverage rates for flu vaccine are pretty low in every group that we look at," Fiore said.

For the last decade, the CDC has recommended that pregnant women get vaccinated during flu season. A new study published in the Sept. 17 edition of the New England Journal of Medicine suggests pregnant women who forgo their annual immunization are passing up the chance to protect not only themselves but their babies.

In a study of 140 pregnant women in Bangladesh, flu vaccination reduced by 63 percent the occurrence of lab-confirmed influenza in infants up to six months of age, the study found. Similarly, it cut the incidence of flu-like respiratory illness with fever in infants by 29 percent and by 36 percent in the mothers.

"There's no guarantee, but most years the flu vaccine will prevent most flu, and now we know when you immunize the mother it will immunize the baby," said Dr. Mark Steinhoff, a professor of pediatrics and international health at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health in Baltimore. The flu vaccine isn't approved for children under six months of age.

Women who want to offer their soon-to-be newborns protection from the flu but are concerned about the possible effects of vaccine preservatives can request a flu vaccine that doesn't contain thimerosal, Steinhoff said.

Sanofi Pasteur, one of the largest suppliers of U.S. flu vaccine, is offering preservative-free vaccines in about a quarter of the 58 million doses it's providing this year, company spokeswoman Donna Cary said.

Getting a flu vaccine remains the best way to avoid contracting the virus, public-health experts say. It takes about two weeks to develop antibodies that protect against the bug.

Early each year, scientists try to determine which three strains of the flu are most likely to circulate later in the year and include them in vaccine production.

The strains chosen for last year's vaccine proved less than an optimal match to the ones that actually ended up proliferating, Fiore said. Preliminary CDC studies estimate it was only 44 percent effective against last year's dominant strains, he said.

"In a good season we might hope for 80 percent to 90 percent" effectiveness, Fiore said. "We lost some degree of effectiveness, but it was by no means futile."

That means people who received a vaccine last year may have gotten less sick than they otherwise would have had they gone without any vaccine protection, he said, possibly resulting in a few days of missed work rather than a doctor's visit or hospital stay.

Flu symptoms can include fever, body aches, headache, tiredness, sore throat, cough and a runny or stuffy nose. Other ways to limit the spread of flu are washing your hands frequently, covering your coughs and sneezes and staying home from work or school when you're sick.

Working overtime

Regardless of how this season finishes, the number of overtime games are going to stand out the most about the Minutewomen's season.

UMass has needed extra time in six of this season's nine games and has three ties. In the past, the Minutewomen have a precedent for undecided games working to their advantage.

The last time UMass finished a season with three ties was 1993. That team went 17-3-3 and beat Providence and Connecticut in the NCAA tournament before losing to North Carolina.

If there's anything these overtime games have proven; it's that the Minutewomen have the conditioning to wear opponents down in extended play.

Out of the six overtime contests, UMass has one loss to Binghamton in the season-opener. Since then, the Minutewomen have yet to lose when they play 110 minutes.

"I guess the philosophy is that if you've been there, you can get back," Rudy said. "They have the willingness to push through fatigue."

Another factor in the overtime games is senior Vanessa Patry. The forward has five goals and three assists this season.

She scored the game-winner in both overtime victories against Holy Cross on Sept. 14 and St. Bonaventure last Friday.

October struggles

An Atlantic 10 berth looked almost certain for the Minutewomen after a successful non-conference schedule in 2007. They eventually went 2-5 in October, which forced them to miss the A-10 tournament.

Unless more injuries hit UMass, the main challenge will be avoiding another losing record during October. The schedule has the Maroon and White playing Friday and Sunday, a scenario Rudy calls a "double," for four weekends this month.

Last weekend was the only time the Minutewomen had to travel after a home game. After the win against SBU, UMass traveled five hours to Philadelphia to play Temple on Sunday.

Though the road trips can be relaxing, they also test a team's conditioning, especially when it plays as many overtime games as the Minutewomen have.

Rudy believes the toughest part of the schedule has yet to come. The double he expects to be the most difficult is the weekend of Oct. 24, when the Minutewomen play at La Salle and at Fordham.

The only match that is not part of the A-10 doubles schedule is at Rhode Island on Oct. 16.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Kelsey Anderson has two assists in her nine games started for UMass. The Minutewomen are undefeated in the Atlantic 10 Conference after tying Temple 0-0 in double overtime last weekend.

Senior Katelyn Orlando scored two goals in the second half of the Minutewomen's 5-4 loss to No. 3 Syracuse last Sunday. UMass (7-3) prepares for two home games this weekend; Friday against Siena and Saturday it takes on Georgetown.

Widdall helps in UMass victories

FIELD HOCKEY from page 8

She is three points shy of 13, which would set a new career-high in points.

Orlando scored two goals against Syracuse, a team that has given up 1.20 goals-per-game all season. Three of her goals have come against ranked opponents. Two of her goals this season were game-winners for UMass.

Historically, Orlando has done well in October, scoring four career goals and four career assists.

She is one of the fastest players on the team and is becoming more scouted by opposing teams as the season progresses.

With more attention being focused on the midfield this season, Orlando is a player who will get better looks on offense and has the composure to put the team on her shoulders if she has the open shot.

Saving grace

Freshman goalie Alesha Widdall made 19 saves in three games this week, earning the win in two, including an 11-save effort against Albany.

The weekend was the biggest test for her this season. Against Syracuse, Widdall gave up five goals, but UMass gave up a wealth of penalty corners, causing her to play in the disadvantage for most of the game.

However she faired much better against the Great Danes. Her awareness of Albany's defensive tendencies gave the Minutewomen an advantage and helped them turn the game around in the second half.

She has shown great composure, and her ability to think on the move and call out plays against teams like Albany and Syracuse enhances the credibility of Sowry's young defense.

Lima's fate undetermined

Minutewomen in good shape, not affected by extra minutes

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the few negative things to come out of the Massachusetts women's soccer team's win against St. Bonaventure on Friday was the fate of midfielder Vanessa Lima.

Lima is suffering a high hamstring injury but played just over seven minutes in the second half against the Bonnies before coming back out of the game. The injury bothered her the entire time she was in as she labored through each possession.

UMass coach Jim Rudy eventually called for senior Melissa Toulouse to intentionally kick the ball out of bounds to get Lima out of the game.

"She all but took herself out of the game," Rudy said. "[Thursday] she said she was at full speed, so I wasn't going to put her in until late. I was going to make sure she had one really long warm-up, and it didn't work out."

UMass W. Soccer

After Friday's game, Rudy decided against playing Lima anymore until she is completely healed. However, it has not yet been determined how long the redshirt senior will need to sit out.

Unless her condition gets drastically better, Lima will sit this weekend against George Washington and Richmond. Beyond this weekend, her playing status will be determined by how she feels next week.

"Those things don't go away in a week," Rudy said. "She needs a lot of rehab, stretching and some rest with it too."

See W. SOCCER on page 6

Junior forward Christina Adams and the Minutewomen hope to be more successful than last October with their difficult schedule.

Orlando shows versatility

Using midfield improves UMass' performance in '08

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team is off to its best start since its 8-2 run during the 2000-01 season.

The 0.95 scoring margin of the Minutewomen (7-3) is the best in the Atlantic 10 Conference and makes UMass the toughest team in the A-10 to score on.

The Minutewomen have attacked opposing defenses, firing the ball on opposing nets 89 total times, good for second in the conference.

UMass Field Hockey

The inclusion of the midfield in UMass coach Justine Sowry's game plan this season has done wonders for the Minutewomen. Senior midfielder Erin Parker's four assists account for nearly a third of the team's total assists. Parker's three goals ranks her third on the team, and her intensity is infectious throughout the team.

In the Maroon and White's latest game, against No. 2 Syracuse (10-0), the Minutewomen overcame a four-goal deficit at halftime to nearly upset the Orange but fell short in the final minutes of the game. However, Parker, along with co-captain Mary Shea, anchored the midfield and spread the ball out to meet the Syracuse defense step for step.

This focus enabled UMass to beat No. 18 Albany in the same weekend, holding the Great Danes to one goal.

Sophomore Makaela Potts is younger than both Shea and Parker, but her field vision is among the best on the team. Potts, one of the main components of the penalty corner unit, picks apart opposing defenses and is constantly aware of her open teammates when she realizes that she's not at the best angle to score a goal. Her two assists on the season came during penalty opportunities.

After last weekend play that featured two nationally-ranked opponents, the Minutewomen proved they can run with the best teams in the country.

SENIORITY RULES

Senior forward Katelyn Orlando showed versatility over the weekend, scoring three goals, as UMass went 2-1 on the week. Orlando's five goals tie her with Jill Powers for the team lead. Her 17 shots is the second-highest total on the team, making 2008 her third straight season with 15 shots or more.

See FIELD HOCKEY on page 6

Sophomore Makaela Potts moves past Syracuse in last Sunday's game. Potts has three goals and two assists this season.

Richmond's loss secures top spot for James Madison

Rhode Island winless in conference, Hofstra's defense important in wins

BY KYLE PREDKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

For the second straight week, the No. 1 team in the Football Championship Series was knocked off its pedestal. Last week it was Appalachian State, this week it was Richmond. On Saturday, No. 19 Villanova was the team to deliver the 26-20 loss to No. 1 Richmond.

Richmond (3-2, 2-1 Colonial Athletic Association) scored first with a field goal, but Villanova (3-1, 1-0 CAA) controlled the rest of the game by the leg of Joe Marcoux, the CAA Football Special Teams Player of the Week. Marcoux kicked for 15 points for the Wildcats, including a career-long 48-yard field goal in the fourth quarter to push Villanova to the win.

CAA Football

The Spiders' defense, averaging 53 rushing yards per game, had trouble with Villanova's running game. With the help of Aaron Ball, CAA Football Offensive Player of the Week, Villanova ran for 226 yards. Richmond ran for 83 yards in the match-up.

JAMES MADISON 24, MAINE 10

By beating Maine this weekend, No. 2 James Madison extended its winning streak to four. Maine (2-3, 0-2 CAA) failed to hold its opponent in the second half. With 13 minutes left in the fourth quarter, the score was tied, but James Madison (4-1, 2-0 CAA) walked away with 14 unanswered points for the win.

For the second time this season JMU, averaging 265.4 rushing yards per game, ran for more than 300 yards. The Black Bears gained 154 rushing yards, but 82 would come from freshman Jared Turcotte. The native of Lewiston, Maine, was honored by his performance and earned his spot as the CAA Football Rookie Player of the Week.

James Madison's win, along with Richmond's loss, secured the Dukes as the top rank in the FCS. JMU heads into the weekend hosting Hofstra (2-2, 1-0 CAA) on Saturday.

BOSTON COLLEGE 42, RHODE ISLAND 0

Rhode Island was blanked this weekend by Boston College, adding to the Rams's difficult season. The Eagles (3-1) dominated Rhode Island (1-4, 0-2 CAA) holding the Rams to 53 rushing yards. Rhode Island held Boston College to 27 passing yards, but attempts to stop the Eagles' running game failed as BC ran for 289 yards and five touchdowns.

HOFSTRA 43, STONY BROOK 3

Hofstra came out this weekend with an easy win as they bowled over Stony Brook, 43-3. Hofstra's defense was the key factor in its victory, creating four turnovers that led to a combined 26 points. The Pride put up a total of 316 yards, but the strong Hofstra defense held Stony Brook (1-4) to 211 total yards.

NORTHEASTERN 27, UC DAVIS 10

With the help of Nate Thellen, CAA Football Defensive Player of the Week, Northeastern won over UC Davis (1-3) this weekend, 27-10. Thellen earned his spot by intercepting three passes, one he returned 92 yards for a touchdown. The Huskies' (1-4, 0-0 CAA) defense played an important role providing the offense with six turnovers and holding Davis scoreless beyond the first quarter.

Marcoux vital for Villanova, running back leads Liberty

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

After climbing the rankings in the Football Championship Subdivision and attaining the top spot, Richmond (3-2) wasn't able to maintain the No. 1 position for more than a week.

Following two games in which the Spiders dominated at home at UR Stadium, defeating opponents Towson (2-3) and Maine (2-3), 44-17, in consecutive weeks, Richmond faced struggles on the road against previously ranked No. 19 Villanova (3-1), losing 20-26.

Though able to move the ball in the air, Richmond was unsuccessful in the running game. The Wildcats, however, ran the ball relentlessly and picked up yardage in chunks, ending the game with an average of 4.9 yards per rush. Villanova's win was the first in its history against a No. 1 opponent. Going forward, Richmond sits at the No. 6 and is away at VMI (2-2) this week.

Following a loss to Duke (3-1) to begin the season, James Madison (4-1) has reeled off impressive victories against previously ranked No. 3 Massachusetts (2-2), previously No. 1 ranked Appalachian State (2-2), and most recently Maine. The Dukes now sit atop the rankings and face mid-major Hofstra (2-2) at home Saturday.

Previously ranked No. 5 Northern Iowa (2-2) fell last week to Southern Illinois (2-1), 24-27, dropping them to the No. 10 spot.

The Panthers will be at home this week against Nicholls State (0-1), who had its first two games of the season cancelled due to Hurricanes Gustav and Ike, respectively.

FCS Top 25

This year in the FCS, only a handful of teams in the top 25 held an undefeated record coming into the week. Of those teams, Montana (4-0), New Hampshire (4-0) and Liberty (4-0) won its games to improve its records. Central Arkansas (4-1) and Tennessee State (4-1), however, were handed their first losses of the season.

After quietly climbing the rankings, the Bears were ranked as high as No. 12 before losing to a strong Tulsa (4-0) team this week. Central Arkansas looks to get back on the winning track when they host Sam Houston State on Saturday.

INDIVIDUAL PERFORMANCES

Place-kicker Joe Marcoux played a pivotal role in leading Villanova to victory against Richmond. Marcoux converted all four of his field goal attempts and both extra-point chances, accounting for 14 of the 26 points put up by Villanova.

Running back Rashad Jennings ran for a career-high 220 yards, leading Liberty to a 31-28 win against previously ranked No. 23 Youngstown State (2-3), the Flames first victory over a ranked opponent in the last 11 years. Jennings carried the ball only 29 times, averaging a strong 7.6 yards per carry and scoring three short-yardage touchdowns. The game extended Jennings' Big South record for most games with three rushing touchdowns, which now stands at five.

Sophomore running back Aaron Ball of Villanova, led the Wildcats in their upset over Richmond, carrying the ball 18 times for 123 yards and two touchdowns. This was the first game the Spiders's defense allowed 100 rushing yards, previously averaging 53 yards per game. The game set career highs for Ball in yards and longest run, a 63 yard scamper into the end zone.

This weekend's Pagan Pride Day brought individuals from many Pagan denominations together in a celebration of diversity and unity at once.

Pagan pride '08

Festival highlights exploration, acceptance

By Nina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

It is 3:00 p.m. on Sunday afternoon and the druids of Oakstone Grove are gathering on the lawn in front of the W.E.B DuBois Library. The eight druids, men and women dressed in white robes are leading a group of about 50 people in a public ritual celebrating Western Massachusetts Pagan Pride Day.

After the ritual ended, people began meandering back into the Student Union Ballroom, where the main events of the annual celebration were being held. The event, which went from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Sunday, showcased a variety of workshops, musical performances and area vendors selling pagan books, crystals, jewelry, wands and robes.

Pagan Pride Day celebrations occur around the country in the beginning of the fall. Local celebrations are overseen by the Pagan Pride Project, a national non-profit organization whose main goals are "the advancement of religion and elimination of prejudice and discrimination based on religious beliefs" according to the Western Mass. Pagan Pride Day Web site.

Micah Schneider, the local coordinator for the seventh annual Western Mass. Pagan Pride Day said the celebration was timed to coincide with Mabon, a pagan holiday that celebrates the fall equinox.

"In honor of the harvest holiday we collect food, blankets, clothing, some pet food and we donate to charity," said Schneider.

All donations went to the Western Massachusetts Food Bank. Charitable giving, along with the public ritual, are central aspects of most Pagan Pride celebrations.

This year, the Pagan Pride Day coordinators collaborated with SPIRALS, a UMass RSO which holds educational rituals and workshops to teach both pagans and non-pagans about paganism, said sophomore SPIRALS officer Josh Berkowitz.

"It's a good opportunity to see what other people are doing," said Berkowitz of the celebration.

Planning for the event began between five and six months in advance. Each year, the celebration invites a different local group to lead the ritual portion of the celebration to introduce people to different ways of exploring paganism. This year, attendance came from a variety of pagan traditions and did not necessarily share the same rituals or customs with others in attendance. This year was the first time Oakstone Grove led the ritual. In past years it has been led by the Sacred Space, Kitchen Witch Collective and the Society of Elder Faiths, among others.

Lyle Gray, a druid from Oakstone Grove, explained his ritual robes and what they symbolized.

"Our group has a tradition of wearing white robes, but not all groups are the same ... Four of the druids wear tabards," he said, pointing to the red mantle over his robe. "Their colors are linked with the four traditional elements: air, fire, water and earth."

The white covering on his head showed Egyptian influence, the medallion around his neck symbolized fire.

"You see this symbol in a lot of chemistry books," said Gray, pointing out the up-turned triangle enclosed in a circle. Although he has identified himself as a pagan for the past 25 years, Gray said that he still attends church. "For me it works, I've referred to myself as a hedge witch."

Several people attending the celebration agreed that dabbling in different religious traditions was a fundamental part of being pagan.

"I was raised Roman Catholic, but I didn't really connect with it. I've studied a lot of different paths: fairies, druidism, Celtic traditions. I just started looking for other things," said Karen Powers, one of the vendors at the event.

Schneider said that though many

Alarm forces study break

The W.E.B. Du Bois library fire alarm went off on Tuesday afternoon, signaling students and faculty to evacuate the building at approximately 1:35 p.m.

Terry Warner, the library's administrative services assistant director, later confirmed that the rather sensitive alarm was set off by the accumulation of dust from construction on the tenth floor. She said the library is currently working towards full wireless capability; the dust came from the installation of routers.

Warner said that everyone evacuated in a calm manner and that she was impressed with the responsibility students took in the evacuation. A number of students who took out the library's laptops even returned them to library personnel before leaving.

Nonetheless, students were not thrilled about the evacuation. Igor Galis, a freshman, recalled the reaction of several students who were doing last-minute studying for the ongoing mid-terms.

"Everyone swore and were like, 'You've got to be kidding me,'" as they packed their books and other belongings amidst the rush to leave the building, he said.

According to University of Massachusetts spokesperson Patrick Callahan, firemen arrived, checked the building and gave the clear that everything was safe. Students waiting outside on the grass returned to the building to resume exam preparation following a 40-minute wait.

Drum Corps leader honored

By Lisa DiMatteo
Collegian Staff

The Minutemen Marching Band's associate director, Thomas Hannum, was recognized for his life-long and world-wide influence and achievements in the world of percussion when he was inducted into the World Drum Corps Hall of Fame this past August.

The Drum Corps Hall of Fame is a non-profit organization that is dedicated to the honoring of people, such as Hannum, who have dedicated themselves to furthering and improving drum and bugle corps.

Aside from working as the Associate Director of the marching band at the University of Massachusetts since 1984, Hannum has also become known worldwide as a talented percussionist, teacher and clinician. The Drum Corps Hall of Fame recognized Hannum for his dedication, achievements and leadership skills that have influenced drum corps internationally.

Although Hannum has been passionate about music and drum corps ever since he first joined at nine years old, he didn't always view it as a career option. Going into college, Hannum didn't know how to read music because, in his drum corps, he was taught to play through a "listen, learn, and imitate" technique. So when he entered into his freshman year at West Chester University in Pennsylvania, he thought he was going to become a history teacher.

"I knew I loved to teach, so I figured I could be a teacher and have my summers off to teach the drums," Hannum said. So, he auditioned for the marching band at West Chester University and made the cut.

Through hard work, determination and a work ethic that he attributes to the hours of practice and commitment he endured during his younger years in the drum corps, Hannum graduated from West Chester University and entered into the graduate music program here at UMass. He worked as a teacher's assistant for the drum line and, after graduating with a masters in music, was offered the position as associate director of the marching band, one he currently holds.

Hannum, as well as teaching, has become involved with the corporate side of music, acting as a product consultant for major instrument-making companies. He said that the induction ceremony, which took place in Rochester, New York at the end of August, "brought me back to when I was nine years old and whole families were involved in [drum corps]."

He said, "[it] reminded me of why I got started, families at the ceremony are doing it because they love doing it."

The ceremony, Hannum said, was about "more passion and less corporate view."

While Hannum believes he has been extremely fortunate to be successful in a career that he loves, he is also quick to point out that at the beginning of his college education he really wasn't sure what his path would be.

"My story is that it really never is too late to do something you want to do," Hannum said. "It's important to bring in the idea that when you do go to school not everyone starts off knowing what they want to do, but it is never too late."

Greek groups meet

Pan-Hellenic council discuss community

By Netha Gill
Collegian Correspondent

This past Friday the National Pan-Hellenic Council (NPHC) held the annual Meet the Greeks in the Student Union ballroom at the University of Massachusetts.

It commenced with a mingling session between the Greeks and students who were not just from the UMass, but also from other universities in the Five College area and American International College in Springfield.

There was also a slide show of the organizations at different events throughout the years. DJ Nexxus was spinning the hip-hop, reggae, Haitian kompa and old school tracks.

The NPHC consists of the nine Black Greek-Letter Organizations (BGLO):

Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc., Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Inc., Omega Psi Phi Fraternity Inc., Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc., Iota Phi Theta Fraternity Inc., Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority Inc., Delta Sigma Theta Sorority Inc., Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc. and Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority Inc!

The main objective of the event according to Christina Ewing, president of Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority Inc., was for students "to network and get to know each organization."

Rick Pierre, president of the Alpha Kappa chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Inc., talked about the role two prominent members of his fraternity – Martin Luther King Jr. and Thurgood Marshall played in American history.

Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity Inc. had a PowerPoint presentation conducted by Michael Gary Jr. In it, he explained that all these organizations established were "geared towards social change."

He said his fraternity, unlike many others, was founded on a predominantly white campus. He also made it clear that achievement was the strong point within this fraternity.

He introduced every member within the Nu Tau chapter and highlighted his individual achievements.

Omega Psi Phi emphasized its value of brotherhood, as their motto is "friendship is essential to the soul."

Peter Gillo, president of the Delta Chi chapter also made it clear that this organization did not focus on the number of members but rather "the quality of man."

They ended with a chant sung by Grillo in which his brothers joined.

Delta Sigma Theta Sorority Inc.,the sorority with the largest number of members, at approximately 250,000, and 980 chapters, emphasized that they are about change and how they want prospective members to keep that in mind.

Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity Inc., was chartered last year and is the newest organization out of the NPHC to be introduced to the UMass community.

It was represented this year by Mike Moise, president of the Beta Beta chapter. He described Sigma as a journey and mentioned that the members are all leaders in their own way in the UMass community.

Moise also mentioned that this fraternity is the first and only to be constitutionally bound to a sorority, which is Zeta Phi Beta Sorority Inc.

'Real Talks' broach real issues in Black Student Union event

By LaToya M. Murphy
Collegian Staff

The Black Student Union (BSU) held another Real Talk discussion on being black in America this past Thursday on Kennedy Tower's 19th floor.

The discussion was fueled by a documentary that was shown on CNN in July 2008 called "Black in America."

Members of the BSU and many others discussed the issues that black people living in the United States deal with on a regular basis. These issues included education, incarceration rates, black women and their families, black men and how they are perceived by black women and how the race should go about improving its current status in America.

The event began with a simple icebreaker and then moved forward with the debate on black education.

The room held a nearly-unanimous belief that the higher crime rate among black Americans is incumbent upon a lack of access to education.

When asked why this was, SGA speaker Shaun Robinson said, "Education is the key, but when you deny me the opportunity, how can you be surprised when I pick up a gun?"

Others in the room seemed to disagree with Robinson in blaming society for the crime rate.

Shane Coleman, a junior student at UMass said, "We're past the age when a black man can blame the white man for putting him in prison."

"You can't blame the white man for your choosing to go out and sell drugs on the corner," said Danny Soto.

Moustarpher Tubega told the group "Opportunities are there. It's a choice."

The question was then raised of why so many black men, in particular, recurrently end up in prison.

"It is hard for them to start a life because it is nearly impossible to get anything once you get out," said BSU member Anim Aweh.

Aweh also referred to a statistic that she once heard stating that, "Companies are more likely to hire a white man who has been arrested over a black man who hasn't."

Police Log – Sept. 22–28

Compiled by Adam P. Coulter, Collegian Staff

"This weekend was particularly busy for the UMPD and the officers did an outstanding job in both responding to reports of crimes in progress and then in their proactive work in attempting to thwart crimes prior to their taking place," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald.

WEDNESDAY

Arthur Eugene McLaughlin, 24, of 84 Essex St. Weymouth, Mass., was arrested on Clark Hill Road as a result of a traffic stop at 12:21 a.m. and charged with failure to stop/yield, speeding and operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license.

FRIDAY

The strong smell of marijuana coming from room 2017 in Washington Tower dormitory at approximately 12:38 a.m. ultimately resulted in the arrest of six people who were charged with possession of a Class D drug and possession with the intent to distribute a Class D drug.

After the initial report from someone on the floor concerning the odor, officers got a warrant for the room which allowed them "full access to search all containers where marijuana might be kept," said Deputy Chief Archbald. During the search ziplock baggies containing marijuana and a scale were discovered.

The individuals arrested and charged were John P. Rodgers, 20, of 8 McKinley Rd. Peabody, Mass., Rebecca Jan Caldarella, 19, of 31 Fairmont Rd. Mahopac, NY, Nick Ruccione, 19, of 11 Hillside Rd. Ringwood, NJ, Liam Collins, 19, of 71 Mountain Rd. North Granby, CT, Alexandra L. Russell, 19, of 12 Hardscrabble Rd. North Salem, NY and Seamus Lawrence Munnelly, 19, of 19 Pearl St. Bellingham, Mass.

SATURDAY

Richard Rock Lalonde, 20, of 70 Scott Rd. Lanesborough, Mass., was arrested as a result of a disturbance on Kennedy Rd. at 1:06 a.m. and charged with disorderly conduct, resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest, assault and battery on a police officer and assault and battery. He allegedly also trespassed. Officials said officers from the UMPD were on general patrol when they spotted the subject yelling at a group of people as he was being restrained by some people on the scene. There was a victim who "was bleeding profusely from the face," said Archbald. While officers were separating Lalonde from the victim, he allegedly punched an officer in the face twice, resulting in the A&B on a police officer charge.

Peter Michael Cegelka, 22, of 7 Falcon Crest Dr. North Haven, Conn. was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue at 3:28 a.m. and charged with failure to stop/yield, OUI liquor and possessing an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle.

Allyn L. Eye, 23, of 288 Grantwood Dr. Amherst, Mass., was arrested at his home at 6:05 a.m. and charged with trespassing on state/county property, resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest and intimidating a witness.

Nicole Ilana Epstein, 19, of 258 Schley Pl. Teaneck, NJ, was arrested in Baker dormitory at 9:55a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug.

Thomas Watson, 20, of 9 Cedar Park Rd. Devonshire (Bermuda), ZZ, was arrested as a result of a traffic stop in Lot 32 I at 11:40 p.m. and charged with possession of marijuana, marked lanes violation, number plate violation to conceal ID, uninsured motor vehicle and operating a motor vehicle with a suspended registration. The vehicle Watson was driving was a Chevy Trailblazer but the plates on the truck belonged to a Mazda. He "swapped plates with another car," said Archbald.

Malcom Lahage, 19, of 474 Spring St. Marshfield, Mass., was arrested as a result of a domestic disturbance call to Lot 44 north of Sylvan dormitories at 11:50 p.m. and charged with disorderly conduct and possession of a Class D drug.

SUNDAY

Ian W. Woishnis, 25, of 783 Southeast St. Amherst, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant St. at 12:21 a.m. and charged with OUI liquor 2nd offense, marked lanes violation and carrying a dangerous weapon on school grounds. Archbald said while booking Woishnis, officers discovered he was concealing a spring assisted knife.

In Lot 33 at 12:53 a.m. two men not enrolled at UMass were observed by plain clothes UMPD officers trying to open car doors and enter into numerous vehicles in the lot. Thomas F. Hebb, 19, of 25 Fairview St. Chicopee, Mass., was arrested and charged with B&E vehicle/boat in the nighttime for felony, larceny over $250 and receiving stolen property over $250. Jeremy I. Hicks, 22, of 1428 Enfield St. Enfield, Conn., was arrested and charged with B&E vehicle/boat in the nighttime for felony and larceny over $250. The officers watched the two men, and when they observed them successfully break into a vehicle, they moved in. The items stolen included cash, an iPod device and an Alpine CD player faceplate.

"This is what I'm referring to when I talk about good proactive police work," said Archbald.

pagans identify with the Celtic pagan tradition, they also draw freely from religions from all over the world.

"I'm an Egyptian pagan," he said. Just as Catholics may identify with a particular patron saint, Schneider said that most pagans feel drawn to one or two particular "images of godhood."

Pagan Pride Day is meant not only to educate the public about paganism but also to provide a place for other pagans to connect with one another. Today, many pagans connect via the Internet, but they may not know many pagans in person. For teenagers like Hannah Laird, 13, of Williamsburg this may be one of the few opportunities to connect with the broader pagan community. This was Laird's first Pagan Pride Day.

"I really like the public ritual, and I really like the cloaks and hats," she said.

"It rules," agreed Allie Martineau, 13, of Florence. This is also her first time attending the celebration.

Schneider refuted the stereotype that all pagans wore black clothing and pointy hats, though several people at the celebration were dressed all in black, and at least two pointy witch's hats were spotted. "We're not all that different from everyone else. We're lawyers, doctors, schoolteachers. That stereotype is really not who pagans are."

Carol Fairbank, local coordinator for Eastern Mass. Pagan Pride Day held last weekend, praised the Western Mass celebration. "Great entertainment and awesome vendors ... the whole thing is beautiful."

Invisible campaigning

Adam McGillen

If you have ever had an imaginary friend, you know they have a tendency to tell you everything you want to hear. If you've ever witnessed American politics, you know it's not so much about policy as it is about hitting a delicate balance of words: saying what the majority of voters want to hear without ticking off too many other voters in the process.

So, then, it is clear that imaginary friends are perhaps the most powerful voices in an election. If only the candidates could figure out a way to use such an ingenious and influential political tool.

As crazy as it sounds, the joke is on you. In many swing states, letters to the editor should no longer be trusted.

Margriet Oostveen has worked for both the Obama and McCain campaigns during this election, but she recently confessed to ghostwriting fictional letters to the editor for the McCain campaign. Her admission came in her weekly column, "Message from Washington" for the Dutch newspaper NRC Handelsblad. A translation of her column can be found on Salon.com.

The danger of this goes far beyond partisan politics, so disregard the fact that Oostveen did this for McCain's campaign, and look at the bigger picture. Ghostwriting letters to the editor amounts to creating fictional characters posing as your fellow Americans, imaginary friends if you will, who tell you everything you want to hear – in this case, to garner your support for a Presidential candidate.

Not only are the words a lie, but the voice itself is a lie.

As a student of journalism, I have an enormous appreciation for the purpose of the letters to the editor section of newspapers. It provides a platform for every citizen to voice their strongest feelings, where they can dismantle a columnist's arguments and express their displeasure with the status quo. The letter to the editor represents one of the people's most subtle and powerful checks and balances on their government, through it often goes overlooked.

The imaginary friend says, "I relate to you," and then whispers in your ear, "I'm John McCain and I approve this message."

A good democracy maintains a healthy and free market of ideas, and as Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr. so eloquently stated in his dissenting opinion of Abrams v. United States, "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market."

Anyone can take up their pen and submit their idea to the market through a letter to the editor, seeking the approval of others' reason to demonstrate the truth of their idea.

Ghostwriting poisons the market. False people have nothing to add to the market but false truth. It is similar to printing forged dollar bills. You can pass the bill and it seems true and real, but what stands behind it is empty of any inherent value. Not only is the forgery of no value itself, but it drives the value of all dollars down – a reality all too chilling with our economy in decline. But is it so surprising that our fiscal economy is in such rough shape, if the market of ideas is so corrupt as well?

When Oostveen writes a letter pretending to be the mother of a soldier serving in Iraq, and pronounces her fictional support for the Republican ticket, she creates an imaginary friend for those Americans whose situation is much more real than the one Oostveen so cleverly creates. The imaginary friend says, "I relate to you," and then whispers in your ear, "I'm John McCain and I approve this message."

The danger does not lie in McCain though, but in the threat to truth in general. So much of this election has centered on hope and fear. "I'm this country's only hope." "If you do not vote for me, fear the certain collapse of the American way of life you hold so dearly."

We get so caught up in the emotion of elections, we forget the importance of reason. Our minds stop investing and trading in the market of ideas, and we let two mere mortals pull at the strings of our hearts. When we succumb to hope and fear, we leave reason and the market of ideas unguarded, open to attack, certain to collapse into a great depression.

We can hold only ourselves responsible, for we are the only oversight for the market of ideas. We are the American people. No one will bail us out of the mess we have created but ourselves. To fail is to give up the trade of ideas, and begin to tradeoff our freedoms.

In Massachusetts, it's a 'green' ballot

Matthew Broderick

These days it seems like marijuana is causing tax payers to lose more money than brain cells.

It is estimated that by decriminalizing possession of less than a gram of weed, 30 million dollars in tax payer money will be saved. Twelve states have already joined the clam bake, by creating similar laws, Massachusetts may be the next.

When the ballots are unfolded in a couple of weeks, people across America will be casting an extremely important presidential vote. In Massachusetts, voters will additionally have one of the most historically controversial decisions to make, legalizing weed.

By voting "Yes" on question 2, you will be agreeing that holding less than a gram of marijuana should be treated more like a parking ticket than a triple homicide. While the proposition will in no way totally legalize marijuana, this is the first step on the stairway to 4:20 heaven.

As college students, who have an incredible pull of voting power in our favor, we have the chance to make this a reality. This whole issue is not about having the right to get high or lighting traditional values. The subject at hand is about our lives. It's about protecting our futures from miniscule actions with extreme punishments. We are at an age which makes us the most prone to making mistakes (take it from me.)

Law enforcement has put a target on each of our backs, and is constantly marring our records with its sour judicial power. Police should be out stopping violence and keeping the community safe, not busting some couch potato with a dime bag. The most damage a stoned individual is really going to produce is damage to a bag of chips.

Medical purpose is also an important driver in making this decision. As cancer cases rise per year, medical marijuana has become a proven staple in easing the pain of its countless ailments. The drug can help ignite an appetite and eliminate Chemo-induced nausea. I feel that denying these individuals this form of treatment is fraud and corrupt injustice. Marijuana can make a world of difference in reducing the already tremendous suffering cancer and HIV/AIDS patients must undergo.

The most damage a stoned individual is really going to produce is damage to a bag of chips.

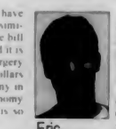
The opposition to decriminalizing weed does not understand its use and effects. For years we have been force fed data that marijuana is the most prevalent gateway drug, and that it has menacing, brain-damaging effects. Of course marijuana causes brain damage. So does jogging, and listening to music. The gateway drug claim is equally skewed, because anybody that is foolish enough to smoke crack or shoot heroin probably doesn't even consider marijuana a drug. The bottom line here is that it is other circumstances that lead to heavy drug use, not weed.

Opponents fail to recognize how many legal substances are much more dangerous than weed. Alcohol for instance claims over 100,000 deaths each year. I dare you to find me a statistic that shows marijuana related death being anywhere close to that number. Some even argue that there are none. Unlike alcohol, weed is impossible to overdose on and does not commonly induce violence or rage. Currently you can receive a DUI for driving drunk, if weed were legal it could be enforced the same way, for safety's sake. Clearly, marijuana is safer than alcohol, but its rattled reputation makes it almost an impossible subject to argue.

The issue of weed dealing will still be heavily enforced even if this law is passed, but in the long run this should be where the government benefits. In our time of economic crisis I feel that it would be mutually beneficial for marijuana to become a consumer product. Removing law enforcement from weed related crime would save millions of dollars. On top of that, if treated the same way as alcohol, with the same laws and enforcement, the government would be making money.



Although the prospect of marijuana becoming a household product is a liberal wet dream, the day will most likely never arrive. There is a popular saying that "rules are meant to be broken" and for this situation may always have to be. As members of the "millennial" generation, we have the power to take a step away from the right trapping confines of the law.

This is our first major chance to put action behind our image and prove we are truly passionate in seeking a positive change in our country. The power and voice we possess during an election that will forever stand out in history is colossal. In Massachusetts, while we are at it, we might as well take an added stand and give marijuana a chance.

SGA, student apathy

Eric Magazu

The Student Senate elections have been decided and soon there will be a small, but steady, stream of news concerning the Student Government Association (SGA.)

Most of us will get our updates from The Daily Collegian, or possibly from friends. At the same time, most of us will find the SGA to be pretty disconnected from our daily lives as University of Massachusetts students.

This is not something unique to the SGA at UMass, but it is my intuition that this is something with which a lot of colleges struggle. There is probably something to be learned from other schools that can help the SGA at our university, but, overall, this feeling of apathy is commonplace. It is important to know that this apathy isn't limited to student government, but apathy in general pervades many spheres of community involvement among students.

On one level, there is only so much that can be changed. We have our own lives and schedules to which we adhere, and we have our priorities, and these generally don't include following up on the SGA. Therefore, it is the responsibility of each student to engage the campus community in a way in which he is engaged in a meaningful pursuit.

If the SGA is lacking an essential connection with UMass students it begins to lose its entire purpose.

Within the student government we can find many passionate and talented students, many of which are charismatic, and some of which aspire to hold an office of civil authority somewhere in the United States when they graduate. This is not an inherent wrong, but oftentimes it is the people that shy away from power and authority that are the ones that ought to be endowed with these public trusts.

A recurring problem in student government is that there ends up being a disconnect between the concerns of the different SGA officials and the concerns that students are thinking about. Many of the candidates canvassing for votes last week know this and campaigned on being more engaged with day-to-day student issues and concerns.

Yet we will most assuredly see the cliquishness that characterizes SGA return relatively quickly after students begin their weekly meetings. It is essential that the SGA make strong use of the various departments at UMass that can assist SGA leaders in communicating with UMass students. The best way to begin this communication is to hold public events that students are excited about attending. Ideally, the SGA will be organized so well that all of these public events can be hosted by one of the many Registered Student Organizations (RSOs). These types of events are better hosted on an intimate scale, which makes the use of RSOs a smart idea.

It takes some time for a new member to become assimilated into the organizations they wish to join. The SGA needs to focus strongly on promoting the RSOs for which it provides funding. This connection with the RSOs is the best asset of the student government. This is where the Student Activities Fee on your Bursar bill ends up. This money gets distributed, with a small amount of structural assistance from UMass administrators, to each RSO by a committee within the SGA.

It is often heard that the SGA desires to tackle big issues, and this must be a strong allure for many students to run for SGA leadership positions, but if the SGA is lacking an essential connection with UMass students it begins to lose its entire purpose. For Washington, D.C. politicians this is called constituent services. It will be this engagement that will lead more students to take a strong look at SGA.

Some of the issues that leaders in the SGA seek to engage are ones in which it is much more appropriate that faculty or administration handle. There simply isn't much that the student government, or for that matter the student body, can do to change these requirements. The academic component of education is something that much be determined by the professionals in the field.

Many past ideas within the SGA have sought to create a further interaction between SGA leaders and UMass students, and these initiatives are good and ought to continue. However, it is also up to individual students to engage with the student government and the entire UMass community.

In a large school such as UMass, a student cannot rely upon being found by a scout seeking talent. Rather, a student has to engage in this endeavor on his own. The truth is that, if any student truly seeks it, he can find many people with whom to form bonds of friendship through student activities.

It is important that students begin to investigate the organizations on campus and seek out what may interest them. This is because this will provide real feedback to further refine the activities provided to students free of charge through the Activity Fee managed by the SGA. Therefore, the only course of action that can revamp a disengaged and internally-focused SGA is if other students engage themselves directly. This will result with a much stronger SGA in future years.

Unresponsible hospitals

Matt Kushi

Most people usually get the responsibility talk from their parents while still in their teens. As we mature, we realize that this lesson of responsibility carries a lot of weight. We learn that when responsibilities are not fulfilled, deadly consequences can occur. The example of a hospital is an effective one as it carries much risk when things go wrong.

When one enters a hospital, they expect the hospital to do anything within their given powers to cure them. That is a responsibility that the hospital has. While hospitals fulfill this responsibility most of the time, sometimes they do not, and the end result of disastrous.

It was only this past Friday that I was reading the news and came across an article on abcnews.com that stated that a man died after waiting 19 hours in an emergency room. We all know that hospitals are busy places but having a patient die because of a 19 hour wait is unacceptable.

The ER is one of the more chaotic locations in a hospital, as all central injuries and illnesses come through it. Due to this chaos, sometimes delays happen that cannot be avoided. Other times, the delays are due to the carelessness, and laziness, of the staff.

I cannot speak for the experiences that you reading this may have had. I can say, unfortunately, that I have had several emergency room experiences. The one that sticks out the most, for proving my point, occurred in the summer of 2005. I dislocated my knee during a summer league soccer game. I was brought to the hospital where I was immediately given a shot of morphine as the doctors prepared to pop my knee back into the socket. However, before that could be done, a man who was in critical condition from a motorcycle accident was brought in.

Since this man had life-threatening injuries, I was put on hold for two hours in a hallway, as there was no room to put me in. Now, as annoyed as I was about it then, for the morphine had worn off by the time they reset my knee, it came down to a matter of life and death for this man. For me, it was not. I had already been treated for shock and was not chancing death with my leg corkscrewed the wrong way. The hospital took control and did precisely what they were supposed to.

Some staff members were not doing their job to the best of their ability. There is no place for this in our hospitals. We should be better than that.

Now I want to share with you what happened with my dad. A few years ago, my dad had an episode with high blood pressure and he had to be admitted to the hospital. After he was examined, he was to be kept in the intensive care unit. However, after an hour, he was still in the ER. My mom asked why. One of the Registered Nurse's on duty, who looked like he couldn't have cared less, said that my dad had only been there 3 hours and what was the big deal.

A few days later, knowing that my dad was still recovering, they released him early to recover at home to make room for another patient. My dad was not ready to come home and had to be admitted to the hospital again that very night. This was not a case of going with the circumstances. This was a case of my dad's personal health being put at stake because some staff members were not doing their job to the best of their ability. There is no place for this in our hospitals. We should be better than that.

Our hospitals in the United States are the best in the world. For the most part, we run and maintain them as such. However, the foundation that makes our hospitals the best is threatened each time a worker decides to simply go through the motions. This isn't school, where not giving your full effort results in an F. This is people's lives that we are talking about here. If you go through the motions on one person who has a serious health issue, they could die. Forevermore, they will not walk the Earth if you decide that you value that lunch break, or overtime pay, more than this person's life while on duty.

I say this not only to hospital workers but to everyone in general. Not giving it all that you have got will only result in disaster. In the end, it may not only be you getting hurt. You may drag someone else beneath the waves as well. That is why there is no place in our infrastructure for such an occurrence. That is why the death of this man is so stunning. He went for help and was treated to a premature death instead of a prolonged life. There is no place in America for making already tedious problems worse. There is really no policy that can implemented, as far as regulations go, to help the matter. What it really comes down to is people taking responsibility and doing their job.

Pinback ready to dominate

Band spurns sterotypes, uses diversity

BY ANGELA STASIOWSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Alternative rock aficionados Pinback are set to stun Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton on Friday with their signature blend of driving rhythm and hypnotic ambience.

Hailing from San Diego, Calif., Pinback's founding members Armistead Burwell Smith IV, who goes by Zach, and Rob Crow are no strangers to the quest for individuality in music.

Since their 1999 debut album, "This is Pinback," the band has navigated through various musical styles, settling into a brand of genuinely independent, alternative rock with their latest album, 2007's "Autumn of the Seraphs."

A commonly held belief among many emerging artists in today's music industry is the assumption is that one must find a defining style and run with it; one musical identity through which all creativity must stem. To depart from this style is to run the risk of isolating an entire fan base, possibly even those that shot the band into the spotlight in the first place.

According to vocalist and multi-instrumentalist Rob Crow, this is simply inconceivable. Crow has taken his music in a plethora of directions, beginning with his debut as one of the founding members of the band Heavy Vegetable. Since then, he has taken part in dozens of projects including the band Thingy and various solo releases.

In a recent interview, Crow confesses that, "I just need the outlet…I always have new ideas, new ways of going about things. The hard part is not doing too much."

With each new endeavor, Crow has taken on a new musical persona, ranging from the delicacy of acoustic rock as a solo artist to the purposeful detachment of ambient rock in Heavy Vegetable and Pinback.

Evident in their stylistic diversity from record to record, Pinback has been quite successful in balancing originality with accessibility. This penchant for reinvention is one of the prime contributing factors to the band's success on the underground rock front.

Despite developing a steady following, Pinback has managed to retain their independent status. The band has made careful choices in this arena, making sure not to isolate the buying public while maintaining their "indie" credentials by straying from major record labels.

Pinback signed with Touch and Go Records in 2005, the independent label that has also signed such talents as TV on the Radio, Rachel's, and Yeah Yeah Yeahs.

"When you're an independent, no one can tell you what to do or how to do it," Crow said. "What people call 'indie rock' is really far from 'indie' at all… It is supposed to be short for 'independent,' but I think people have made it short for 'boring college rock'."

"Autumn of the Seraphs," Pinback's second album under Touch and Go, comes across as their most accessible album to date, while still retaining a fierce originality that is not found in most bands today.

Far from "boring college rock," the incessantly catchy "Good to Sea" embodies the band's latest image, blending synthetic sounds with the more innovative bass stylings of Smith. "Devil You Know" follows suit, employing Crow's brooding lyrics over heavy bass rhythms and keyboard.

The quality that sets this record apart from their previous work is a more worldly perspective, which, Crow admits, is due to settling down with a wife and son. This change has had a great effect on Crow's lyrical work and has served as a great source of inspiration as of late. However, this new view does not translate to a tamer sound, but rather a more sophisticated lyrical content, particularly evident in such songs as "Bouquet" and "Walters."

According to Pinback's online biography, the next conceivable step after the release of their latest record is complete world domination. When queried about this statement, Crow replied only that, "We're real close." In all seriousness, he added that, "We're just trying to have as much fun as possible and share it with as many people as we can."

While Crow may have been joking about his quest for world domination, there is clearly a bright future ahead for his band. Judging by their latest record and the inexhaustible work ethic of both Crow and Smith, the world best be prepared for Pinback.

Pinback will be playing in the Ballroom at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton tonight, Oct. 3, at 9 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance or $18 at the door.

Sci-fi 'Eagle Eye' explodes on bigscreen

Genre fans sure to enjoy

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Louis Stevens with facial hair might be a bit more outrageous than the plot of this weekend's top box office movie, but has a lot of potential to gross big bucks.

Directed by D.J. Caruso ("Disturbia"), "Eagle Eye" follows Jerry Shaw, played by former Disney prodigy Shia LaBeouf, who is being steered into a series of dangerous events by a mysterious woman via cell phone.

Alongside LeBeouf in this technological thriller are Michelle Monaghan, Michael Chiklis and Billy Bob Thornton.

After his twin brother's funeral, Shaw goes back to his small apartment only to find packages of guns, flight manuals and explosives from wall to wall.

He receives a phone call from an unknown woman who tells him he has thirty seconds to leave his apartment before the FBI storms in and takes him away. Confused, he remains in his apartment, and, as the mysterious woman said, the FBI busts in through the windows and takes him back to headquarters.

As the film treks on, more people become involved with these strange phone calls. Shaw discovers why he has been involved.

For those who loved movies like "I, Robot," "Eagle Eye" is perfect. It is a futuristic, semi-feasible science fiction flick that has non-stop action and a decent storyline. It does have a few clear weaknesses, but makes up for them with some quite noticeable strengths.

There are a few spots of some tacky, almost idiot-proof foreshadowing. Caruso uses the "overheard news on TV / radio" technique to do this, which can be a little frustrating.

Looking back at his first hit movie, "Disturbia," it seems that blatant foreshadowing is a pattern for Caruso. By telling the audience exactly when he wants them to pay attention, however, he forces them to think. These hints don't completely divulge the characters' fate, but rather push you towards thinking about what may happen.

"Eagle Eye" will keep you interested from start till end, whether it's due to the eagerness to see how the story plays out, or the constant action sequences. From gun-filled showdowns to extreme car chases with huge explosions, you will definitely get your money's worth. The action is very true to the movie and is not misused: don't expect Chiklis to do Ninja flips and run up the side of buildings.

One problem this film does have is the use of the reality camera angle (see "The Blair Witch Project"). There is not a known character holding and running with a camera, but during a few of the chase scenes, the camera seizes all over the place. It actually becomes a little nauseating and frustrating because it can be hard to tell exactly what is going on.

LaBeouf puts in another surprisingly great performance. It's still hard to believe that Ren Stevens' arch nemesis brother is continuously getting huge roles from Mutt in the latest "Indiana Jones" to his lead roles as Kale in "Disturbia" and Sam in "Transformers." He's not your typical star judging by his appearance or his unique personality, but he is persistently nailing the roles he takes.

Thornton and Chiklis play their usual no mercy old-school tough guy roles. In this film, it fits as they play an FBI agent and the secretary of defense, respectively. Monaghan has a great career ahead of her, and she shines in "Eagle Eye." If you saw her in "Trans, Baby, Trans," you should already know this.

It's easy to see why some people will hate "Eagle Eye," and others will absolutely love it. It's not going to win many awards, if any at all from the Academy or elsewhere.

But as an action, sci-fi movie, "Eagle Eye" is great. If you have a very broad liking of movies, rent it. If you love technological sci-fi films, see it in the theaters. If you do decide to splurge and see it in IMax, you may be disappointed. While it keeps you on the edge of your seat, it's no "Dark Knight," to say the least.

Justin Gagnon can be reached at jegagnon@student.umass.edu

"EAGLE EYE"
STARRING:
SHIA LABEOUF AND MICHELLE MONAGHAN
GRADE: B

In D.J. Caruso's latest thriller "Eagle Eye," Shia LaBeouf ("Disturbia," "Transformers") is compelled to partake in dangerous tasks by a mysterious woman calling via cell phone. The film delivers its share of explosions and should entertain any fan of the sci-fi action genre.

Students' guide to good English pubs

BY CHRISTINA FONG
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There's a checklist when people arrive in London. Sometimes they vary, but more often than not they share the same common items such as a visit to Big Ben, a ride on the London Eye and observing the changing of the guard at Buckingham Palace. Although they are all undoubtedly a must, they're also tourist traps that fail to deliver a real taste of London.

England, let alone London, is famous for a lot of old standing traditions and cultural establishments, one of which are their pubs. Their induction into society goes as far back as the Roman taverns. Although bars and clubs are often popular alternatives for nighttime revelry and socializing, pubs, or "public houses" as they are rarely called anymore, stand out as the place where the locals regularly convene. They are great places for anyone to gather really if a true English experience is desired.

It's the place to be at the end of a hard day's work. It's where people go to unwind with good company and a few pints of beer. With eight out of 10 adults considering themselves pub goers and over 15 million people stating they drink in a pub at least once a week according to beerandpub.com, its clear how deeply engrained pubs are in the English culture.

However, not all pubs are created equal. Considering the fact that there are approximately 57,500 pubs in the United Kingdom, distinguishing between the absolute musts from the absolute must-be-avoided is completely necessary.

Over the years, there has been a proliferation of chain pubs and theme pubs done so in the name of profit. With a good number of them claiming to be traditional, it's become increasingly difficult to weed out the fakes. Generally, if the pub advertises its "traditionalism," it's likely to be a sham. This doesn't mean any of them are not worth a visit.

Several chains such as Wetherspoon and O'Neill's offer cheap food and great décor. What's lacking is simply the quality of their beer. Irish-themed pubs are popular as well for their Irish theme. The simple act of ordering a pint of Guinness or speaking the accents of Irish patrons from The Emerald Isles may be enough to transport you to Ireland.

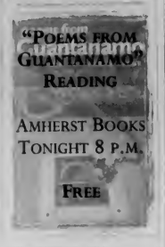
Drew Bonifer, a senior at Regent's College and a London native, said, "The real good pub has been consumed by the Hooligan Rampage Gastro Pubs."

Gastro Pubs are ones that have overpriced food or serving great food along with their ale.

Most beer drinkers, approached by the average citizen, believe there are a few factors that distinguish an authentic pub from a fake. Food and foremost is the beer. Quality English ale is a marker for a first-rate and often authentic pub.

For some Americans, it's more about the English brown beer specific to each pub. "If they have anything you can't get in the United States, what's the point?" asked Joshua Hindelang, a sophomore from Dover, N.H. of New Hampshire.

Part of some others' liking is good beer, people will follow. It is they who determine the crowd and atmosphere that defines each pub. A good crowd is filled with locals, music and old jokes. Some pubs can be spotted a mile away when they're overflowing with customers. These often denote popularity and are usually worth a trip. However, the more hooches the pub, the better it is for some. Hindelang said he prefers a quaint pub. "It's good to be able to sit, have your beer and just enjoy."



Music has a large part in contributing to the ambience of a pub as well as live music tends to draw in younger crowds. For the pubs that are unable to accommodate bands, jukeboxes can often be found and satisfy customers just as well. Camden Town is a district known for its many offerings of choice music venues.

All things considered, everyone has their own reasons for liking the pubs they do. Bolton said a good pub to him has "a good jukebox, a decent selection of lagers and comfort. For some, it's that simple."

Voices of prisoners to haunt Amherst

By Sophia Pastore
Collegian Staff

The words of seventeen prisoners of the Guantanamo Bay Detention Camp will be heard tonight at Amherst Books. These works are part of a book entitled "Poems from Guantanamo: The Detainees Speak," edited by Mark Falkoff, prefaced by Flagg Miller, and with an afterword by Ariel Dorfman. The poems will be read at 8 p.m. by Bill Newman, Buz Eisenberg, and Martin Espada.

Since the beginning of the war in Afghanistan in October 2001, 775 prisoners have been brought to Guantanamo and the prison has remained a controversial topic since. Its practices have been criticized by many newspapers, including the UK's Guardian, which referred to practices there as "a brutal disregard for due process."

The prison has been criticized by human rights groups for its apparent dismissal of Third Geneva Convention laws against torture. Released prisoners have told stories of sleep deprivation, force-feeding and defilement of personal religious materials.

According to a 2005 New York Times article, hundreds of suicide attempts have been documented. Amnesty International has addressed these attempts as "the tragic results of years of arbitrary and indefinite detention."

In June of 2008, the case of Boumediene v. Bush ruled in favor of the detainees, finally granting them protection under the U.S. Constitution.

"Poems from Guantanamo" is published by the University of Iowa Press. According to their Web site, the book, which is comprised of 22 poems, "gives voice to the men held...most still at Guantanamo, in legal limbo."

"According to Department of Defense data, fewer than half of them are accused of committing any hostile act against the United States or its allies. In hundreds of cases, even the circumstances of their initial detainment are questionable," says University of Iowa Press.

This collection of poems has been praised by poet Adrienne Rich as a work that "reveal[s] one dimension of this officially obscured narrative, from the perspective of the sufferers, the legal and literary essays provide the context which has produced under atrocious circumstances - a poetics of human dignity."

These poems, "some originally written in toothpaste, others scratched onto foam drinking cups with pebbles and furtively handed to attorneys," according to the University of Iowa Press will be read by attorneys Buz Eisenberg and Bill Newman, and poet Martin Espada.

Buz Eisenberg has been an attorney for 25 years and is also a teacher of law at Greenfield Community College. He has been representing Guantanamo detainees since 2004.

Bill Newman is currently a civil rights attorney in Northampton. He is also currently representing a Guantanamo detainee. He is the director of the Western Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts as well as a member of The Bill of Rights Defense Committee's Advisory Board.

Martin Espada is a poet, essayist, editor and translator who has published a total of 13 books and currently teaches at the University of Massachusetts. He has won many awards and fellowships including the American Book Award and a Guggenheim Fellowship.

This event is co-sponsored by the Pioneer Valley Committee Against Secrecy & Torture.

Poems from Guantanamo: The Detainees Speak will be read at Amherst Books tonight at 8 p.m. The event is free and open to the public.

Quest for perfect video game version

Square Enix company releases role-playing 'Dragon Quest IV'

By Justin Hoeger
McClatchy Newspapers

Once again, Square Enix has taken one of its classic role-playing games and updated it for the new millennium.

This time around, it's "Dragon Quest IV: Chapters of the Chosen," which comes from the Enix side of the family. Long before the merger of Squaresoft and Enix, the "Dragon Quest" series stood as the chief rival to the "Final Fantasy" games - a series itself inspired by "DQ."

But "Dragon Quest" was never as popular here - where it was renamed "Dragon Warrior" - as in Japan. While all the "Final Fantasy" games have been released in the United States now, there are still two "DQ" games that have never landed on these shores.

"Dragon Quest IV" is not one of them, though North America was passed over by the PlayStation remake in 2001. For anyone who missed the original release in 1992, this version of "DQ IV" is probably their first exposure to the game.

"Dragon Quest IV" runs in reverse compared with most RPGs. Instead of starting out as a destined warrior who travels the world gathering companions, players spend the first several hours of the game controlling the player-named hero's eventual teammates' on their own adventures before joining the chosen one for the rest of the quest.

Players start with Ragnar McRyan, a stout knight who discovers a plot to revive an evil being while investigating the disappearance of some local children. After his quest comes the tomboy princess Alena, who yearns to be free from her palace home and is accompanied by two retainers, Borya and Kiryl, for the trip; Torneko the merchant, with dreams of riches; and Meena and Maya, sisters in search of their father's killer.

All these characters' paths meet for the fifth chapter of the game, when the hero begins his or her quest. It's an interesting way to structure an RPG, especially when so many feature mysterious party members with dark secrets.

The player can make a party out of these characters once they're together in their wagon. Before Chapter 5, there are occasional secondary characters who will temporarily join with the companions on their journeys, such as a little Healslime, whose kind is usually an enemy, that volunteers to help Ragnar.

Gamers shouldn't expect to find much in the way of innovation in the game play, and not just because the original Japanese version dates all the way back to 1990. The "Dragon Quest" series is pretty predictable - at a basic level, there's not a huge difference between this game and the PS2's "Dragon Quest VIII: Journey of the Cursed King."

The flow of the game generally has the player traveling between points of interest such as towns, caves and dungeons, fighting monsters and talking to townspeople along the way. Battles are carried out in classic "DQ" fashion, with the player taking the party's perspective when facing rows of attacking enemies. In each round of the turn-based battles, the player chooses actions for controlled characters and then watches while they're carried out and the enemies counter with their own moves. This repeats until one side is dead or flees.

Fighting is quick and simple, with numerous spells and other battle options to choose from. It's challenging without feeling cheap.

The visuals have been given a complete overhaul - not only are monsters well drawn and smoothly animated during fights, but the world itself has been redone with 3-D terrain not unlike that in "Final Fantasy IV" on DS, though the characters remain sprites instead of being replaced by polygonal models as those in "FFIV" were. The graphics aren't especially fancy, but they're crisp, detailed and colorful.

The music is also worthy of note. Veterans of the "DQ" series will recognize some of the themes, while newcomers should be impressed by the lush orchestrations. Even through the DS's somewhat tinny speakers, it sounds terrific.

"Dragon Quest IV: Chapters of the Chosen" is the fourth incarnation of the role-playing video game made by Square Enix. Though it has smooth and crisp animation and quick and simple fighting, the game lacks innovation and doesn't differ much from previous titles.

Pros and cons of recycling buisness

By H.J. Cummins
Star Tribune

Randy's Environmental Services of Delano, Minnesota, advocates a "double-stream system"; one paper, the other glass, cans and plastic, which is sorted here at its transfer station, on Tuesday, July 29, 2008.

MINNEAPOLIS — The thought is a natural one for those going through the chore of sorting their recyclables: Do I have to do this?

It's a question that even recycling haulers can't agree on. And as recycled materials fetch higher prices, the stakes are rising as they compete for contracts.

The big national haulers, No. 1 Waste Management and No. 2 Allied Waste Industries are promoting a "single stream" system where customers put all recyclables - paper, glass, plastic and metals - into one cart. People prefer the convenience, so they recycle more, these companies argue.

Some recycling haulers, including Eureka Recycling in St. Paul, Minn., and Randy's Environmental Services out of Delano, Minn., advocate sticking with the traditional "double-stream" system, where households sort their recyclables into two groups: separating the paper from containers of glass, plastic and metal. Maybe the big carts increase collections, but all those materials get smashed together inside, making them unusable, they argue.

The disagreement resurfaces periodically, as local governments bidding out the pickup contracts get hit with both sales pitches. And last month, Allied Waste said it's sweetening the pot by offering store coupons as customer rewards, which it's testing in three markets across the country, including the Twin Cities. The more a household recycles, the more coupons it wins, redeemable at scores of retailers as varied as grocery stores, Ikea and Target.com.

Looking for advice, cities went to the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency as long as two years ago. The agency commissioned a report by Tim Goodman & Associates in St. Louis Park, Minn., but by citing pros and cons for each, it resolved little.

"Right now, personally, I would have to give the edge to two-sort, in terms of the quality of the actual recycled materials," Goodman said. "But people still have disagreements, and they feel very strongly one way or the other."

Americans produce an average of 4.6 pounds of trash per person per day, according to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. Minnesota is near the top of the states in recycling its trash - at 43.2 percent of its solid waste, it is second only to Oregon. Market forces may start bumping up rates everywhere, however.

Commodities prices for the materials bailed or binned out of recycling centers - to be remade into new water bottles, cans, and more - are climbing steeply, with analysts citing once again voracious demand out of China. A ton of recycled newsprint in the New York market rose from $120 in January to $200 this month, said Mark Arzoumanian, editor of industry publication Official Board Markets. Comparable increases on the recyclables spot markets have aluminum priced at $2,000 a ton and plastics at $440 a ton.

That has haulers working to increase their emphasis on recycling, and the payoff is already showing up. At Allied Waste, for example, revenue from sales of recyclables rose 21 percent last year from 2006 to $257 million, according to its annual report.

One sign of Phoenix-based Allied Waste's growing interest in the recycling business is the new RecycleBank partnership that it's now marketing in some areas. RecycleBank weighs the recyclables collections and awards store coupons to customers based on how much they recycle. Popular coupons among customers include local grocery stores, saving families as much as $20 a month on their food bills, said Ron Gonen, CEO of the Pennsylvania-based company.

Maple Grove, Minn., is one community Allied Waste and RecycleBank have approached, because its current recycling contract expires at the end of this year. City Manager Al Madsen said Madsen believes both the convenience of no sorting and the incentive program might appeal to city residents, and encourage recycling.

And at least one resident agrees.

"The easier you make it, the more people will do it," said Kristin Archer. And the coupons? "I totally think that when I'm considering whether to walk that tin can to the street, this would give me that little more incentive," Archer said.

Randy's Environmental Services just bet $8 million on double-stream recycling with a trash hauling and recycling facility it opened last summer. "The value of the commodities is better protected with the two streams," said Jim Wollschlager, operations director. "We just feel it's the better way of recycling."

The customers in Goodman's report agreed - the paper mills and glass companies, for example, that buy the materials from recycling facilities. They told Goodman they're seeing a dramatic increase in contamination - glass shards in paper and metal flecks in plastics - that makes the materials worth less, or even worthless, he said.

On average, the report said, two-stream operations lost 6.4 percent of their materials to contamination, compared with 22.7 percent for single-stream operations. However, the buyers also told Goodman a lot depends on the facility, with some single-sort processors just as clean as the two-sorters. Wollschlager estimated Randy's at 3 to 4 percent. In an interview, Waste Management spokeswoman Julie Ketchum put contamination rates at its two Minnesota facilities at about 6 percent.

Still, many see a future in not less sorting, but more. One Burnsville, Minn. household prefers more sorting. David and Mindy Limberg said they question how well their current single-source service really works. "It's easy for us, but I have less confidence all in it is getting recycled," David said.

In Wayzata, Minn., a Randy's Services client, residents sort "organics" such as food scraps, pizza boxes and full vacuum cleaner bags - from their regular trash. City recycling coordinator Sonny Clark said Wayzata saves on disposal fees $45 a ton for organics compared with $50 for trash.

Minneapolis, which has residents sort their own recyclables into at least four groups: paper, plastics, glass and metals, earned $1.6 million in its recycling program last year, said recycling director Sonia Young. "We were able to cover increased costs in fuel and personnel for 2008," Young said. "Water went up, sewer went up and the storm-water fee went up, but the solid-waste fee stayed the same."

Richmond's Jessie Wolfe helped the Spiders earn their first conference win with her two goals against Dayton. Wolfe now has three goals on the season.

Beam leads 49er's

Charlotte, Fordham atop A-10; Rookie Critchlow earns honors

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A-10 Soccer

Led by junior midfielder Hayley Beam, Charlotte is off to a great start in conference play so far this season, winning its first two games. Beam was named to Soccer Buzz's Elite Team of the Week for the second time in her career following her performances last week against La Salle and St. Bonaventure.

Beam and the 49ers opened conference play against La Salle last Friday, when Beam tallied one goal and two assists in pursuit of defending last year's Atlantic 10 championship.

Following their first victory, the 49ers then took to the road to St. Bonaventure, where they defeated the Bonnies, 8-2. Beam then secured her prestigious honor by recording Charlotte's second hat trick performance of the season, while adding two assists.

So far, Beam and the 49ers are looking like the championship team they are. Their season continues Oct. 4, when they host A-10 enemy Saint Louis at Transamerica Field.

RAMS STAYS UNBEATEN

Along with Charlotte, Fordham is the only remaining perfect team during A-10 play. The Rams improved to 2-0 after blanking St. Louis 2-0 on Sunday. Fordham's Kim Boulos and Katie Sanchez each scored, as Mariella Romano added two assists.

The Rams are confident in the early stages of the season, perhaps no one more than head coach Ness Selmani.

"The team played to my expectations today, but they can play even better. They never slack off, and I couldn't be more proud of their fantastic attitude. It was a great win," Selmani said to Fordham media relations.

Fordham continues their successful season on Friday, Oct. 3, as they host the St. Bonaventure.

FLYERS FINISH HOT

Dayton finished non-conference play as one of the hottest teams in the A-10, and they're off to another good start in conference play. The Flyers settled for a double-overtime tie against St. Joseph's on Sunday after defeating Richmond, 1-0.

Although good on paper, the Flyers' (7-3-1, 1-0-1 A-10) head coach Mike Tucker is concerned about his team's ability to capitalize on a good start.

"Our finishing has been atrocious," Tucker said to Dayton media relations. "We get one goal and then we get comfortable. When we only put away one goal on 31 shots it isn't going to work. We're creating great chances and serving great balls. We've just got to finish."

Tucker went on to say that with the good chances Dayton is getting, they should be able to put up four or five goals a game.

The Flyers' season continues on Sunday, Oct. 5, when they visit Xavier.

SPIDER'S OFFENSE SURGES

Richmond (7-2-1, 1-1 A-10) picked up their first conference victory on Sunday after being edged out by Dayton on Friday. Good defense and an aggressive attack from senior forward Jessie Wolfe provided the Spiders with enough to give Richmond its first conference win.

Jessie Wolfe scored two goals in the game, pushing her total to three on the season. Joining her in the scoring attack was freshmen Kat Russel, who scored the first goal of the game. Richmond controlled the tempo for the first half, limiting Xavier to just one shot on goal.

The Spiders coach Peter Albright believes the experience they've gained so far this season sets them up for successful A-10 conference play.

Richmond's home stand continues on Friday, Oct. 3, when they play Rhode Island at First Market Stadium.

ROOKIE LEADS HAWKS

St. Joseph's (6-2-1, 1-0-1 A-10) continued its unbeaten streak to seven games on Friday, beating Rhode Island 1-0. St. Joseph's freshmen goalkeeper Cara Critchlow played a big part in that game, turning away nine shots and leading the Hawks to a shutout win.

The following Sunday, it was Critchlow again who lead the Hawks to a double overtime draw against Dayton. Critchlow made 12 saves to help St. Joseph's preserve a 1-1 tie.

It is no wonder why Critchlow was named to the A-10 women's Soccer Co-Rookie of the Week. For the week, the New Jersey native posted 21 saves, a .045 goals-against-average, and her third shutout of the season.

St. Joseph's returns to action Wednesday, Oct. 1 at Penn.

UM eye's A-10 tournament

There is still hope for the Minutemen to win those six games. The Minutemen are in practically the same position as they were in 2007. They were 5-4 going into A-10 play and Hogan had only scored two goals (he totaled eight in the season). They had scored nine goals at that point and only allowed eight.

Throughout the season the Minutemen have slowly improved on their weaknesses. At the start they struggled with off-ball runs, supporting passes and working as a team. Now, the Minutemen seem to have that all down, and only need to work on their offense.

The Minutemen believe that they will be able to improve enough by the time A-10 play begins. They know they need to work on their offense and finishing on their shots. This week in practice UMass is turning its focus to that.

But where was the Minutemen's scoring ability and intensity at the beginning of the season? Yes, it's hard to play with the intensity needed during conference play when games don't necessarily matter, but when the team was ranked No. 13 and then dropped off the polls it should tell them something about where they are headed.

If they do improve their scoring, keep up their intensity (similar to that in the Vermont game last Sunday), continue to have a solid defense and play as a team, the Minutemen will be successful in A-10 play. They will see similar success as they did in the 2007 season.

These next 11 days is the real deal. It is the Minutemen's last chance to prepare for the important games. With one non-conference game left on Oct. 7, against No. 1 Wake Forest, it will be the last test for the Minutemen to see where their offense is. But it won't come easy against the defending NCAA college cup champions.

The game will give them one last chance to see what else they need to improve on before their first A-10 game on Oct. 12 against Rhode Island (the winner of the UMass Classic).

The Minutemen have struggled with their non-conference schedule early in the season, but still have their goal of making the A-10 tournament in sight. The team needs six wins in its nine A-10 games to reach the tournament.

UMass scoreless in almost two weeks

weeks of training," Koch said.

It has been a rocky stretch for the offense this season. UMass has averaged less than a goal per game, having scored seven goals after eight games.

Reserve forward Prince Ofosu is the only Minutemen who has scored more than one goal. He has two so far, but both of those goals came against Boston University in the second game of the season. Last year's leading goal scorer Bryan Hogan (7) has yet to register a single point.

The last goal UMass tallied was scored by Mike DeSantis in the 27th minute in the game against New Hampshire nearly two weeks ago. The Minutemen have played over four and a half hours of soccer since then without registering a goal.

KEEPING THEIR BAGS PACKED

After playing five of its first six games on the road, UMass got a chance to return home last weekend to host the UMass Classic. After that they will get a one more week without a game to rest at home.

The Minutemen better enjoy that week at home because after the break they won't get another week at home for awhile as UMass will be on the road for its next four games. First they will have travel to No. 1 Wake Forest on Tuesday, and then start its conference schedule on the road against Rhode Island on Oct. 12, St Bonaventure on Oct. 17 and finally Duquesne on Oct. 19, which means they will have to play four tough road games in a 12-day span.

Being away from home can be exhausting for the players. Goalkeeper Zack Simmons described that feeling the team had after going to Virginia to play in the Old Dominion STIHL Classic back in early September.

"It's just draining on our guys both mentally and physically, just being away from school, from work and all that kind of stuff and then [having to play] in tough conditions," Simmons said.

Unlike professional teams, which are guaranteed to have an equal number of home games and away games, college teams often cannot afford that luxury. UMass has 11 road games against seven home games, not including the Atlantic 10 tournament which takes place in Pittsburgh, Penn.

PUTTING IN OVERTIME

It is never fun to work overtime, but UMass has gotten used to the feeling. The Maroon and White have played into double overtime four times this season going 1-1-2 in those games.

Koch does not feel that the extra periods have any adverse effect on his team, saying that his players are in good shape and that the coaching staff uses its deep bench to prevent anyone from playing on tired legs.

Minutemen return to McGuirk after bye

UMass looks to rebound after rare two-game losing streak

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE AND JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

UMass Football

Football losses tend to sting more than losses in other sports. For one, seasons are much shorter, so each loss is more consequential. And any time you lose a football game, you have to think about it in practice for a full week before you get the chance to redeem it.

In the case of the Massachusetts football team, they've had to think about two consecutive losses (neither of which were very pretty) for an extra week. But the Minutemen can take solace that the bye week has enabled them to work on some of the things that have plagued them thus far.

"We went back to work on fundamentals, got some speed work done and really just tried to sharpen up on all areas: kicking, offense and defense," UMass coach Don Brown said.

Brown isn't concerned that his team will have any hangover effect from a 56-14 trouncing on Sept. 10 against Texas Tech.

"I think we put it behind us pretty quickly," Brown said. "I think we can just kind of move on from that fairly quickly and take it for what it was. We went out and gave it our best shot. Obviously they are No. 6 in the country right now at the next level."

Quarterback Liam Coen and the offense also put the game behind them, focusing on getting even stronger offensively.

"We worked against the defense a lot and that was good from a competitive standpoint," Coen said. "We didn't just sit back and say 'hey we're not going to hit each other and not going to go against the scout team.'"

FRIENDLY CONFINES

The No. 18 Minutemen (2-2, 1-0 Colonial Athletic Association) get a bit of a reprieve this weekend, although No. 16 Delaware - a team that made it to the national championship game last year - is certainly no push-over.

But UMass holds the advantage, getting to play the game at McGuirk Stadium – where they have won 15 consecutive games. The last time it lost in Amherst was back in 2005, when it fell to New Hampshire, 24-28, on Oct. 29.

The Minutemen haven't played a home game in over a month, when UMass beat Albany, 28-16, in the season-opener. UMass then played three on the road at Holy Cross, James Madison, and Texas Tech., but now play three of its' next four at McGuirk Stadium, an important advantage according to Brown.

"We've been very successful here and if you look at college football, especially in our league, home-field advantage is always important and it's always been important to the Minutemen," Brown said.

Liam Coen and the Minutemen are happy to be back in Amherst this weekend after playing three-straight road games. UMass has won 15 consecutive home games, and 19-of-20 at McGuirk Stadium.

UMass coach Don Brown and the Minutemen used their bye week to rest injured players and work on the team's weaknesses from the first four weeks of the season.

The 15-game home streak is the second-longest active streak in all of I-A (San Diego is at 26) and fifth in all of Division I football.

INJURY UPDATES

Offensive lineman Sean Calicchio (high ankle sprain) is expected to play against the Blue Hens (2-2) on Saturday. Linebacker Anthony Rouzier is questionable for the game. Other than that, the bye week helped the Minutemen get essentially fully healthy moving forward.

"We're much healthier than we were and obviously we've got one or two guys who are battling and trying to make it back for the week," Brown said. "But our status is pretty good, we're about as good as we could be at this point."

The bye week certainly came when the Minutemen needed it most. Not only is UMass on a rare two-game losing streak, they were a battered team after facing the FBS's No. 6 Texas Tech.

Along with Rouzier, cornerback Sean Small, linebacker Josh Jennings, guard Rob Getek and tackle Ben Coblyn, all left the game in Texas at some point with an injury. The bye allowed most of them to get healthy right as the team gets in the think of conference play.

Salvaggione nets game winners

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A-10 Soccer

In stunning fashion, Chris Salvaggione has catapulted himself to a first-place tie for points in the Atlantic 10, netting two game-winning goals over the weekend as the No. 23 Charlotte men's soccer team improved to 7-1-0. Seven tallies in the past eight matches and three consecutive game-winners have landed the 49ers junior A-10 Co-Player of the Week honors and a College Soccer News Team of the Week nod.

With one non-conference match remaining, Salvaggione and the 49ers sit with undefeated Saint Louis atop the A-10. Offensive consistency has been key, as Charlotte is averaging a league-leading 2.5 goals per game.

After capitalizing on a goalkeeping mishap to tie Elon 1-1 in regulation, the 49ers continued the habit of applying pressure early and often. The freshmen tandem of Evan James and Jason Hawkes helped set-up Salvaggione's game-winner during the first minute of overtime with a dual give-and-go assist.

ROAD WOES FOR URI

The Rams (4-3-1) had success at this weekend's UMass Invitational, but will have to score more frequently to improve an 0-3 road record after its upcoming homestand – which includes a non-conference closeout with Siena and an A-10 opener against the Minutemen.

Shutting out each opponent in two neutral-site Amherst matches, Rhode Island finished first with an undefeated (1-0-1) tournament record. Backed by strong goalkeeping by Chris Pennock, the Rams tied Vermont (0-0) and defeated Hartford, 1-0, in double-overtime. The senior keeper was named to the All-Tournament Team along with three other Ram players.

However, Pennock's defense has been unequaled by the team's midfielders and forwards, who have been completely shutout in road tosses to New Hampshire, Boston University and Brown. The three New England powerhouses outscored coach John O'Connor's squad, 7-0, in these three matches.

Considering Rhode Island's sizeable road struggles, the logistics of its upcoming road games don't look promising. URI's schedule includes two separate New York-Pennsylvania trips in a span of two weeks, interspersed with a short home stand featuring George Washington and Richmond.

ST. LOUIS CONTINUES FINESSE

Preserving a league-low goals-against total of four, the No. 12 Saint Louis men's soccer team handily defeated non-conference opponent Missouri State, 3-0, in front of a packed Homecoming crowd of over 5,000. Ranked first in the Mid-Atlantic Region, Saint Louis stands as the lone undefeated team in the A-10 and one of only eight unbeaten Top 30 teams nationally.

This blemish-less Billiken dominance could change, however, as SLU faces back-to-back tests this week: No. 8 Creighton and No. 7 Northwestern. In what looks to be a strong goalkeeping matchup, SLU's Pat Disbennett faces off against reigning Big Ten Player of the Week Misha Rosenthal in net.

Although Disbennett picked up his third consecutive shutout last week against Missouri State, Rosenthal has already secured an impressive eight shutouts in nine games, leading the Wildcats to their best start in school history at 8-0-1. But although NU's junior goalkeeper boasts a .947 save percentage and 0.11 goals-against average, he's only had to make 19 saves all season in front of a stalwart Wildcat defense.

TEMPLE RISING QUIETLY

Picked to finish only 11th in the preseason coaches poll, Temple has quietly nestled itself into the cluttered middle of the A-10 standings with a respectable 4-3-1 record.

For the second time this season, Owls forward Tyler Witmer has been tabbed as the A-10's top rookie performer. Whitmer, who is averaging 1.25 points per game, is tied for fifth at the conference points standings with 10.

The freshman Temple goals-leader will head a young roster facing it's first conference test against the ever-aggressive Duquesne, which leads the A-10 in fouls and have received 15 yellow cards in nine games, second only to Xavier (16).

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2008 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Heading into Atlantic 10 play, UMass' forward Bryan Hogan needs to become more of a factor on offense. The team's leading goal scorer from last year has yet to record a point.

Offense underperforming as UMass heads into A-10 play

Melissa Turtinen

With 11 days left before its first Atlantic 10 game the Massachusetts men's soccer team is still struggling to score goals and get wins. But if the Minutemen (2-4-2) play anything like they did last year and peak at the right time, which is now, they will be able to pull off enough wins to make it to the A-10 tournament.

Advancing to the tournament is UMass' goal this season. To move on, the Minutemen must win six of their nine A-10 games. But first, they have to start scoring goals.

Since the start of the season, the Minutemen have been focusing on making sure their defense is strong, because if the defense isn't there to defend, there is no point in being able to score goals.

"Most importantly we have to be solid defensively. If we do that we're hard to beat. Worst case scenario is we tie someone 0-0," UMass coach Sam Koch said at the beginning of the season.

Now that the season is well underway, the defense has proven itself to be strong. All-American Zack Simmons and Chris Brown anchor the back. With the support of the rest of the back four, usually Stuart Thompson, Dan Lepone and Andrew Henshaw, they are all making up for the loss of Kenny Cook and Doug Rappaport to graduation.

All of UMass' losses have only been by one goal. Opponents have scored nine goals on the Minutemen and have outshot them by four (for a total of 108 shots to UMass' 104).

Like Koch said, the worst case scenario is a 0-0 tie. But now, the Minutemen can't be happy with a tie. They need to start scoring goals and winning games because six ties aren't going to carry them to an A-10 Championship title.

Since the defense isn't the problem in the Minutemen's record, that leaves the offense. UMass has scored seven goals this season, none coming from last year's leading scorer and strategic finisher Bryan Hogan. But making up for Hogan's lack of points are Prince Ofosu, Ben Arikian, Mike DeSantis, Bryant Craft, Chris Vaccaro and Brown. Ofosu is the only one who has scored more than one goal.

Just because other players are stepping up and scoring, doesn't mean the Minutemen will succeed without Hogan and Mark DeSantis's scoring ability. Mark DeSantis has a natural left foot, which makes him a major offensive threat that is able to play midfield and attack. UMass needs to start finishing on every attempt.

Last weekend in the UMass Classic, the Minutemen were unable to score a single goal, but it doesn't mean that there was a lack of opportunity – UMass outshot Vermont 14-13. They were also unable to come away with a win, taking last place at Rudd Field, where they are suppose to play well (last year's record at home was 9-1-0).

When it's hard to score regularly, set pieces are always an opportunity, especially for a team that has so many chances on them – opponents have fouled 101 times to UMass' 86 and have had 42 corner kicks to UMass' 40.

But with all of the opportunities, where are the goals?

Koch joked after last weekends games that the net needs to be bigger or the ball needs to be smaller. Maybe that would help the Minutemen get the ball in the goal. Either way, they aren't going to win those six needed games if they don't start putting the ball in the back of the net.

UM struggles to capitalize

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

Soccer can be one of the most frustrating sports in existence. Players can make perfect set-ups, take great shots, create several solid chances and still, after 90 minutes or more of nonstop effort, not score.

That feeling of frustration is one that the Massachusetts men's soccer team has felt a lot lately. The Minutemen (2-4-2) have been shut out in half of the games they've played this season, including back-to-back shutouts against Hartford (1-0 loss) and Vermont (0-0 tie) last weekend at the UMass Classic.

It's not as though the Minutemen haven't had chances. At several different points over the weekend, UMass got off solid shots close to the net, but every time it looked like they would score, an impressive save was made or the shot would go wide.

Each missed chance has only increased the aggravation the team has felt. UMass coach Sam Koch has mixed emotions – while he is happy the team can create chances, its inability to capitalize disturbs him.

"We just didn't put away the opportunities we've had, that's something we've really had trouble with so far this season and hopefully we will take care of it in the next two

Housing woes

The University has increased rent at the North Village apartments, which many residents say they cannot afford.

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

"Don't eat anything!"

"I can't eat anything! I have no money!"

These were the rallying cries yesterday between two members of the University of Massachusetts Tenant's Association who, along with several other members, spent the day fasting outside the Whitmore Administration building in protest of the family housing lease's 6 percent rent increase.

Many of the tenants, the majority being international students, only have UMass jobs available to them. These international students are restricted under visa regulations and UMass policies that say they can only work on-campus and for no more than 20 hours a week. The tenants claim this makes the rent increase unaffordable because in most cases 50 to 70 percent of the students' salaries are used up in rent costs.

In addition to the rent increase, University child-care costs raised 6 percent, while parking and telecommunication fees also increased.

Originally, over 63 tenants in the North Village family housing apartments refused to sign the new lease, making them tenants-at-will. Upon what the tenant's consider "threats from the administration," nearly all of them have signed the new lease.

According to the tenants, the latest "threat" came on Sept. 30 in the form of a letter from Vice Chancellor for Students Affairs and Campus Life Esther Terry.

"During the past week, a growing number of residents have signed a lease that includes the rent increase which went into effect July 1," said a statement from Terry. "I strongly encourage you to join them. Otherwise, you will have chosen a path that leads to official separation from the University."

The letter continues to state that as of Oct. 1, the University will allow the tenants-at-will to temporarily continue to five in on campus and complete their studies for the semester. "However, you will not be allowed to register for the spring semester nor receive official credit for studies completed this semester if the situation is not resolved," said Terry. "When the semester concludes, you will no longer be enrolled in the University. If you are in the United States on a visa, your decision may place your visa in jeopardy."

The international students decided to sign the new lease for fear that they would lose their status as students and automatically become illegal inhabitants likely to be deported.

According to Khatundi Nabwala-Manda, Vice President of the UMass Tenant's Association, Chancellor Robert Holub is unwilling to meet with the tenants until the eviction process is over or until the tenants' all sign their leases.

"Administration is not willing to speak with us, but they are willing to threaten us," said Nabwala-Manda. "It needs to be understood what it means to be an international student, and if

Iraq veterans speak out

"The Raging Grannies" sing an anti-war song at the Winter Soldier, a panel of Iraq veterans speaking out against the war last night in the Cape Cod Lounge.

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

As a sergeant in the U.S. Army serving in Iraq, Scott Palmer recalls having his weapon aimed at a silhouette of what appeared to be an armed person standing in the tower of a building.

Keeping himself from pulling the trigger prevented Palmer from making what he said would have been the biggest mistake of his life, as the silhouette turned out to be a young boy holding a broomstick.

This was just one of many stories shared by members of the local Iraq Veterans Against the War (IVAW) chapter who provided emotional testimonies of their service in Iraq and Afghanistan at the Cape Cod Lounge Wednesday night.

The event called "Winter Soldier" is one of many talks being held across the U.S. by the IVAW as a continuation of an event held in March when over 200 veterans and soldiers, as well as many Iraqi and Afghan civilians, met in Maryland to discuss their experiences.

The main goals of the IVAW and the panel discussion are immediate withdrawal of forces in Iraq, reparations for Iraqis and better support for returning servicemen and women.

"It's not easy for us to tell our stories. They drudge up difficult emotions," said Ted Goodnight who left the Army National Guard after 15 years of service including a tour in Afghanistan.

Goodnight said when he realized there was no support for the troops from the government he decided to leave his service.

After returning from Afghanistan, Goodnight was sent to Mississippi to provide humanitarian aid through

Interfraternity Council strives to shed old 'Frat Row' image

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Alex King and Michael Wiseman recall the event differently. They don't agree with its implications or the motivation behind it. Those are semantics, though. Either way you look at it, the strip of North Pleasant Street once known as "Frat Row," no longer exists.

King, a member of Alpha Delta Phi and the current president of the Interfraternity Council at the University of Massachusetts, cites hostility toward Greek life by the administration of former chancellor John Lombardi and dean of students Michael Gargano as the catalyst for the razing of five fraternity and sorority houses from their plots on North Pleasant Street during the 2006-07 academic year.

For Wiseman, director of Greek affairs at UMass, it was only a matter of time. The buildings were, in some cases, more than 70 years old with crumbling foundations and interiors.

The foundations of the organizations weren't in prime condition either. The pillars of fraternity – brotherhood, honor and pride – disappeared. People didn't flock to Frat houses to become men and build lifelong bonds.

They went to Frat Row to party.

"It wasn't a subtle point that the school made by tearing [Frat Row] down and not putting anything in its place," King said. "Honestly, good for them; it was out of control, something needed to happen. It gave us a bad image that we didn't want, but we definitely deserved it at that point."

The decision left King's fraternity and the four other fraternities and sororities in limbo. Without a house, they had nowhere to hold meetings, and developing the bonds necessary to operate a successful Greek organization became impossible.

Certain members of the chapter didn't help either. Like non-Greek students, some of them were in it for the partying. At a university, however, it doesn't take long for things to change. Students graduate, they leave and don't come back. Within his own fraternity, King recognized those who stood between his group and legitimacy.

Adam Jones of Delta Chi speaks with UMass student Josh Klein about the Delta Chi fraternity. Klein is now a founding father of the newest chapter.

"It took two years for all of [the bad influences] to graduate," he said. "There's been time when we've had to look people in the eye and say 'you need to change or you're not going to be a part of this.' It was something we had to do. If you have bad influences in the fraternity, then it always brings things down because you're always pointing fingers."

Legitimacy isn't a question anymore, though. While Greek numbers at UMass don't compare to other schools of the same size, enrollment is growing steadily. Eleven men received bids to Alpha Delta Phi in the fall 2008 semester as opposed to the two last semester. The young men who opt to make fraternity part of their college experience certainly know about the social benefits of Greek life. Since the demolition of Frat Row, however, the IFC, and King especially, have become absolutely aware of its role to positively

Income tax up for vote in November

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

In addition to voting for the next President this November, Massachusetts residents will be deciding on a proposition to eliminate income taxes.

The income tax issue is question one of three ballot initiatives this year. If voters choose "yes," the Massachusetts state income tax will be reduced to 2.65 percent for all categories of taxable income for the tax year beginning on or after Jan. 1, 2009, and will be eliminated for all tax years beginning on or after Jan. 1, 2010.

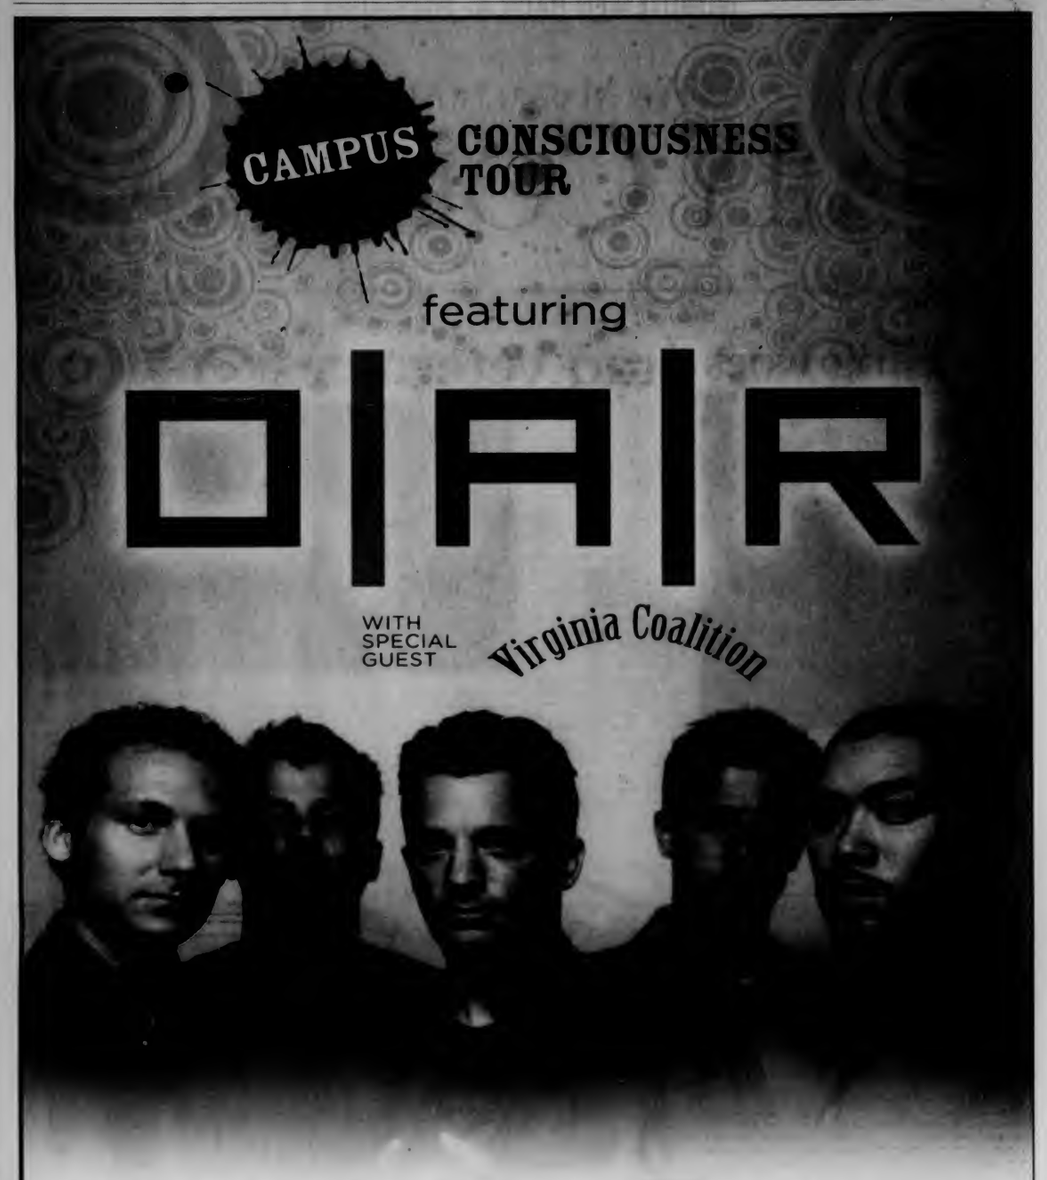
The initiative, proposed by a Massachusetts-based libertarian group called the Committee for Small Government, has the University of Massachusetts campus buzzing.

A repeal would cut $12 billion, or 40 percent, from the Bay States' revenue, and those opposed to the measure fear that voting "yes" would gravely affect public education and other services in the Commonwealth.

"I feel that it's irresponsible," said Emma Einhorn, president of the UMass Democrats. "I think people would have to be laid off, from firefighters, to 911 response workers, to public education teachers."

Einhorn said having fewer teachers would lead to larger class sizes.

She predicts that a repeal would result in "less funding for UMass, which would mean tuition hikes because we would not get as much state funding because there would be less money in the state budget. Also, scholarships could be affected," she said, adding that Medicaid, police and fire departments and good maintenance of bridges and roads could also become at risk.



Some students on the other side of the aisle also share Einhorn's concerns.

Jonathan Tabb, the treasurer and director of publicity of the UMass Republican Club, also feels that repealing the state income tax would be a bad move.

"My personal stance is that I'm not in favor of it. I would vote 'no' on it. I feel it's irresponsible," he said.

He mentioned that he supported the plan to reduce the tax from 5.75 to 5 percent over three the National Guard after Hurricane Katrina.

He said his group was deployed with weapons and ammunition, which had never been the case in his four previous humanitarian aid assignments.

"Instead of doing humanitarian work we were marching up and down the streets with loaded rifles to stop the supposed looting," he said.

The speakers told similar stories of how they came to oppose the wars they were fighting and how some memories are hard to get over.

"Things were definitely not right when I returned home after what I'd seen, witnessed and done in Iraq," said Palmer.

Nathan Lusignan, who served as a military police officer in Iraq, told how his compound was attacked by a suicide car bomb, killing a fellow soldier.

"These people were so disgusted with us and could not tolerate us so much that they killed themselves. When I talk about it, it just makes me feel... not well," he said.

Event moderator and formerly an active duty member in the Air Force, Michael VanValkenburg, said he remembers being told by a superior during a training exercise to target women and children because they could be terrorists.

"The dehumanization of the enemy really stood out," said VanValkenburg. "I became opposed to what we were doing by how I was being trained and the impact of it had on my brothers and sisters in the military."

In 2005, when Daniel Blain's child was born, he was training as a military policeman.

"The first thing that came to mind was not 'Wow, I'm a dad,' but 'how can I train to kill someone else's baby?'" said Blain, "I as a Christian and a father could not continue to serve."

Blain said he then applied for discharge as a conscientious objector, which allows soldiers to avoid participation in combatant warfare based on religious, moral or ethical grounds.

He said his application has not been accepted and has seen soldiers wait up to 18 months before having theirs considered. During the process, Blain said he has not been supported by many military members.

"I have even faced scorn and derision from family members, including my parents," he said.

Natalia Tylim a member of the Campus Antiwar Network and a senior at Smith College also spoke and said the government has given many people a false sense of hope on the success of the insurgency of troops in Iraq.

The crowd applauded each speaker, including members from the Raging Granny's of Western Mass. who introduced the event with a song.

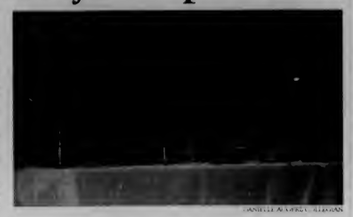
The women are part of an international group who sing for peace and justice where people request them.

Raging Granny member Donna McKay told how she appreciated the stories each speaker shared.

"They were here giving us their experiences at their own expense," she said.

"I was really moved by their comments and stories," said Packi Wieland, another member. "I appreciate their honesty and how important it is for us to hear those stories.

"It was really good," said sophomore and public health sciences major Courtney Battisteli, "They got their points across well. I wish they had more time."



"I think it is great what they are doing," said Heather Ross, a junior majoring in environmental policy.

An anti-war vigil was held outside after the two-hour panel discussion.

Iraq Veterans Against the War aims to "give a voice to the large number of active duty service people and veterans who are against this war, but are under various pressures to remain silent," according to their official Website.

Founded by Iraq war veterans in Boston, July 2004, the IVAW consists of over 1,300 members across 48 states, Washington, D.C., Canada and on overseas military bases. The group includes recent veterans and active duty servicemen and women from all branches of the military, the National Guard, and reservists who have served in the United States military since Sept. 11, 2001.

Palin, Biden debate tonight

WASHINGTON — Sen. Joe Biden spent the past several days at a hotel in Wilmington, Del., preparing for Thursday night's vice presidential debate in St. Louis, surrounded by a clutch of top aides and Democratic strategists.

David Axelrod, Sen. Barack Obama's top adviser, was there, as were Ron Klain, a former top aide and debate adviser to Al Gore, and Valerie Biden Owens, Biden's sister and lead political adviser. The group peppered Biden with questions he might have to field, reviewed tapes of his opponent's debate performances and tried to prepare for any contingency in the sole face-off between the vice presidential nominees.

But strategists in both parties say the famously garrulous and gaffe-prone Biden must be mindful of another factor: the fact that his opponent, Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, is a woman.

Biden has spoken with longtime friends, including Geraldine Ferraro, the first woman to serve as a major party's vice presidential nominee, and Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., and Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., about how to approach the debate. And his advisers brought in another female Democratic politician, Michigan Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm, to portray Palin in the practice sessions.

Biden has refused to take out after Palin since she was named as Sen. John McCain's running mate just more than a month ago, even as Palin has been largely shielded from the press and has stumbled in some of the few interviews she has granted.

Biden has said Palin will be "very, very tough," noting her effective delivery of her speech at the Republican National Convention.

"I am not good at the one-line zingers," Biden said last month. "That's not my deal. If that's going to be the measure of how these debates are judged, I'm not going to do very well."

Palin, meanwhile, has projected confidence about the debate, mocking Biden at a campaign rally earlier this week by saying "I've been hearing about his Senate speeches since I was in, like, second grade."

"I think the expectations are such that it is hard for him to win because she has lowered expectations," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster who advised Biden during his primary campaign. "I think he could really crush her, but he has to that in a way that is likable among women."

In interviews, Boxer and Ferraro said they reminded Biden he regularly debates against women in the Senate.

"I told him you debate women on the floor, in committee, you've debated (Sen.) Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas). Treat Sarah Palin the same way," Boxer said.

But other observers, both Democrats and Republicans, say Biden must take into account how undecided female voters will view his approach to Palin. In her 1984 debate, Ferraro herself took the opportunity to cast her opponent as sexist.

"I almost resent, Vice President Bush, your patronizing attitude that you have to teach me about foreign policy," she said in their meeting.

Ferraro, who was a strong backer of Clinton during the Democratic primaries but says she will vote for Obama in November, said Obama was "arrogant and sexist" when he called Clinton "likable enough" during a debate in New Hampshire earlier this year.

"Joe Biden wouldn't do that," said Ferraro, a sharp critic of Obama during the primaries.

years, which commonwealth voters elected to do in 2000. Though the legislature eventually "froze" the rollback at the current 5.3 percent rate, Tabb feels the proposal laid out in Question 1 goes too far.

He said members of the Republican Club, including the executive board, are almost perfectly split on Question 1.

Though Einhorn and Tabb worry that a lack of a state income tax will hurt public education, Rich Aucoin, the spokesman for the Committee for Small Government, argues that schools will actually benefit.

"I think it would be greatly improved because what we have now is tremendous waste at the local level due to too much state government," Aucoin said. "We're facing some very fiscally difficult times right now and people really can't afford to keep overfeeding and overspending on government. Everyone knows there's a lot of waste in government, we see it the news every day."

He said that dishonesty and a lack of transparency in how the state spends money are the reasons the state's economy is in poor shape. He accused the state of meddling in communities' business and corrupting local government.

Aucoin said a few years ago the state government told his home city of Waltham that it had a 'racial imbalance problem.' They then offered to reimburse 99 percent of the cost if the city would build eight new schools and start a busing program to insure Waltham had a diverse student population, according to Aucoin.

"The city was very happy. It was actually a great example of a melting pot. I always marveled at Waltham's ability to have some many different kinds of ethnic people living there," he said. "They came in and tried to claim we had some kind of racial problem that was causing disharmony, when in fact they were the ones causing the disharmony, they're the ones that were causing the disfunctions."

Aucoin said that's an example of the kind of wasteful spending he hopes to cut by passing question one.

Though opposed to the income tax, Aucoin says that he and the committee have never objected to state funding for schools, maintenance and police and fire departments as far as it is necessary.

Aucoin said that public services were traditionally run at the local level and that when this concept was abandoned, it opened the door to corruption and overspending.

He also added that those who do not want the income tax repealed have distorted the facts. He said the committee wants taxpayers to get back 27 cents for every dollar, but that those opposing Question 1 say the committee is pushing for 40. He also said that the state says its budget in 2007 was $28 billion, but that the state comptroller's office lists it as $47.3 billion.

He said that the committee wants to reduce the budget to the 1999 level, when he says it was at $17 billion.

"We had a college system," he said. "We had libraries, we had schools. We want all of those to remain. All we are asking is for the politicians to cut the fat out of state government and fund only those things."

Einhorn and Tabb suggest that nixing the state income tax might force lawmakers to increase other taxes, such as those on sales and property, to regain money lost from the budget.

Seven states do not have a state income tax and New Hampshire and Tennessee apply it only to income from interests and dividends.

Though these states fund public education without taxing its citizens's income, certain other taxes are higher than the national average.

Despite Aucoin's comments, SGA president Malcolm Chu said voting "yes" could have dire consequences for the state.

"I am terribly opposed to Question 1. I feel that it is irresponsible. I think that it poses a huge threat to public education as well as a lot of other public services," he said. "I'm pretty positive that it'll be extremely destructive on so many different public services that are throughout this state that will disproportionately affect millions of people in this state."

Stem cells getting close

By June Q. Wu
Harvard Crimson

CAMBRIDGE — Researchers at the Harvard Stem Cell Institute are one step closer to achieving the ultimate promise of stem cell research — creating tissues for every part of the body without the use of harmful viruses or cancer-causing genes.

Harvard Medical School professor Konrad A. Hochedlinger and his colleagues reported last week on the Web site of the journal Science that they have created mouse induced pluripotent stem cells without permanently altering the genetic makeup of the cells.

Their technique allows scientists to genetically manipulate a patient's cells — typically skin cells or blood cells — and reprogram them into a pluripotent state. Like embryonic stem cells, these cells are then capable of morphing into any type of body tissue.

Hochedlinger's team inserted genes needed for cellular reprogramming with harmless adenoviruses.

Unlike retroviruses, which scientists have been using to create pluripotent cells, these viruses effectively disappear after a few cell divisions and do not integrate into the cells' DNA. The effect of this is that adenoviruses are free from the chief adverse effect of genetic manipulation, which can turn on cancer genes and trigger malignant tumor growth.

"The beauty of this is that if you want to use the cells therapeutically if you want to put them in somebody. It basically gets rid of the dangerous transcription factors that were used in the initial integration," said Gordon C. Weir, a Medical School professor who heads the diabetes program at the Stem Cell Institute. "The last thing you want is to transplant a potentially malignant cell into a patient."

The findings have implications for creating body tissues safe to transplant into patients to treat diseases.

The next step, according to lead author Matthias Stadtfeld, is to increase the efficiency of creating pluripotent mouse cells and then try to reproduce the work in human cells.

Currently, the number of pluripotent cells produced using retroviruses is significantly higher than that from the harmless adenoviruses. Stadtfeld, who is a post-doctoral research fellow at Harvard-affiliated Mass. General Hospital, estimated that using the more dangerous retroviruses is 10 to 100 times more efficient than the new adenovirus method.

The recent advance in stem cell research is the latest in a stream of developments by Harvard researchers this past year.

At the third annual Stem Cell Summit held at the Medical School last week, University President Drew G. Faust cited four papers published this summer as evidence of the progress made at a time when federal funding for embryonic research has been constrained by a 2001 order by President Bush.

Among the discoveries were the creation of 10 disease-specific stem cell lines and the direct conversion of mouse pancreatic cells into insulin-producing beta cells that can be used to treat patients with Type I diabetes.

"At a time when the promise of biomedical research has never been greater, our nation risks sending a signal to our best and brightest young researchers that the funds won't be there to support their hugely important career pursuits," Faust said in her welcoming remarks.

And though the next President may prove friendlier to stem cell research, funding for the National Institutes of Health has been frozen in recent years, meaning that it has declined in real terms.

Though he used money from the NIH New Innovator Award that he won last year, Hochedlinger's research was not subject to federal embryonic stem cell restrictions because the cells were created from skin cells or blood cells instead of from embryos. His work was also funded in part by the Harvard Stem Cell Institute.

While embryonic stem cell research has come under fire from those who consider it unethical, Harvard scientists involved in the work continue to say that the research is essential.

Residents face tough choices

you [lose] your student status, then you are here illegally. That's serious. So when someone writes us a letter and they close with a threat about how international students might lose their legal status, it just doesn't sit well with a lot of us – especially when we think of what these students do for the university. They are Teacher's Assistants and Research Assistants. How are these threats supposed to make us feel?"

Flanked by a few tents and signs reading "Undergrads have a $700 income and $670 rent. You figure it out," and "Grad students make $1,200, pay $800 and have to feed a family of three," the tenants attempted to raise awareness to their "financial crisis."

Throughout the day, several UMass students stopped to hear about the tenants' situations. The tenants claim they are willing to camp and fast outside Whitmore in the daylight for what may become "days of protest."

Amber Bradley, a single-mother and UMass undergraduate student studying anthropology and pre-law and living in North Village, said "It literally comes down to either I pay the rent or I buy food. One of them has to give, and it isn't going to be food. I'd rather put food in my daughter's stomach."

"We want administration to have a serious conversation with us about this issue," said Nabwala-Manda. "[Administration] made it very clear that they are really not concerned about making our housing affordable. I feel as though administration is out-of-touch, because they made comments that 'most students who go to UMass have to get loans' and that the tenants should all just get loans.' It's not easy for a student from Kenya to just walk into Bank of America and say 'hey can you give me a loan.' It's already hard for domestic students to get loans, never mind international students."

"We very much want this [housing issue] to work out for everybody," said University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

"Eviction is a last resort. We are not trivializing the residents' arguments … we understand that the rental increase is something [residents] will have to find money for, and we recognize it will be difficult."

The University has offered to pay for all tenants who recently lost the $700 state heating benefit.

The Tenant's Association also wishes to help defray the cost of living in these apartments by discussing energy conservation options with administration, but thus far, the tenants feel they "have been ignored."

Many of the tenant's feel they are paying for the University's mistake of contracting with only the Physical Plant as far as fixing heating systems for the apartments. The tenants say that their apartments lose energy because they are not insulated properly, and the Tenant's Association is currently trying to contact specialists who can determine if their apartments are energy-efficient.

Until the tenants feel they have been heard, they say they are determined to continue protesting.

"I'm already in debt, because of the cost of my education," said Tamia Barriga, a single-mother of two living in the North Village apartments. "Now I'm going to be in even more debt. And I can't move away from Amherst and take my kids out of school. I'm lucky I'm a citizen, because for international students, debt isn't even an option."

Notes go online at U. Arizona

By Chris Carter
Arizona Daily Wildcat (University of Arizona)

TUCSON, Ariz. — The time of students copying notes in between classes, at home or late at night may soon be coming to an end with a unique program called Notehall.

"It's a peer review resource where students can actually access supplemental notes and study guides for certain courses," Notehall creator Sean Conway said.

"It's essentially a dynamic, out of class, extended learning opportunity," said Tommy Bruce, president of the Associated Students of the University of Arizona. "Every student takes notes on a course different and learns different.

"The program allows students to share their notes from the course and what they got from the course. We look at it this as a great value … to learn from peers. No discredit to faculty, but it can be such a restriction to get everything into one class," he added.

The Web site, notehall.com, is developed so that students can search by course, communicate with classmates, form study groups and sell notes to be posted. Conway said one student earned $119 for submitting a study guide.

"We have over 1,000 documents, study guides and lecture notes in the database already," he added.

The format for the notes is nearly universal, encompassing Word, PowerPoint and PDF. The user uploads the document into the database, and it is soon ready for download.

There is no cost to register for Notehall but the price of study guides and lecture notes will vary. Conway said several packages were created for a semester-long need as well as on an individual basis.

"It's about a dollar for a lecture," Conway said.

The account itself will require the individual to have a university e-mail account. Conway said that after two weeks Notehall currently has 1,800 registered users. "This is going like Facebook. It's amazing," he said.

As for the quality of the notes, Conway said someone is always monitoring submissions before they are posted.

"We want to reinforce quality. We have someone on full-time that goes through all the papers," he said. "They scan all documents before they go online, just so they're not the actual lecture slides or original material the instructor posted."

To ensure the material is what the user is looking for, students will be able to preview 25 to 35 percent of the document before purchasing it.

Conway said he envisions his creation to be in nearly 70 other schools in two-years' time.

"But our focus is Arizona," he said. "There is no better school to do this at."

Student loan industry feeling heat from faltering economy

By Natalie Chau
Daily Trojan (University of Southern California)

The student loan industry is struggling to continue business as usual, while markets around the world teeter in anticipation of a Congressional bailout approval.

"Student loans have been pretty hard hit," said Michael Kim, vice president of student services at the University of Southern California Credit Union.

Because the national crisis has been blamed largely on an influx of subprime mortgage defaults, banks are acting especially conservative and being more selective in lending practices. This makes finding a loan significantly more difficult, especially for lower-income students.

"For some students, they may have to find a different lender. Some loan providers will not offer student loans," Kim said.

Kim, however, said he does not think USC students will find themselves at a disadvantage. While some lenders have stopped offering loans to some schools, USC has been protected and is expected to maintain relationships with currently available lenders.

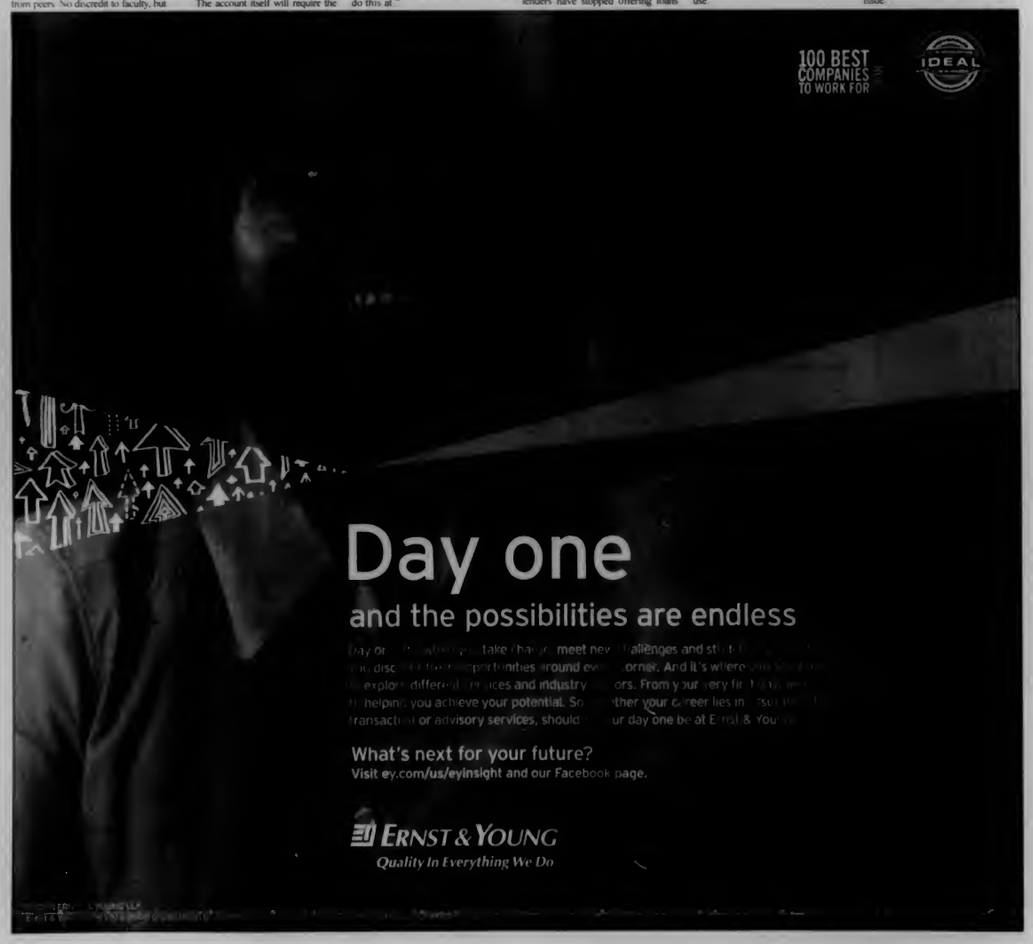
But experts say loans can often be deceiving since lenders give students money through special servicers, which require their own minimum payments.

Susan Ikerd, associate dean and director of the USC financial aid office, said students should pay attention to the sources of their loans, because often, different lenders have different servicers, requiring even more money.

"They may have to make two payments a month," Ikerd said, if they use two lenders with two different servicers.

Ikerd said she encourages students to research the lenders and make sure they are using the same servicers to avoid paying more each month.

The financial aid office will publish a new approved lenders list in January, with changes in lenders based off of the servicers the banks use.



Some students, like Meron Begashaw, said they feel that as long as there are lenders out on the market, they will continue to take out loans to fund their educations.

"It kind of scares me because I know a lot of banks are in bad shape," said Begashaw, a freshman majoring in health promotion and disease prevention. "However, I'll keep taking out loans as long as there are great benefits."

Begashaw said she is confident that her parents' high credit scores will guarantee her access to loans but is concerned that other students with bad credit will not be able to find lenders.

For Mike Malyn, a first-year architecture student, student loans were important in ensuring his matriculation at USC. He said he believes students will need loans no matter what happens.

"Schools should use their huge endowments to lower the cost of going to school," Malyn said. "College expenses are the bigger issue."

Membership growing as Greeks reshape image

impact the UMass community.

"Alex King and his IFC board are building on the work of previous IFCs. The last three IFC boards have had more of a sense of purpose about what they wanted to accomplish [than those prior,]" Wiseman said. "Different community service events require fraternity men and sorority women to work together, so I think there's been more familiarity between the different chapters. Instead of building rivalries, they've become friends and worked together. There's still competition, but they know they benefit from each other's success, so the competition is more constructive."

Events like the UDance, which raises money for Bay State Children's hospital in Springfield, require all Greek organizations to work as one.

In the 1990s, fraternities acted in their own best interest, and national chapters took notice. Pi Kappa Alpha lost its charter in 1995 for its poor habits as did Delta Chi in 2000. As was the case with King's group, however, it didn't take long for people to forget. Pi Kappa Alpha returned in the fall of 2007 and Delta Chi recently named its founding fathers for its new chapter at UMass.

"When we let a new fraternity into the IFC, we're looking for them to give back to us," King said. "We're giving them the ultimate gift, which is a charter. But they need to be involved with all the things that we do. Pi Kappa Alpha has been great since they got back involved, and Delta Chi has done the same."

Delta Chi announced its plan to return to UMass in March of 2007 after shutting down due to "risk management violations" in 2000, according to Peter Lane, director of expansion and colony operations for the fraternity.

Lane and Delta Chi leadership consultant Adam Jones have spent the first month of school recruiting young men around the UMass campus to lead the new chapter. Twenty-four students have been inducted into the fraternity's associate member program thus far. Jones expects at least seven more to begin the process in the coming days and more in the coming weeks.

The process proved difficult at times for Jones. Selecting the founders of a particular chapter is more daunting than standard recruitment. Delta Chi didn't just accept whoever applied. They actively sought out young men of character from the UMass campus. Jones and Lane visited marching band practices and met with sororities on campus to learn of non-Greeks who would make ideal members of the first class in Delta Chi's revival in Amherst.

He and Lane hesitated to establish any form of expectation regarding recruiting numbers when the semester began. That changed quickly when they first met King and the current IFC board.

"When we first came to campus, Alex King gave us a full walking tour of the campus," Jones said. "The IFC has been great to us. The fraternities on campus work together very well. We were impressed by how professional and serious they were about Greek Life."

Delta Chi's feelings of admiration for the IFC are mutual. When Lane presented the goals and plans of the fraternity to the outgoing IFC and Wiseman in March, Delta Chi received its charter with very little hesitation, even after its departure in 2000.

"They came to UMass about a year and a half ago and gave us a presentation," King said. "They gave a strong, honest presentation of Delta Chi. I met Peter and Adam, and they're both great men. And they're the ones finding the founding fathers of Delta Chi at UMass."

"Delta Chi's history at UMass is ancient history, and it doesn't take something long to become ancient here because the student body changes every four years. There's nobody here that even recalls a Delta Chi chapter at UMass" Wiseman said. "They sent representatives here and gave a very thorough presentation that the people who attended received very well.

"It wasn't always bad when Delta Chi was here, so they certainly have alumni from the era who are productive. Those alumni are involved with the school, so they paved the way for the national chapter to come and give their presentation."

Delta Chi plans to be fully functional by the end of the academic year. Other fraternities are taking advantage of the improving Greek climate on campus as well. The IFC approved Phi Gamma Delta for expansion, the group plans to begin operations next semester. Lamda Chi Alpha and Phi Delta Mu also recently submitted expansion petitions to the UMass IFC, according to Wiseman.

With the influx of four new groups in the coming years, Alpha Delta Phi isn't the only one pushing to augment recruitment figures. Sigma Phi Epsilon reported 19 new members this semester and plans to add more before the recruitment period ends, according to Sigma Phi Epsilon Recruitment Chair Alex Holden.

Holden credits the increased figures to a new, more organized approach to recruiting by his fraternity, but also recognizes the upward trend of Greek life at UMass.

"The bigger the Greek culture, the easier it is to get guys up here and the less scary the word fraternity is around campus," he said. "We all survive or none of us survive, so I'm personally very happy with [the expansion.]"

It's been a turbulent two years for all of Greek life at UMass, especially fraternities. King and the current IFC are pleased with their progress. However they can't help but look to schools of equal size in other parts of the country with consistently thriving Greek systems and hope to replicate their success. Fraternities, although rooted deeply in northeastern academia, aren't the draw in New England they are at schools in the South and Midwest.

"I think everyone has done a good job cleaning their image up and recognizing the ideals that they were founded upon," King said. "And these fraternities that are coming in have seen how we've worked to clean our image Delta Chi came to the IFC meeting and they were thoroughly impressed, we were all in shirts and ties and presented ourselves properly. We've all come together as one. We are a Greek system. No matter how many more fraternities come in, we're going to welcome them."

Joe Melkonis can be reached at managingeditor@dailycollegian.com

After the demolition of the strip of North Pleasant Street known as "Frat Row," five UMass Greek organizations were left without homes.

Peter Lane of Delta Chi addresses the Interfraternity Council in September. Delta Chi successfully revitalized its chapter at UMass after leaving the school in 2000 for "risk management violations."

Two peas in a pod

John Glaser

The Presidential debates have begun and the two opposing candidates, of what is virtually the same party with different colors and slogans, are trivially bickering about issues that differ in only insignificant details.

This fact is resolutely prevented from being a part of the discourse on any mass scale, predictably replaced by the media with paltry distractions.

Last week's debate centered on economic issues and foreign policy.

Both candidates support the corporatist bailout – nothing more than a form of price control – because both similarly believe in a system where a massive, controlling, centralized government panders to elite interests and devotedly blurs the line between public and private. Enough so one can be weary of whether we can, by definition, be categorized as a fascist state.

The two did pay lip service to helping those on "Main Street" as well as Wall Street. They jumped to be the first or the loudest to say it like children eagerly impressing their mother with "pleases" and "thank yous" in order to get sugary treats after dinner. Except instead of candy it's political points and instead of Mommy it's American voters.

Additionally, both candidates support a highly progressive tax policy, differing only on the margins and by a few percentage points. Regardless of who wins, the top 10 percent of earners in this country will still pay about 70 percent of the income taxes.

Both believe in this system where the presumption is that the property of individual Americans, in actuality, rightfully belongs to the government, to do with it what it will. And any resistance to this presumption is to be met with force. There is simply no fundamental difference between them.

Neither spoke of a change in monetary policy, namely working to prevent the devaluation of the currency and arbitrary setting of interest rates. Neither spoke for a drastic reduction in the colossal size and scope of the government, which is a hindrance to economic progress and a rising standard of living.

Americans, however, don't seem to care that every four years we're given what can only be considered a choice between bad and really bad.

Much is made about the "fundamental differences" in foreign policy approaches of the two candidates. They do seem to disagree on Iraq, but Iraq does not encapsulate our foreign policy by a long shot. Their minor differences in how they would approach Afghanistan and Pakistan (they largely agree) don't come close.

Both want to eventually bring most troops home from Iraq, but neither denies there will remain residual security forces there long after the war is considered over.

Both want a troop surge in Afghanistan and both want to reign in accountability in the Pakistani government and their Inter Services Intelligence Agency (ISI) regarding their support and protection of extremists in the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) in the north.

Neither sees any problem with the fact that we've got military bases in over 130 countries. Neither gives even the slightest hint that our government ought to withdraw our committed economic, military and political support to brutal dictatorships around the world that persistently commit atrocious human rights violations.

Neither pays any mind to halting our well established tradition of overthrowing legitimate, democratically elected governments in various nations around the globe. Neither will take a stand against our hegemonic empire and what our government does in order to maintain it.

Americans, however, don't seem to care that every four years we're given what can only be considered a choice between bad and really bad. And to even call that a choice, though, is just a bad joke.

Polls consistently show the overwhelming majority of voters choose based on marginal character qualities and personality traits, rather than on real issues.

Even those who implore others to "get informed on the issues" – healthcare, the economy, the war, is usually the cursory list – are full of it. They stick their noses in the air and high-mindedly encourage substantive investigatory participation in choosing a candidate, while knowingly and actively participating in the personality contest that is celebrity politics.

Even if the majority of the public desired a more substantive focus on candidates' stances on issues, they wouldn't receive it from the mass media. Just look at what the focus has been; black, white, guy, girl, young, old, lapel pins, lipstick and Muslim imposters, among other absurdities.

Even now that the 1-on-1 debates have begun, and real issues are ostensibly to be exchanged, the post-debate coverage for the next week focuses on which candidate got aggravated, who sounded better, whose one liners caught more laughs. It's nonsense.

The media likewise oust any early contender that deviates from the norm of these parties and threatens establishment interests, while keeping the focus not on what counts, but on meaningless contrivances.

It is impressive how resistant the media and the public are to broadening their notion of a political spectrum to include a framing of issues beyond the confines of what our one party system and their subservient media consider acceptable. Perhaps they should embrace a change.

Around Campus

Not so new dirt

S.P. Sullivan

I have a problem with "New Dirt."

I'm not as bothered by the endless construction, the resulting potholes or the endless maze of detours. Oh sure, it's messy. But that column has been written again and again. And again.

I have an issue with nomenclature.

The piles of earth that are scattered throughout campus have become iconic, a miniature Big Dig in our own backyard. And although students and faculty alike bemoan the chaos construction causes, few will argue that it hasn't yielded new facilities, new resources and new opportunities for students.

But new dirt? Not quite.

"No. You can't have new dirt," said Stephen B. Mabee, assistant professor in the geosciences department at the University of Massachusetts. I called Mabee, who is also the state geologist for the state of Massachusetts, to get a professional perspective on the subject.

Mabee's specialty is hydrogeology, the movement and allocation of water in the earth's crust. But I had a hunch that he had a little more dirt on dirt than the administration that christened the seemingly endless construction project.

"You can have old dirt that's in a new position or newly exposed so it looks like it's new," Mabee said. "When you dig a hole, taking it, displacing it, sticking it up on a pile on the side of the road, it's a new pile, but it's old dirt. Because it was there long before the University was."

The oldest references to New Dirt can be found in 2004, in a Collegian news story about former Chancellor John V. Lombardi's address to the UMass Faculty Senate. He was announcing the institution of campus construction, to be financed by the $400 million of surplus money set aside by former Governor Mitt Romney for improvements to the University.

Among them were the expansion of Skinner Hall, a new Integrated Sciences building and the recently-christened Studio Arts Building.

Here we find the humble, common noun beginnings of what would become a campus-wide campaign.

"All of us will be living with an extraordinarily messed-up Campus," Lombardi said in that prophetic address before most UMass students had even gotten their acceptance letters.

Oh John, if ye only knew.

The following four years have been an experience that starts with the word "cluster" and ends with a violation of The Daily Collegian's word usage policy.

"But remember to celebrate it," Lombardi said. "It's new dirt."

Here we find the humble, common noun beginnings of what would become a campus-wide campaign.

But now Lombardi has left us, moving to greener pastures and a fatter paycheck at Louisiana State University. For the greater good he soiled this campus, and provided Collegian columnists the opportunity to craft some awful, dirty puns.

Where the dirt came from – and who, besides Lombardi, himself quite old, thought it was new – remains a mystery. Efforts to sort this out before press time were unsuccessful, and the dirt declined to comment.

So how old is the dirt?

"Most of this stuff is of the glacial age in origin," said Mabee. "It's all materials that were deposited between 22,000 and 14,000 years ago and has been modified by processes in the last 10,000 to get it to the form we found it in when we settled the region."

When Homo sapiens first descended upon the Pioneer Valley, Mabee said, the change itself was "new."

"And then we started digging it it and moving it around and shoving it into piles and reconfiguring the landscape. But that dirt was here before we got here."

And I'm sure it was here before Lombardi started as chancellor in 2002.

"So it's not new dirt, technically, from a scientific standpoint," he said. "The movement of the dirt, the reshaping of the dirt – that's a new activity, but I don't know where they came up with that idea."

However, as far as geologic time goes, the dirt around the UMass campus and the rest of New England is pretty new. In fact, it's postglacial.

"Most of our soils here that haven't been disturbed are post-glacial, which means the glaciers swept across here and they covered this whole valley around 22,000 years ago," Mabee said. "They left the region somewhere around 14,000-12,000 years ago, and then that soil was created atop the melting glaciers' material when soil began to form on top of that."

Mabee estimates that the dirt clogging up your morning commute to class is around 10,000 years old. Compared to the mid-Atlantic region, which wasn't affected by the same glacial activity, that's pretty damn new.

But I don't think the architects of the large scale construction on campus were thinking in terms of geologic time.

Actually, on second thought:

Scratch that.

Compared to the length of time campus improvements are projected to take, and the $13 million allocated to the project in January, perhaps 10,000 years is not big thing.

Perhaps the dirt is pretty new.

Freedom of thought

Seyi Obasa

A Student's right to refuse preaching about religion may soon be in jeopardy. On Sept. 16, the Brunswick County school board considered teaching creationism alongside evolution.

The idea was first brought into consideration after county resident Joel Fanti strongly advocated on its behalf. In his argument, he reasoned that it is unfair for evolution to be taught as fact. Instead he said it should be taught as a theory, despite its extensive studies and credibility.

The board allowed him to speak for a substantial amount of time about his discontent. Fanti even offered to teach creationism in the counties' schools.

The school board overwhelmingly agreed on teaching creationism. But Chairwoman Shirley Babson, who took the podium in the initial meeting, warned that other states that have tried to teach both evolution and creationism were unsuccessful. Evolution is taught to students because the state general assembly wants it taught to students.

Such recent advocacy for creationism being taught in North Carolina as well as other states is not new. Proponents in the N.C. General Assembly tried to amend the law in 1997 to have evolution taught as theory and not as fact in public schools.

However, the measure did not pass. Kansas State University also ruled creationism should be taught as an alternatives to evolution. Bobby Henderson, a student and physics major, petitioned to the University that if intelligent design was taught so should the belief that the Flying Spaghetti Monster created the universe should be taught too.

In 2005, a federal judge ruled that intelligent design, a theory very similar to evolution, couldn't constitutionally be taught. The theory states that organisms are so advanced that they must have been created by a higher power.

Our separation of church and state allows individuals to choose what religion they want to affiliate with, or whether they want to affiliate with a faith at all.

A day later the state government rebutted. Edd Dunlap, science section chief of the North Carolina Department of public education said that creationism couldn't be taught in North Carolina schools.

He ruled that religious teachings cannot be taught in class as part of the core curriculum, but can instead be offered as a religion or philosophy elective.

Biblical literature was already previously offered as an elective in Brunswick County schools, but removed as an option for the current year because no students enrolled in the course.

According to Dunlap, evolution must be taught in the state schools in accordance to national standards. In his ruling he said material that is not within national standards is useless because it does not prepare students for what they will be tested on in state and national examinations.

Besides, he concluded, students should be presented with evolution as a substantiated theory, backed up by scientific evidence. Students should not be taught and manipulated in what to believe.

A lot has changed since the Scopes trial of 1925. So the fact that parts of the nation are considered teaching creationism alongside evolution, or even predominantly teaching evolution, is a step in the wrong direction.

Students in America must be prepared for our globalizing world, and be taught key and essential scientific topics. Advancements in math and science are absolutely essential for developed and established nations such as the United States to maintain dominance within the world.

Fundamentalist Christians may want America's moral fiber and various other aspects of American lifestyles to be more in line with Christian teachings, but America was established to avoid the tyranny of a theocracy.

If American schools taught creationism alongside evolution, this lends itself to further Christian influence in the public sphere.

Creating our education system to cater to Christianity lends itself to more laws and regulations established in favor of Christianity, which disenfranchises non-Christians in America.

Our separation of church and state allows individuals to choose what religion they want to affiliate with, or whether they want to affiliate with a faith at all.

When we start to allow church and state to be one of the same, how is it any different than the very terrorists that we are trying to defeat, who subscribe to the fundamentalist aspects of Islam?

In conclusion, students should continue to be taught evolution, as it is very necessary to stay competitive in a globalized world. Teaching creationism only sets America back by reneging on our principles.

Students should be taught theories that are proven and substantiated. They should be given the choice through their churches, families and other people in their lives to decide how nature and all things were created.

Overstepping boundaries

Last week, UMass chaplain Kent Higgins tried to get students academic credits for political campaigning. His idea was the Obama campaign needed canvassers in New Hampshire, and UMass students were easy bait.

Higgins boldly sent out an email pleading for students to "activate yourself." He explained, "It would be just fine with McCain if Obama supporters just think about helping, then sleep in and stay home between now and Election Day."

As a follow up, Higgins disingenuously sent an e-mail out to potential McCain supporters letting them know even Republicans can partake in the credit giveaway.

"John McCain needs your help in New Hampshire, where the race with Obama is still a toss-up!" he wrote. "Reading this email, thinking about it, giving money, making phone calls, registering voters, and voting yourself are all important, but you're really concerned about how to help most effectively, then please COME TO NEW HAMPSHIRE TO CANVASS - as often as you can clear time between now and Election Day! If you're concerned about the prospects for this election, good! The most important way to make a difference in the outcome is to activate yourself!"

Higgins's obvious bias is the forerunner to a much larger issue on campus. When did it become acceptable for university employees to bring their political partisanship to the classroom?

Most students have taken a political science, history and yes, even journalism class where the professor makes an offhand remark about the president that is completely irrelevant to the coursework.

Classroom debates are stifled when we know which lever our professors are pulling in the voting booth. How are students supposed to feel comfortable expressing their views when they are fully aware their professors' are to the contrary?

It's this kind of unnecessary commentary that alienates students with differing opinions. Students feel they can't freely speak about their ideologies when the person who grades their papers and tests openly disagrees.

Not everyone is willing to risk a bad grade for a chance to speak their minds. For some students it's not worth it. Students should never be intimidated by their professors for the beliefs they hold.

So it doesn't matter what side of the spectrum they associate themselves with, professors need to leave their politics at home. There are few instances when it is appropriate for a professor to bring up their beliefs. And coercion is definitely not in the job description.

A professor's job is to teach, and with this responsibility, often times students are influenced by what they have to say. A professor is an authority figure, and when they abuse that power to persuade students to act or think in a way that is conducive to their own, it is a gross breach of trust.

"...a forum where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

A credible debate

Credit where credits due

Scott Harris

Kent Higgins is a partisan, someone who has a deeply-held belief that Barack Obama should be the next President of the United States. He is joined by millions of other Americans.

Similarly, there are a handful of people who still believe that John McCain should be the next President of the United States. At a public university, supposedly an epicenter of the free exchange of ideas, we should encourage every student to get out there, register voters, get involved in the process and make a difference for the side they believe in.

And yes, in the busy life of the average college student, sometimes that means getting some credits for what you do.

The whole controversy surrounding Higgins's program to offer credits in return for work on behalf of Barack Obama is somewhat silly. On the most basic level, the University is offering credits in return for political organizing work.

It is important to remember the University would be incurring no cost, because a private donor had signed on to pay for the credits. If you are interested in politics, this kind of entry-level work is almost required to get your foot in the door at any paying job.

In fact, UMass should be somewhat embarrassed that it does not offer any institutional program like the one Higgins proposed.

Opponents of the Higgins program demagogue the issue by saying that it is a matter of free speech, and a credit-based program around Obama work is tantamount to an endorsement of the candidate and an implicit condemnation of the Republican.

Any sensible person knows this is not the case. If some conservative professor developed a credit program around doing political work on behalf of John McCain, there would be no controversy.

I would strongly support that program because there is legitimate academic value to it. As the Republican group has shown us, the University will stumble over itself to ensure that all views are given their proper airtime (as they should).

Ironically, free speech is exactly what these very same opponents would be shouting outside the Student Union if there did happen to be a professor handing out credits for a McCain program.

Can't you imagine the conservative furor? The Republican club on the campus lawn with black duct tape over its mouths? The Boston Herald would write about the extinguishment of political rights. Rush Limbaugh would give a 30 minute monologue about the evil liberal academics. It would surely be a sight to see.

In the end, the issue is not about free speech at all. This controversy has been manufactured by a campus Republican group that has shown its propensity to get their knickers in a twist at even the slightest offense, and a University system gun-shy about defending its faculty or students. That's the bottom line.

So, once removed from the immediate controversy of the Higgins program, where do we go from here? I think all students could support a program where the University gives credits to students who do political organizing work coordinated by a team or committee of faculty in the political science or history departments.

The main concern is where the University draws the line in regards to involvement in this program. We have to be careful that the UMass for Barack Obama and the counterpart organization for John McCain do not become academically-sponsored groups.

In fact, UMass should be somewhat embarrassed that they do not offer any institutional program like the one Higgins proposed.

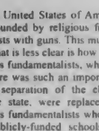
This is perhaps for no other reason than their ability to maintain independence and flexibility in their operations. It is not immediately clear to me where that line could or should be drawn.

My other concern is that it is often hard to attach criteria to political-based credit programs, especially if they are done without direct supervision. To give the clearest example, is there a requirement to register a certain number of voters?



Different people will have different standards for this kind of work, as you could go six hours without accomplishing anything or be able to get more done in a neighborhood than a team of 20. In my experience, it is often a home run or strikeout.

I urge the University, with both those concerns in mind, to work with a committee of faculty here to develop a program that is non-partisan in nature and will give students academic credit for participating in the political process in an organized and purposeful way.

Kent Higgins's approach may have been ripe for controversy, but that doesn't mean he had a bad idea. As long as every party feels that they are involved, we can come together to help make UMass the school that churns out experienced political strategists and organizers.

Taxes don't fund campaigns

Jon Peterson

The United States of America were founded by religious fundamentalists with guns. This much is fact; what is less clear is how those religious fundamentalists, who felt that there was such an importance in the separation of the church and the state, were replaced by religious fundamentalists who feel that publicly-funded schools are good places to endorse political candidates.

We are in the midst of one of the most hotly contested battles for the presidency in remembered history. There is a partisan split so wide that a likeness hasn't been seen in almost 150 years.

Individuals are once again giving or retracting respect from their peers based on something which they will have little at all to do with the outcome of, and are now breaking the rules that were laid down and shown to be necessary by, the founding fathers.

In all reality, what has happened recently regarding the University of Massachusetts Chaplain who attempted to provide an opportunity for liberally-minded students to bring their views into practice, could never be considered crucial.

The idea was that two credits would be given to students to campaign in New Hampshire, a hotly-contested state that commonly lines up its votes with the rest of the country and sets the trend for the rest of the voting season.

Still, not a single one of those students, or even the Chaplain, could honestly have thought that the individuals they swayed would be those who would make the critical, tie breaking vote. Anyone who could make that claim would be insane – though the same logic can go to any person who wonders whether or not they will vote.

New Hampshire regularly splits its votes in presidential races with less than 1 percent. There are over 1.3 million people in the state, and it would be very difficult for any group to sway the votes of tens of thousands of voters sparsely populating a state with a density of one fifth that of Massachusetts.

Why is this big news then? It's because it cannot be allowed to be any less. Public institutions like UMass are funded by the state with the knowledge that while there may very well be a high demand for such a program, the way in which the Chaplain wanted to institute his program was wrong.

No amount of demand can possibly overrule our basic ethical laws that play a very real part in our states governing decisions, though certain people feel that this behavior is correct.

It's in the same way that one might argue in favor of allowing 51 percent of the population to gouge the eyes out of the other 49 percent of the population if there was a vote on the matter.

And while companies are responsible to their stock holders, the state should be held even more accountable on how it is responsible to its stock holders – the citizens.

As so, we all pay for UMass, Democrats and Republicans, Libertarians and Communists alike both in tuition, and in taxes. And it is not in the best interests of the country to have a governmentally-funded race for a candidate – that way lays the ovens.

When it all comes down to it, taxes are the way in which the government has its power – and when the behemoth gets its claws into something, it's hard to get them off.

I don't remember voting for a candidate supported by my tax dollars, and I am fairly sure that no one else in the state has either.

There could also be a somewhat callous pride in someone who claims that their candidate is the only person to be put into office, and that anyone who has a differing opinion must want bad things to happen to the country.

I don't remember voting for a candidate supported by my tax dollars, and I am fairly sure that no one else in the state has either.

There simply isn't a half-country full of people who want to see the country torn apart from the inside – such a group's motives and actions would be much more publicly visible.

The actions we see here are systemic and surprisingly common among the support of certain political candidates. It is going unchecked and sometimes even with the blessings of the candidates themselves, though never without the possibility of these candidates denying such until after their elections. Barack Obama's lawyers have threatened to pull the licenses of TV channels airing ads of NRA backed opposition.

Leading politicians regularly give favors for those they receive, as did Rep. Barney Frank (D-MA) when he received over $100,000 in campaign funds from Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae before telling the Senate and its Banking Committee that efforts to re-regulate in 2003 and 2005 were unnecessary and silly.

Such men are not patriotic in their acts as were our founding fathers, they are traitors. And, while I can't say whether or not the next president will live up to the 27 percent approval rating of President Bush, but I can guess how it will be reported.

Properly within the private sector of the Main Stream Media, where the stock holders determine what policies go through and where individuals decide to show their support or lack of for the news Companies that report it with their pocketbook means with their money – can [illegible] journal.

YCMP CONCERNS

Dear Editor,

(Re: "Your costly meal plan," Paul Payer, Editorial, September 29)

I was troubled to read the article today entitled "Your costly meal plan" written by one of your columnists. Let me address his concerns and tell the other side of the story.

He complained about the prices of the Your Campus Meal Plan (YCMP). The YCMP meal plans offer students the flexibility to eat in the all-you-care-to-eat Dining Commons and in the Retail Operations across campus. All meal plans are priced to support the expenses involved in running the dining programs as we are a totally self-funded operation.

The Residential Meal Plans such as the Value Meal Plan enjoy economies of scale and bulk purchasing power inherent in large scale "cafeteria-style" operations where individual units such as bottles of soda and bags of chips are not offered and the meals are produced in larger quantities.

On the other hand, the Retail Operations across campus must absorb a higher labor rate per meal served and the food costs run approximately 20 percent higher largely due to the reduced size of the operation and the products offered such as French Meadow.

With a higher food-cost-per-meal and labor-cost-per-meal, the YCMP plans must maintain a "meal exchange/cash-equivalency" limit. Nevertheless, we have increased the meal exchange to $7.75 for this year from $7.25 last year which represents an increase of 6.5 percent in purchasing power. The YCMP plan prices increased only 3.4 percent during this same time period.

There are many other expenditures that we must support with our meal plan revenues besides the skyrocketing cost of food and the labor to produce the meals and clean the buildings.

Dining Services also fully supports all other operating costs including a utility expense of over $1.5 million last academic year. We fund all repair and renovations to our facilities and debt service for our newly renovated Berkshire Dining Commons which together totaled over $2.7 million in 07-08.

Dining Services also paid over three million dollars in overhead to the University's Central Offices for our use of services provided to the campus. Any surplus realized in any fiscal year is immediately applied to our reserve for future renovations to all of our Dining facilities across campus.

YCPM thrives because of the flexibility, value and convenience, not to mention the good food at UMass.

A BROAD BRUSH

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Just Justice," Chris Amorosi, Editorial, September 30)

Chris Amorosi's editorial in the Sept. 30 edition of the Collegian is insulting to legal gun owners in this country. He paints them with a broad brush as insecure, irresponsible fools bent on executing "criminals" at all cost.

This is not true. Most legal gun owners in this country are sober, responsible individuals. There are at least 200 million registered firearms in this country, yet in 2005 only 789 unintentional shootings were reported. This does not sound like irresponsible behavior.

Society exists to protect those who obey its strictures. Criminals do not, and citizens must have recourse. Amorosi states that police should solely be responsible for dealing with criminal behavior, but in our society this is not possible.

Our police respond to crime that is reported to them or that they see happening. As a citizen, it is our responsibility to protect ourselves when police are not present, but Mr. Amorosi would have you submit to a criminal's every demand rather than defend yourself. Why should the law be biased in favor of criminals by forbidding a citizen the means to protect themselves?

Even more perplexing is his stance on convicts. He claims that prisons should seek to educate and reform criminals so that they may re-enter society upon their release, unless they are a second-class citizen "hopeless case," under which circumstances you would be subjected to an inhumane life of suffering and hard work until you die of exhaustion.

This philosophy is not consistent with his support of the right to life illustrated by his opinions on firearms. What arbitrary line will be drawn to decide who is "hopeless" and who deserves rehabilitation?

I wish that Mr. Amorosi had spoken to a few actual gun-owners before characterizing them all as impotent cowards that stroke their guns for comfort, and that he had more carefully considered his opinions on incarceration before writing that editorial.

NOT SO DIVERSE

Dear Editor:

(Re: Saving diversity of thought," Greg Collins, Editorial, September 30)

Greg Collins claims he is trying to save diversity of thought and in question to this just the opposite, attack it. When you have a country that has been run by commercial and conservative forces for 28 of the past 28 years you would assume there would be only minimal left places of higher education to promote diversity of thought by presenting a political philosophy different than the one being used to govern the country.

If Greg were really for the diversity of thought, then he would be commending the University for presenting additional views of how the country should be run.

The majority of these liberal campuses across the country are the exact opposite of desert of conservative policy actually being put into practice. It looks like UMass isn't promoting conservative thought because, unfortunately, there aren't that many of them comparatively, but because there are fewer of them doesn't mean they are being systematically silenced by the administration.

I find it fascinating that Greg does not think professors are not studying the reality of human nature. When professors insist on digging beneath the surface of an issue that does not mean they have taken things out of the realm of reality.

In my opinion they have gone deeper into the realm of human nature by examining the institutional, cultural and societal forces that lead to these current realities.

If Greg really believed he was being viewed differently wouldn't it have made sense to use the word liberal establishment instead of white establishment as he does in his editorial?

By admitting there is a white establishment he inherently points out that people of color are not part of this white establishment and therefore must be the real "others."

How can conservatives, who are arguably part of the white establishment, be viewed more as 'others' than the 'others' who are not even included in the establishment?

This characterization that conservatives are viewed as the most different people on campus appears to be another conservative tactic of making themselves the victims in a situation where they are not being victimized or actually being disenfranchised for their conservative beliefs.

Am I to actually believe that I would be looked at more differently by my peers if I was a conservative than if I was black. Conservatives aren't 'others,' they're just another part of the student body.

He talks about preconceived notions but says nothing about his own preconceived notions that UMass is pushing liberal thought. If UMass really pushed liberal thought instead of critical thought would his article ever have been published?

I have some news flashes for Greg Collins. According to a 2006 UHS nationwide poll of 1,151 people, the majority of Americans, 36 percent, felt that Affirmative Action programs should be continued.

In a 2008 UHS poll, a whopping 63 percent felt that same-sex couples should be allowed to either get legally married or be allowed to enter into a civil union.

In a 2008 Gallup poll "Americans are more likely to call themselves 'pro-choice' on abortion than 'pro-life' 50 percent to 44 percent." (Notice the cited sources)

With today's political climate, it is necessary to promote liberal thought in order to create critical thought and the two-sided intellectual environment Collins wants to have.

'Vanity Fair' failure transitions to silver screen

BY CHRIS LEE
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD — When life handed British journalist Toby Young lemons, as the cliche goes, he made lemonade. Not just any lemonade. After getting fired from his dream job as a writer for Vanity Fair magazine – for repeatedly embarrassing editor Graydon Carter with stunts such as sending a strippergram to a colleague on Take Our Daughters to Work Day and snorting cocaine with bad-boy artist Damien Hirst during a photo shoot – Young published a memoir in 2001 about his self-abuse and social stupidity titled "How to Lose Friends & Alienate People."

But it didn't end there. Young continued to take his limited experiences and juice them beyond any reasonable expectation. He created an extensive body of work based around a handful of personal misfortunes and embarrassing social interactions, back-dropped by Manhattan's gimlet swirl and peopled by vapid fashionistas, snobs and bold-faced names.

Those incidents have graced the page (in book form and dozens of newspaper and magazine articles), the stage and now the screen. All the more surprising for a guy who invariably seems to provoke strong reactions in people he meets, who has been described in the British media as "a bold satirist" as well as a "skinny-chested opportunist with the looks of a punctured beachball, the charisma of a glovepuppet and an ego the size of a Hercules supply plane."

Via e-mail, Vanity Fair's editor explained his surprise at Young's ability to parlay an undistinguished six-month stint at the magazine into an oeuvre. "I can only compare it with a brief one-night stand that results in octuplets," Carter said.

Initially rejected by 22 publishers, "How to Lose Friends" became a best-seller on both sides of the Atlantic and went on to be translated into 12 languages including Bulgarian, Mandarin and Croatian. It was adapted into a one-man show; first in London's Soho with Jack Davenport (Norrington in the blockbuster "Pirates of the Carribean" movie franchise) as its star and then later on the city's theater-rich West End with Young handling acting duties himself.

On Friday, a fictionalized version of Young's tale of self-immolation will reach its widest audience yet with the release of "How to Lose Friends & Alienate People" the movie – an R-rated romantic comedy starring "Shaun of the Dead" star Simon Pegg, Jeff Bridges and Kirsten Dunst. The film's U.K. publicity touts it as "a true story based on a real idiot." (In what is certainly not a vote of confidence for the film, its director Robert Weide declined to be interviewed for this story.)

Perhaps the most extreme example of "failing upward" to hit popular culture in recent memory – "American Idol" reject William Hung runs a close second – Young frames discussion of his career trajectory around terms other than lemons and lemonade. "I've managed to fashion gold out of base metal," he said on a chaise lounge by the pool of a Beverly Hills hotel. "I've somehow taken a string of really humiliating fail-

'Holy legos, video Batman'

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Lego Group has made toys since the 1940s. What started off as simple wooden blocks soon evolved to plastic interlocking bricks.

More recently, Lego introduced the public to Lego Mindstorms, which could be used to make fully-functioning Lego robots. Then of course, there was Lego Island, the PC video game based on lego people. They then realized something ground breaking: incorporating movies with legos and video games.

The first attempt at this was a series of "Star Wars" games that faired reasonably well. The next was a game based on the original three "Indiana Jones" films, which while it was enjoyable enough to play, was lacking in certain aspects of gameplay. On Sept. 23, they released their latest game in the series, "Lego Batman."

"Batman" takes a different approach than the last two movie-turned Lego-based video game series. Unlike "Star Wars" and "Indiana Jones," the "Batman" movies were made in three pairs under three different directors. There's nothing that officially says whether the game is based on the movies, comics, animated series or another source, but judging by the character design, it seems that they are based closest to the animated series.

The game play is similar to "Star Wars" and "Indy," but brings a handful of fresh and interesting features to the table. The levels are relatively short, and are preceded and concluded by a brief animated story. There are three main stories, with five sub-levels in each, just like the others.

The first story is based on the Riddler, the second revolves around the Penguin and the final is based on none other than Batman's most notorious enemy, the Joker. Along the way, you encounter almost every single villain Batman ever faced in the comics, which includes Clayface, the Mad Hatter, Poison Ivy, Mr. Freeze, Man-Bat, Scarecrow and Catwoman, just to name a few.

You trek through each level as a pair of heroes, which are almost always Batman and Robin. Eventually you can choose from other heroes such as a Night Wing, Batgirl, Alfred or Commissioner Gordon. As they go through the levels, they require different suits to wear that allow them to achieve different goals and parts of the levels. For example, one of these suits gives Batman a hang-glider, which allows him to jump much farther horizontally.

The objectives of the game are pretty much the same as its predecessors. As the heroes, you go through a level, fight the boss at the end and then replay the game later on to complete all the achievements and unlock everything.

One criticism of the Lego video games of old is that they are too quick and easy to beat and lose their appeal too quickly. This latest one separates itself from the past games with its replay value.

Once you finish playing the levels as Batman and Robin, you can play as the villains trying to defeat them. In villain adventure mode, the levels are different, but are based on the same story line from the hero mode. This effectively doubles the game play. Further adding to that, the villain levels have their own unique unlockables and achievements.

Even on top of that, you can go back to the hero adventure mode and play as the villains, which is necessary to unlock everything in the game. Each villain has a unique ability that allows them to achieve things other characters can't. The Riddler can manipulate others' minds, and Poison Ivy can walk through toxic waste and kill with a kiss. Clayface and Mr. Freeze possess super strength that allows them to pick up and throw large objects.

Overall, there is something special about this game. The combination of the nostalgia of legos and Batman create a game that is hard to put down until every last bit of it is beaten. "Star Wars" and "Indiana Jones" attempted to create a game that everyone could play, but was directed toward children. "Batman" is truly made for all ages.

It is somewhat more difficult than the other games but still not tough. The main two features of the game that really make it a success are the inclusion of almost all of Batman's villains and its strong replay value. If you are a huge Batman nerd, this game was made for you. If you're not lucky enough to have a friend you can mooch the game off of after they beat it, definitely go out and get it for yourself.

Batman and Robin combine forces in the latest in a long line of Lego-branded video games.

After a successful tour in support of Avril Lavigne, local pop-rock act Boys Like Girls will headline the Verizon Wireless Campus Tour Friday at Smith College.

Verizon Tour at Smith

Boys Like Girls headline show

BY JENNIFER TURNER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Verizon Wireless Campus Tour, featuring Boys Like Girls, Cute Is What We Aim For and Lights, comes to John M. Greene Hall at Smith College this Friday.

Boys Like Girls are set to headline the Northampton event. The band is most widely known for its songs "The Great Escape" and "Thunder" off its self-titled gold album, which it released in 2006.

Hailing from Taunton, Boys Like Girls began with founding members Martin Johnson and John Keefe. Johnson was the lead vocalist of punk rock band The Drive, while Keefe served as the drummer for another local-area band Strutter.

The duo soon joined with bassist Bryan Donahue and formed a trio known as Lancaster. It was only after recruiting guitarist Paul DiGiovanni in 2005 that the quartet finally became Boys Like Girls. They've enjoyed a busy touring schedule ever since.

Following a series of successful dates on the 2007 Vans Warped Tour, the band made a habit of bringing its music across the country, most recently finishing a large venue tour with Avril Lavigne in May 2008. The band credits its individual differences in musical influences as the source behind its trademark sound.

The band will release its first DVD entitled "read between the lines" on Tuesday, Nov. 4. The DVD will include approximately 45 minutes of tour performances as well as behind the scenes footage of the band. Boys Like Girls will be back in the studio later this year to work on its second album.

Opening for Boys Like Girls will be Cute Is What We Aim For and Lights. The self-proclaimed "power pop" band from Buffalo, N.Y., Cute Is What We Aim For formed in 2005 and Rolling Stone recently listed the band on its "10 Artists To Watch."

Its 2006 debut album "The Same Old Blood Rush with a New Touch" peaked at 75 on the "Billboard Top 200" charts and recently followed-up with its sophomore album, "Rotation."

The band's sound is a testament to its wide array of modern influences. The band credits bands Blink 182, Smashing Pumpkins, Dave Matthews, Goldfinger and Taking Back Sunday as being its prominent musical influences.

Toronto newcomer Lights has garnered quite a following online, through both MySpace and YouTube. Her song "February Air" was used in a recent Old Navy commercial, which has created some substantial buzz throughout the music industry.

Lights utilizes synthesizers and a computer to create an energetic sound. Since her recorded music is multi-layered and relatively impossible to perform as a solo artist, two musicians will join her on stage for the live show.

Lights has just finished her self-titled debut EP. The music video for her single "Drive My Soul" premiered on YouTube on Sept. 22, where she also regularly updates a video blog.

Tickets for the Verizon Wireless Campus Tour are still available through the Northampton Box Office. Doors open at 7:00 p.m. and the show will begin at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are $15 for Five-College students and $20 for the public. This is a general admission seating event. John M. Greene Hall is located on the Smith College campus. There is limited parking available nearby, as well as an on-campus parking garage.

She's a touch on the quirky side

BY MINDY FARABEE
LOS ANGELES TIMES

As Mel, the psychotically besotted fan on HBO's cult hit "Flight of the Conchords" – the deadpan adventures of New Zealanders Jemaine Clement and Bret McKenzie, a musical duo taking New York not-so-much by storm – actress Kristen Schaal has struck a sort of geeky gold. She's inspired YouTube montages and lately garnered print love from Bust magazine and McSweeney's The Believer. Yet thus far, hers has remained a simmering sort of celebrity.

"People seem to think they're the only ones who have seen the show," Schaal says. "One time I was out to dinner with one of my friends in New York, and when I got up to go to the bathroom, the guy at the table next to us leaned in and said, 'Do you know she's on an HBO show?' "

She may have reached the most eyeballs as Mel, the stalker with the wonderfully awkward bathroom encounters and gloriously dorky dance moves. But recently, Schaal also spent a month writing on "South Park" and, beginning this past spring, has logged appearances as the "Daily Show's" new "senior women's issues commentator."

Next summer, she has small roles in three major studio flicks, starring the likes of Will Ferrell, Anjelica Huston and John C. Reilly. For the moment, she's biding her time working on a book of short stories for HarperCollins, whipping up a few movie scripts with her comedy partner Kurt Braunohler, and peddling her loopy brand of stand-up to live audiences now measured in the thousands.

Schaal's forte is her absurdist wit, which pays off in a delicious avalanche of surprises. Her character-driven stage shows turn on plot twists, such as her and Braunohler's rendition of a Colonial-era telephone conversation, during which Pocahontas and John Smith abruptly jump from small talk to phone sex.

"I think it's really just finding something unexpected," she says. "Our favorite form of comedy is the unlikeliness of things. ... What I want to keep doing is just have the audience not be able to predict it at all."

On this hot, smoggy afternoon, however, she's content to lounge barefoot in a lawn chair, decked out in a red and white candy-striper-esque dress and sipping a VitaminWater, in her aunt and uncle's leafy backyard in the Burbank, Calif., ...

Schaal comes by her sincerity honestly. Currently a Brooklyn resident, she grew up on a farm in Colorado, where she joined the local 4-H and sang and danced for the family cattle.

"I'd perform for them while they ate their hay. They kind of have the same look of expectancy and dullness that an audience has, so it was perfect," Schaal says. "I could perform for anyone after that."

Schaal's first "Daily Show" bit, during which she tapes a video message to our first female president in 2300, came directly out of her stage act, as did her winning audition tape for HBO.

"We watched her for literally 15 seconds" before deciding to give her the job, says "Conchords" co-star/co-creator McKenzie. "She was just hilarious, and that's what we were looking for. She's a brilliant improviser." And also evidently a perverse little Method actor who likes to Mel it up between takes. "She kept Jemaine and me on our toes," McKenzie says.

Author adds technology to reading experience

BY BENJAMIN J. ROMANO
THE SEATTLE TIMES

SEATTLE — Bellingham, Wash., author Clyde Ford is tapping technology to keep his novels relevant to increasingly distracted audiences.

The former IBM systems engineer built a Web-based application for his latest book, "Precious Cargo," that allows readers to virtually visit the places in the story – a murder mystery set in the San Juan Islands and Inside Passage.

"I wanted to do something special with the release of 'Precious Cargo' that would act as a bridge between the paper page and the digital age," Ford said. He's particularly interested in reaching younger readers, who are often "more literate in online technologies than in reading a book."

He entered his application, OnScene, on Microsoft Virtual Earth and Google Earth, free downloadable software that maps the world in two or three dimensions.

Once readers "virtually" fly to locations such as Lummi Island near Bellingham, and Eagle Harbor, they can explore further with background on local history and geography, live webcam views and readings by the author and other people.

Ford, 56, is also generating interest in his book with an online video trailer, narrated by actor Morgan Freeman.

Publishers and authors are looking for ways to keep their products relevant in the face of declining readership and spreading digital media.

A comprehensive National Endowment for the Arts study published last fall found significant declines in reading for pleasure in nearly every age group. More than half of middle- and high-school students reported watching television, instant messaging or using other media while reading.

Roger Cooper, publisher of Vanguard, said the book industry needs to adapt.

"The idea to make the book more interactive, more entertaining, more informative as you read, I think, is a real breakthrough in terms of keeping people looking at the book as something not part of their past but part of their future," Cooper said.

He said the book business is not going to disappear, but it will evolve into new forms. He cited new digital readers such as the Amazon Kindle.

Don Leu, professor of literacy and technology at University of Connecticut, is also bullish on the technology. Leu, who has worked with Ford, thinks OnScene has the potential to enable more of what literary theorists call the "lived-through" experience, typically associated with the most gripping books.

He can see the technology helping younger readers, too.

"OnScene works of literature will be especially powerful, and sought after, by adolescents who increasingly live in online worlds and by students who may struggle a bit more with reading," Leu said in an e-mail.

Author Clyde Ford is one of the first authors to shift toward digital readers.

Actress Kristen Schaal of "Flight of the Conchords" attributes the show's success and authentic appeal to the casting of regular-looking people.

'Conchords' star speaks

Finally, Americans everywhere will get a chance to see what the Conchords saw when Schaal's recently taped Comedy Central half-hour special airs, possibly in early 2009.

In the meantime, at least there's her Web series "Penelope: Princess of Pets," about talking animals, nefarious politicians and the end of the world.

Schaal has put in serious time in some less-than-stellar workplaces, including a stint as a paralegal. "It's mostly making copies, you're just doing this," she says, mimicking mind-numbing page turning "as life passes you by." There was also her brush with Sedaris-level department-store drama.

"I worked at FAO Schwarz for a while as a character called Miss Peppermint Twist. ... I had to wear a pink wig and tights and glasses, and I started to drink on the job to get through it. Luckily, I was laid off after six months.

"There were dark days," she intones. "I got the stories. You know people who are like 'I got this job right out of college?' I hate those people."

Now Schaal's setting her sights beyond the world of comedy.

"Acting-wise, I'd love to do it all. If they would let me, but you know, they probably won't," she says. "In the dramas they always want a really beautiful woman crying, a really beautiful woman being victimized, with a tear falling down her high cheekbone. I think it might be too pathetic if a tear fell down my cheekbone. It might be too sad. You don't want it to be like, 'Just kill her.'

"That's one reason I got excited watching them cast the 'Conchords' show, because everyone they put in there was just like a regular-looking person. That makes the show look so much cooler than any other show on TV."

Film rendition of Young's 'How to Lose Friends' debuts Friday

ures and turned them to my own advantage through some peculiar sleight of hand."

In the film, Sidney Young (Pegg) is the editor of a smart-alecky, celeb-bashing magazine that makes sport of mocking media bigwigs like Clayton Harding (a flop-haired Bridges), editor in chief of the glossy Sharps magazine. Everything changes when Young gets hired by Harding to write the kind of fawning puff pieces about celebrities that he despises.

Undeterred, Young sets out to take Manhattan's media world by storm but winds up a casualty of his own drunk and disorderly impulses, mayhem involving a transvestite stripper, the accidental death of an ingenue's teacup chihuahua and a spectacular disruption of the Oscars ensues. Pegg's character agrees to collude with the celebrity industrial complex in exchange for a passport to the A-list's inner sanctum. But then the romantic interest of a good-hearted woman with a poet's soul (Dunst) snaps him back to reality – just as his house of cards comes tumbling down.

Which, of course, is the Hollywood version of how things played out.

Toby Young was put on contract as a contributing editor by Carter in 1995 after he lampooned the lionized editor in his real-lite literary magazine, the Modern Review.

The Oxford-educated son of an English baron, Young arrived in New York with the somewhat paradoxical intention of shaking up its media culture (mainly by needling Carter about how edgy he used to be as editor of the snark bible, Spy magazine) and infiltrating celebritydom. But the writer's various failures – his beef with literary "it" couple Harry Evans and Tina Brown, bull-in-a-china-shop culture clash with the Vanity Fair staff, even hitting rock bottom with booze – was hardly a spectacular flame-out. He was never even outrightly fired. Young's contract with the magazine ... simply expired.

After receiving 22 rejection letters, author Toby Young's "How to Lose Friends & Alienate People" is now published in 12 languages.

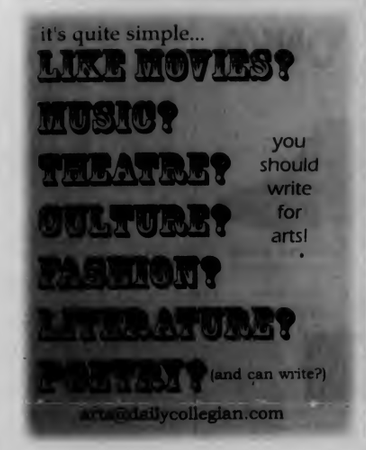
Nonetheless, he managed to parlay a handful of well-flicked Manhattan vanities – supermodel art stars, society girls and magazine publishers among ... into a career writing for ... since.

Years and humiliations later, he's still at it, trying to bring his story to life ... with a ... persistence ... to the oddest pos-... Young continued.

"It wasn't out of any conviction that I had a story worth telling," he said. "I thought I was on this upward career trajectory. And then it all went completely pear-shaped. I really did nothing for five years. Vanity Fair was like a career cul-de-sac. At the end of it, I thought, 'I have to have something to show for those years.' I was determined to extract something from nothing."

Novelist Bruno Maddox, a longtime friend, points out that Young turns almost everything that happens to him into fodder. But in contrast to the prevailing confessional culture in America of bruised inner children and "poor me," Young presents himself as the Dickensian hero of his own life in a way that's "uncontrived and un-self-absorbed," according to Maddox.

"I think he was smart enough to realize he had a story to tell," he said. "As for the light he presents himself in, that's very much his personality. If you can charm people by being naturally obnoxious, why go to the bother of learning how to be actually charming? Tobes is a guy who knows exactly who he is, almost to the point of detachment."



A point apparently not lost on Young himself.

"My ex-roommate from New York used to make this complaint that he used to have to live through these drunken episodes of mine, then he'd have to hear them turned into anecdotes with me regaling our friends," said Young. "Then he'd have to read about them in newspapers, then in my book. Now he's got to see the ... film! Frankly, he didn't think the story was that great when it was actually happening."

In the final analysis, aggravating Carter might be Young's greatest achievement, and trafficking that story is certainly the wellspring of his success. The Vanity Fair editor, meanwhile, chooses to view Young's unique brand of self-deprecating self-aggrandizement with a certain amount of philosophical resign.

"Those who can't teach, write," Carter said. "Those who can't write, write about themselves in Toby's case, endlessly."

After being home to the Bronx Bombers for the past 85 years, Yankee Stadium or the house that Ruth Built has closed it's doors with the opening of the Yankees new stadium.

Stadium memories

nation's capital is the biggest city in the nation, our financial center and a city of a pristine imperfection. Ellis Island had flaws yet successfully welcomed numerous immigrants into New York as the Statue of Liberty stood in the background as an affectionate symbol. As imperfect as that system was and as imperfect as that city still is, New York leads America in just about everything except politeness.

When it happens in New York, it seems bigger and somehow more important. The same is true today when it comes to New York baseball. The Yankees have always had the harshest criticism and have been under the brightest and harshest limelight of any of the Major League teams. You will never see players get booed on their home turf as ruthlessly as you will see at Yankee Stadium. There's just something different about that place.

Tani ended up sitting for an hour and a half looking around what is now the old Yankee Stadium. After the game he began to tear up, looking around and thinking about the different places he had sat and how he would never be in those seats again. As he was telling me this, he interrupted his story with, "I got some dirt."

"Huh," I asked. I didn't know if he meant actual dirt on somebody or dirt from the field, both could have been interesting.

"My security guard friend Louie guards the left field fair territory and he got me some field dirt on the last day. He had his honeymoon there you know," Tani said.

Apparently Louie got married at 20 and part of his honeymoon involved Yankee Stadium. Louie and his wife have been married for 27 years. I would have loved to know his thoughts on that last night as he watched the Yankees take one final lap around the field in appreciation of their fans

The history of Yankee Stadium has arguably done more to popularize baseball and thrill the fans than any other place. But now it has shut its doors for good. I may hope that the Yankees don't even win one game in their new house next year, but right now I can't help but appreciate what has been accomplished there for the sport of baseball.

History was made there and, and considering my Indians came no where close to making the playoffs, we will be sitting home with the Yankees thinking back on an imperfect year. But still many years from now, baseball fans will still remember the historic place as the House that Ruth Built.

Koch adds exhibition game

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team started the week of practice thinking it had until Tuesday night before its next game. But, UMass has added an exhibition game to its schedule.

The Minutemen will challenge the Winstars Soccer Academy from Woodbridge, Ontario, on Saturday afternoon. By adding a foreign team to the schedule a team is allowed to play an extra game.

The Minutemen added this game because UMass coach Sam Koch thought it was important for his team to play one more game before they travel south to play No. 1 Wake Forest on Tuesday night. If the match wasn't on the schedule, they would have gone nine days without a match, which isn't bad, but not something Koch wanted to do.

"This is just one way of helping us to be better prepared before we go down to Wake Forest," Koch said. "It also gives the opportunity for guys that haven't played that much to get game time."

The Minutemen try to play a mid-season exhibition game every year because it gives the reserves a chance to play when they wouldn't normally.

Winstars Soccer Academy "focuses on professionally-centered soccer development, preparing elite players for U.S.-Collegiate and worldwide pro-league competitions," according to its Web site. The team has eight players that have been recruited by top Division I programs.

"If we do our job, it will give us an opportunity to see where we are and to have improved on what we wanted to work on this week," Koch said. "The main thing is for us to take care of our business, and we've got a good opponent that if we don't they can punish us."

In practice the Minutemen continue to work on keeping possession of the ball – a combination of passing decisions and creating passing options, making better decisions when they get the ball and finishing on their shots.

"We've worked a lot on finishing in the last two days. That's obviously something we haven't been doing as well as we need to," Koch said.

UMass continues to also work on its defense. This week the focus was on individual defending, to limit stabbing for the ball. Koch worked with his team to be patient when they defend and not over committing, because when they over commit that is when the opponent gets past the back line.

"We're getting better [at defending individually] but continue to work on that, especially when conference games are coming up," Koch said.

The Minutemen have two big games coming up, Tuesday against Wake Forest (defending NCAA College Cup Champions) and Oct. 12 against Rhode Island (the Minutemen's first Atlantic 10 game). But for now, the Minutemen are focusing on the Winstars.

"First we have a game on Saturday, we can't worry about Wake Forest right now. We can't be thinking about Wake Forest. We have to play well on Saturday and then we can worry about Wake Forest," Koch said.

The Minutemen are expecting a good game on Saturday as one of the last opportunities to prepare for A-10 play.

Midfielder Chris Vaccaro is 1-of-6 Minutemen who have scored a goal this season. Prince Otoou leads the team with two goals while five other players are tied for second with one goal.

Alabama vaults into spotlight

By Ryan Wright
Crimson White (University of Alabama)

ATHENS, Ga. – Two things are certain: The black magic is gone from Georgia's motivational jerseys, and Alabama has vaulted into the national spotlight as a championship contender.

During a night game in Athens darkened by a Georgia blackout, the No. 8 Crimson Tide shocked the No. 3 Bulldogs early and rode out a big first-half lead to a comfortable 41-30 upset Saturday.

Alabama's thumping of Georgia joined a string of upsets this week that saw nine ranked teams fall, including three of the top four.

USC, Georgia and Florida all fell out of the top 10, and with 21 first-place votes, the Tide leap-frogged two Texas teams, LSU and an idle Missouri team to claim the No. 2 spot behind Oklahoma in the latest AP poll.

Alabama is third in the Harris poll behind LSU and fourth in the USA Today Coaches' poll behind Missouri. Only the coaches' and Harris polls will factor into the BCS rankings, which will not be released for the first time until Oct. 19.

Alabama stunned the Bulldogs early in Saturday's game, hanging 31 points on the men in black before intermission by scoring four touchdowns and a field goal on its only five possessions.

As well as Alabama played in the first two frames, Matt Stafford and Georgia's offense played equally bad. The Bulldog's five first-half drives ended with three punts and two turnovers.

Alabama's first-half domination was undeniable. The Tide racked up 17 first downs compared to Georgia's four and controlled the time of possession, holding the ball for 11:19 of the first quarter.

Georgia coach Nick Saban believed his team wasn't nearly as bad as the score indicated.

"We probably played the best half of football we have played all season. It couldn't have come at a better time," Saban said. "I was really pleased with the way we played."

The second half didn't quite follow suit, but the first-half buffer proved sufficient.

Alabama's offense left the locker room and hit the field flat, punting away all of its third quarter drives on three consecutive three-and-outs, opening the window ever so slightly for a Bulldogs comeback.

Georgia capitalized with 17 unanswered points to shrink the lead to 31-17. A rejuvenated Tide offense then pumped out 10 points in the fourth quarter to push the lead to 41-17 and thwart any hopes of a rally.

Saban said the keys to the victory revolved around both team's running games. Alabama has leaned on its ground game through its first four victories, and Saban said it was critical to establish it early against Georgia's gritty front line.

Tailbacks Mark Ingram, Glen Coffee and Roy Upchurch each reached the end zone and combined for 121 yards on the ground.

On the other side, slowing Knowshon Moreno with just seven players in the box gave Alabama the extra defensive back it needed to keep Stafford and his talented receivers in check.

Stafford finished 24-of-42 for 274 yards, two touchdowns and a pick. Both touchdown throws occurred in the final three minutes of the game when it was no longer in question.

"I think we made a good statement tonight," senior safety Rashad Johnson said. "We have a good team, and as long as we're playing our game, we're going to be hard to beat ... I think we are a great team ... but only if we're playing our game."

Analysts pinned the Tide's hopes to win the game on the arm and mind of quarterback John Parker Wilson, who has led an inconsistent passing game that has shown flashes of greatness through four games. He responded with one of the best performances of his career.

Wilson began the game 7-of-7, with his first incompletion coming midway through the second quarter. Only two more of his passes would fall to the turf the rest of the game. He finished 13-of-16 for 205 yards and one touchdown.

"J.P.'s a totally different player now," said Antoine Caldwell. "The guy's confident. He's calm. He's our leader, and that's what he displayed tonight. The guy understands the offense."

Wilson's 205-yard aerial performance earned him yet another top spot in the Alabama record books. With a 29-yard strike to Roy Upchurch, the senior eclipsed Brodie Croyle's old mark of 6,382 career passing yards. Wilson now has 6,398 yards, less than half way through his final season.

Minutemen host No. 16 Delaware

The two receivers combined have brought in 34 passes for 394 yards and two touchdowns.

Despite the selflessness on offense the real story of the Blue Hen's is their defense.

Last week the Delaware defense held Albany to 22 yards in the second half and 150 total.

On defense the Blue Hens have both speed and size. Last week the defense got to Albany's mobile quarterback Vinny Esposito, sacking him three times and forcing him to throw an interception.

A big force on Delaware's defense is senior linebacker Erik Johnson. Johnson has led the Blue Hens in tackles the last two games. He's a great run-stopper and has potential to make things difficult for Coen in the passing game.

Johnson may have an easier time getting to Coen if UMass' other captain on offense, All-CAA offensive linemen Sean Calicchio, does not play. The Minutemen's center left early in the first quarter three weeks ago against James Madison with a high ankle sprain. Calicchio missed UMass' last game against Texas Tech, but did practice this past Sunday and is now listed as day-to-day.

UMass continues to struggle in the first quarter on both sides of the ball. So far this season the Minutemen have failed to score an offensive touchdown in the first quarter. That tends to put more pressure on the defense – in stopping the opposing team from jumping out to a lead.

If the Minutemen enter Saturday's game playing like a team right from the kickoff then UMass can call the plays it wants, not being forced to alter its game plan. If not, then looks like they'll be playing catch-up.

Linebacker George Byrd ranks third on the Minutemen with 29 tackles, 18 of which were solo, and has also forced two fumbles. The senior has also recorded three tackles for losses, the most of any Minutemen.

The Minuteman offense is looking to come out in the first quarter strong against a Delaware team that has only allowed one touchdown in the opening quarter all year. Through four games this season the Minutemen offense has not produced a scoring drive in the first quarter.

Early offense key for UMass

FIRST QUARTER from page 14

With the Minutemen rushing their offense, they have depended on deep balls and big plays to move down the field in large chunks. While the offense has been successful at this, they are also moving down the field at a very rapid pace. Through the first three weeks of play, the Minutemen's average scoring play are up just over three minutes of time.

While scoring quickly may be needed when facing a deficit, it takes its toll on the defense when they do not get to rest in between drives. UMass knows this is something they must avoid.

"Hopefully we can settle down a little bit more in the first quarter of this game and not play from behind," Coen said.

While the Minutemen are still scoring on offense, they are not playing the game they want to play. With talent all over the offense's depth chart, UMass does not need to leave the offense up to the arm of Coen and they don't want to.

Running back Tony Nelson has proven to be a force when he is handed the ball. The redshirt junior is averaging over 100 yards per game on the ground and has scored five touchdowns on the season, but many wouldn't know it. The Minutemen have come out of half times in the last three games down, and have been forced to rely on Coen for the quick score.

If the Minutemen can win the first quarter of Saturday's game offensively and defensively, they will be able to control the tempo of the game unlike they have all season. The offense will run smoother by being able to mix in runs and play a more balanced attack, while also eating up more time and giving the defense some needed rest.

Krzyzewski names 3 captains for season

Paulus, Henderson, Scheyer in charge for Blue Devils

By Meredith Shiner
The Chronicle (Duke University)

DURHAM, N.C. – It's a Monday for Duke Basketball.

Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski and his coaching staff are talking to a five-star recruit in Cameron Indoor Stadium, just steps away from the playing floor where the Blue Devils are beginning their first official practice of the season. Without coaches, it's clear who's running the show.

Senior Greg Paulus stands over the Duke logo at center court, his voice booming to fill the empty arena and his teammates scattering on cue to start their drills.

They begin a three-man weave, like you've seen in any other high school gym, except it's Cameron and most of the players are former McDonald's All-Americans. The seasoned point guard seems just as comfortable yelling orders in his first shift, flanked by veterans Dave McClure and Jon Scheyer, as he does in the next, guiding freshmen Olek Czyz and Miles Plumlee.

Paulus is one of Krzyzewski's three recently named captains, along with juniors Gerald Henderson and Scheyer. The tri-captain model is making a comeback only a season after Krzyzewski emphatically turned away from it by naming DeMarcus Nelson the lone captain, even though Paulus had shared the honor as a sophomore the previous year.

On its face, the sudden switch seems at worst a knock on Paulus and his leadership ability and at best contradictory, especially given how often last season Krzyzewski talked about the previous "dilution" of the captaincy and the importance of having only one captain. But the coach insists now that the decision was purely circumstantial and not a reflection on Paulus, who led Duke in assists and 3-point field goals last season and was the leading scorer in both games against UNC.

"We have more guys capable of leading. It's as simple as that," Krzyzewski said before practice Monday. "Some of the years we've done multiple captains ... not all those guys were ready to lead.

"It's kind of like on our Olympic team. We didn't name captains, but if we did, they would have been Jason [Kidd], Kobe [Bryant] and LeBron [James], and they all brought something different. They had different styles of leadership and different levels of experience, and that's what we're trying to do with these guys."

So, Paulus isn't Kidd, Henderson isn't Kobe and Scheyer isn't LeBron, but the three new Blue Devils captains are walking into an analogy that runs deeper than what Coach K initially intended to imply.

Krzyzewski said he chose Scheyer because he could be a forceful leader, Henderson because of his talent and nerves of steel and Paulus because of his enthusiasm and desire to make everyone around him better.

But the real similarity between the two situations lies not only in the players' attributes, but also in the task at hand.

Although the "Redeem Team" storyline was overblown this summer, it was clear Team USA had something to prove. Under the weight of expectations and an intense national spotlight, Krzyzewski needed a gold medal to vindicate the system he developed and later sold to a roster of the NBA's finest and an attentive nation of fans.

As with the United States falling short of gold in the 2004 Olympics, Duke is coming off two seasons in which it failed to advance past the first weekend of the NCAA tournament. Granted, Krzyzewski is quick to point out the Blue Devils have won 50 games over the past two seasons – which is, admittedly, a lot of wins.

Senior Greg Paulus started all but one of 34 games for the Dukes last season and averaged 11.4 points and 3.2 assists per game.

Tailback Tony Nelson has been effective when handed the ball so far this season. The redshirt junior is averaging 100.8 yards per game through four contests, 5.4 yards per carry and has scored five touchdowns for the Minutemen's offense.

UM returns to McGuirk

Minutemen hope to get back on track against Blue Hens

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team has been in shambles as of late. It has played poor football on the field, which in result has lead to its steady decline in the polls.

This Saturday the Minutemen take on Delaware at McGuirk Stadium, their first home game after three on the road.

"We're very successful at home," UMass coach Don Brown said. "Home-field advantage is especially important in our league, and it's important to the Minutemen."

Brown isn't the only one that is thrilled about finally playing a game at home.

"It's huge to be back home, especially against an opponent like Delaware," UMass quarterback Liam Coen said. "It's just the mentality of being home – no travel and no sleeping in hotels, it's just a good way to start off after a bye week."

Last week the Blue Hens scored 24 points in the second half to cruise past Albany 38-7.

No. 16 Delaware currently has a 2-2 record. The Blue Hens opened their season losing to a tough FBS opponent in Maryland then defeated West Chester and lost to then-No. 24 Furman in the third game of the season.

Delaware, much like former opponents of the Minutemen tend to rely on the running game to get them downfield. The Blue Hens have six players that have ran the ball at least 10 times or more throughout the season.

Delaware's leading rusher Johnathon Smith has totaled 311 yards rushing and scored eight touchdowns. Though the Blue Hens hand the ball off to more than just Smith, only one other running back has ended up in the end zone.

Jerry Butler, Deleware's second back has scored two touchdowns on the season on 20 carries for 178 yards.

Much like the Blue Hens' running game, Delaware quarterback Robby Schoenhoft spreads the ball to all of his receivers. On the season Schoenhoft has thrown for 734 yards, four touchdowns and seven interceptions.

Schoenhoft's main threats are Aaron Love and Kervin Michaud.

'House that Ruth Built'

Michael Phillis

Last Sunday I ate Yankee Stadium, home of pin stripes, big players and obnoxious fans, closed its doors after an undeniably successful 85-year run.

I am not a Yankees fan. My dad grew up right outside of Cleveland, I bleed, and maybe not an all out Cleveland one.

Last year, when the Indians faced the Boston Red Sox in the American League Championship Series, I decided to wear my Indians hat to a UMass hockey game and was booed by the entire Mullins Center crowd. I understand and am no traitor in baseball. My rooting, hard-and-fast, with Red Sox fans could always be put into perspective however, because they weren't the Yankees. Everyone could come together to hate the team we all considered downright evil.

All this hatred over the years has helped to build my passion for the sport of baseball, but the closing of Yankee Stadium, this past month, could not be imagined.

I used to like walking around Monument Park alone, there was something magical about that place before games, Tani Cohen said.

Tani was an old high school friend of mine who now attends Columbia University. He sells hot dogs at Yankee Stadium and is a die-hard Yankees fan and baseball addict. I talked to him about that last night in the historic ballpark and a whirlwind of memories just kept pouring out.

Think of the names that have forged their careers in that stadium. My October Reggie Jackson, Babe Ruth, Joe DiMaggio and Yogi Berra just to name a few of the greats. It's hard to even begin talking about the volumes of history that have come from that stadium in its long run as home of the Yankees.

However, history has happened in so many stadiums, Wrigley Field and Fenway Park, to name a few, have been around longer and similarly great moments and great players have shown their extraordinary talent between the long white lines, yet there is something different about Yankee Stadium.

Yankee Stadium, being in New York, always went bigger and the so-called 'House that Ruth Built' just seems so American.

"Every stadium has its moment but [Yankee Stadium] is in New York, it's a story book that's always supposed to come out right," Tani continued.

His quote gets to what makes that place so special. The American game of baseball, created a "cathedral" for baseball in America's city.

New York symbolizes America as a whole so well. The one time

1st quarter key to victory for UMass

Offense, defense struggling in opening period this season

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

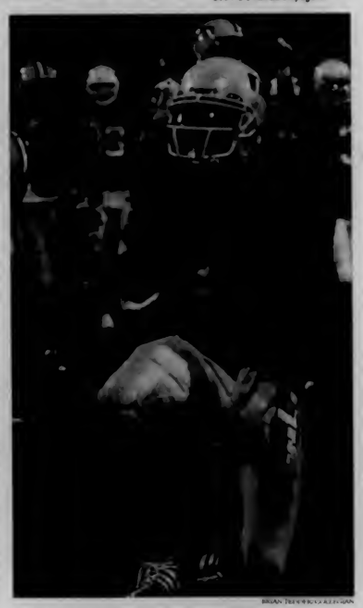
The offense of the Massachusetts football team may find itself playing catch up for the fifth straight game when No. 16 Delaware come to Amherst this Saturday.

Coming off their bye week, the No. 18 Minutemen will once again face a strong opponent that may, unless the defense can come out and look like the defense they are expected to be, put UMass in a hole it has to climb out of.

For starters, the Blue Hens (2-2) are averaging 200.8 yards rushing per game this season. The only stat more outlandish is the Minutemen (2-2, 0-1 Colonial Athletic Conference) are giving up 206 yards per game on the ground.

Secondly, Delaware has only given up seven points in the first quarter all season while the Minutemen have not scored offensively in the opening period this season (they scored a defensive touchdown in the first quarter against Texas Tech). But UMass coach Don Brown knows the struggle is not all on the offense.

"It's not just the offense, it's as a football team. That's really what we're looking at and we're trying to improve it and we've addressed it," Brown said. "Sometimes that's just the way it goes. And sometimes you have to just bust out to get the thing rolling."



Using the bye week to their advantage the Minutemen hoped to alleviate their first-quarter pains. But with the Blue Hens defense being as stingy as it has been in the opening period, it may not be easy to come out of the gate like senior Liam Coen hopes his offense will.

"[We just need to] execute coach's plays to perfection more in the first quarter, that's what really sets the tone for the rest of the game," Coen said. "If we can come out and execute those play calls a lot better, we'll be better off in the first quarter."

With both sides of the ball struggling in the first quarter, the effects snowball and linger the rest of the game. The Minutemen are skilled at both running and passing the ball but often do not get to utilize both because they are playing catch up.

"When your down by three or plus scores it's a tough situation to be in," Coen said. "You don't have many great play calls for that, you have to be able to throw the ball and you kind of rush the offense."

See FIRST QUARTER on page 11

Redshirt junior Jeremy Horne has been one of Liam Coen's favorite targets this season in the end zone with three touchdown receptions.

Forward Will Ortiz had a strong first half to the 2007-08 season, scoring six goals in the first 12 games. But the junior only managed one other goal in his next 20 games.

Minutemen open practices with exhibition matchup

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team begins its 132-day calendar season on Saturday with an exhibition game against New Brunswick.

Saturday is a big day for the Minutemen because it's also the first day of formal practice. So far this season they have only been doing on-ice conditioning and training, without being taught systems and technical strategies.

New Brunswick is a team made up of many athletes that have been part of a pro-hockey circuit, but they were filtered out because they weren't having success in the minor or junior hockey leagues. They are deemed ineligible by the NCAA, but they can still attend and play at Canadian colleges – usually at an older age, ranging from 21-25.

"[New Brunswick will] be a very mature team and this program historically has been one of the better programs in Canada," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "They'll come in here further ahead in their development than we are."

The Varsity Reds typically begin practicing at the end of August or beginning of September and have already played eight games this season, winning five of them. The Minutemen are much further behind – taking on the team their first day of practice.

"I'll have to look by a lot of systemic type mistakes. I'm sure the effort will be real good and it will be a good challenge to get going and be able to identify your areas of strength and your areas of weakness," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen shouldn't have much trouble playing together on Saturday because they are returning seven of their top 10 scorers, six defensemen and all three goalies from last year.

"I have confidence in our guys," Cahoon said. "Things are going to fall in place systemically a lot quicker than they would if it were a younger team."

But the younger players will still need to learn the system. The Minutemen's co-captains (senior Cory Quirk and junior Brett Watson) and senior class provide the underclassmen with needed leadership. When the younger players see UMass' systems executed correctly they will heighten their awareness and make catching onto the system quicker.

This exhibition game will allow the team to realize what they need to work on to start to prepare for the weekend of Oct. 12 when they take on Michigan State and North Dakota in the Ice Breaker Tournament in Boston.

Nader to address UM voters

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Consumer advocate and four-time presidential candidate Ralph Nader will speak in Bowker Auditorium at Stockbridge Hall on Sunday, Oct. 5 at 11 a.m.

Nader, who ran for president on the Green Party ticket in 1996 and 2000 and as an independent in 2004 and 2008, will be visiting the UMass campus in his national campaign with running mate Matt Gonzalez.

Nader said in an interview that his speech will focus on the recent Wall Street bailout plan, single-payer health care and the presidential campaign, among other things.

"Everybody's interested in the bailout, so we'll be talking about that, what students coming out of college are facing," he said.

"It's the wrong kind of bailout," Nader said. "But more important is that there were no congressional hearings other than questioning [Ben] Bernanke and [Treasury Secretary Henry] Paulson."

"In congressional history they would meet for days," he said.

Nader will also speak about the presidential debates, to which neither Democratic candidate Barack Obama or Republican candidate John McCain will invite him, he said, without a grassroots effort to get him to the podium.

"Any one of the major candidates could get us on," he said. He went on to say "Obama would look good if he had us on and said 'Hey, let's see what

Girl hurt in crash

University of Massachusetts police officers investigate the scene of the crash shortly after receiving a call that University graduate student Li Cai was struck by a car on Massachusetts Ave.

A University of Massachusetts graduate student was severely injured as she was crossing the street in the early evening last night.

According to University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski, Li Cai, 25 years old and a student living on campus, was struck by a four-door Toyota Camry while crossing Massachusetts Ave.

The accident occurred at 5:50 p.m., across from the Isenberg School of Management.

Cai was thrown approximately 20 ft by the collision and witnesses said she rolled over the car on impact.

Blaguszewski said there was significant damage to the car.

The accident is under investigation by the UMPD, and little information is available. However, the accident occurred close to sunset. At this time, the sun shines directly through the windshields of drivers travelling west on Massachusetts Ave., typically slowing traffic significantly as a driver's visibility is limited.

Massachusetts Ave. was shut down briefly following the accident, and the scene was surrounded by yellow tape and evidence markers.

Cai was escorted to Bay State Medical Center in Springfield, Mass., by the Amherst Fire Department. No information is currently available on her condition.

Vote weighs large

BY MARK GRUNSTEIN-CAMACHO AND CHRISTINA METZ COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENTS

Will the youth of America make a difference in 2008? Among young voters, it's believed that Obama currently stands 27 points above McCain at 60-33 percent. In 2004, new records were broken as 18-29 year olds voted en masse. As of now, it looks like 2008 will continue this trend.

The last call for voter registration rapidly approaches on Oct. 7, with Election Day just around the corner.

Senior Danielle Amisano is one University of Massachusetts student planning to vote in the upcoming election.

"Everyone I know is registered – me as of yesterday," she said. "I feel like I should [register] as an American. There are a lot of places where you can't vote, especially women."

Amisano feels more young people might vote if there was "a more comprehensive way to learn about the candidates instead of watching the debates." Although she hasn't decided which candidate will get her vote, the Long Island, N.Y. native knows which issues are important to her.

"I'm going to sound like an old lady, but health care, because I see how much my parents spend on prescriptions," she said. Amisano will vote in her home district via absentee ballot.

Marissa Speranza and Megan Strathearn, both juniors, are planning on voting but didn't know where to vote. Josh Yi is not voting because he didn't know where to register to vote. Sam Noury is not only voting, but going with a bunch of his friends.

When asked what issues were important to them, Speranza and Strathearn highlighted education and health care.

"I want to be a teacher, so getting money into the education system is important to me," Strathearn said. Likewise, health care will also be important in the future for Speranza. She plans to be a doctor.

People who are voting have their own reasons. Strathearn, who is undecided, said, "History is

Senators set to start work

BY MICHAEL FOX

The Student Government Association senate convened for its first meeting Wednesday night, marking the end of a hotly-contested election for this year's senate seats.

One of the closest elections took place for the three seats in Orchard Hill. The several candidates vying for the positions put on strong campaigns, operating under the belief that there were only going to be two seats. A last minute recalculation by election commissioner Matt Sloan added a third.

Two of the winners, Yevin Roh and Ben Thompson, both received 104 votes.

"I came into the election predicting an intense competition, said Roh, "Being a freshman, I set out to put myself out there to my constituents. I opened up to the people, whom I wish to represent, and it's an honor to serve and protect them. I am happy that I earned their respect."

Thompson echoed Roh's beliefs on the level of competition.

"I worked with a high intensity, operating under the assumption that there were going to only be two seats. However, I was glad that the third seat was put in for the students of Orchard Hill."

SGA President Malcolm Chu opened the senate meeting, touching on his hopes that the SGA will be able to help students become more respected and appreciated on campus. He also spoke of the recent advocacy nature of the SGA Senate and his wishes to see it continue.

Speaker Shaun Robinson echoed Chu's remarks in his opening address to the senate, also touching on the need of the senators to be able to put aside their backgrounds and other affiliations in order to efficiently and productively represent the students.

The meeting closed with a thorough lesson on The Wellman Document – the state legislation responsible for governing the University of Massachusetts – by the director of the Student Legal Services Office, Charles DiMare.

He advised the student senate to rely on the powers given to them by the document to create change and establish authority on campus, stating that it's part of the responsibility of the SGA to set standards for conduct, behavior and discipline on campus.

somebody else has to say.'"

Nader said that his campaign is in full-swing this election season, already on 45 of the 51 ballots. He said that in 2004, Democrats sued his campaign "24 times in 18 states in 12 days" to keep him off the ballot, and his support in Amherst suffered a "precipitous decline" in 2004 as a result of being a write-in candidate.

Nader began his career as a consumer advocate in 1965 with his book "Unsafe at Any Speed," which uncovered safety defects in American automobiles and was critical of the industry's safety standards.

He became an outspoken and high-profile advocate for consumer and citizen rights, starting the first Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) in the early 1970s. Since then, PIRGs have been founded across the nation, including MassPIRG, a Massachusetts-based public interest group active on the UMass campus.

Nader said that he's probably the only presidential candidate likely to visit Amherst.

"Obama's got it in the bag, and McCain's writing it off."

Nader's speech will be part of his national presidential campaign, and is open to the public with a suggested donation of $10, $5 for students. For more information, visit Votenader.org/events.

Bennett at Amherst

Post head remarks on '08 election race

BY TINA LAGERSTEDT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The managing editor of The Washington Post, Philip Bennett, spoke on Wednesday at Amherst College about the upcoming election and the new role the media is playing. The event, which had a good turnout and attracted a diverse crowd, was sponsored by the Victor S. Johnson Lectureship Fund.

At the opening of his talk, Bennett emphasized the significance of the upcoming election.

"This is the most interesting election of our lifetimes," said Bennett. He stated that not only were the candidates important, but the "staggering" events that have occurred during their campaigns have had an impact as well. He added that it was one of the most closely watched elections, and further demonstrated the point by taking a poll.

He asked individuals in the room to raise their hand if they're follow the election closely, if they plan on voting, and if they are actively involved in the campaign. For each question, there was an almost unanimous rising of hands.

One of Bennett's main points involved the importance of narratives in the upcoming election. He noted both candidates were examples of how "lives of consequence come from humble beginnings" and that both candidates have come from unlikely places to win the nominations. Bennett pointed out the utilization of the life stories of Senators Barack Obama and John McCain as key elements in their campaigns.

Contrasting the two candidates and their different strategies, Bennett talked about Obama's unchanging style and McCain's spontaneity.

He used the example of McCain's selection of Governor Sarah Palin as his running mate and the suspension of his campaign as two surprises McCain used recently to "shake things up." He added that throughout both of these surprises, Obama stayed constant in his campaigning efforts.

Adding to the role of narratives and different strategies in the election, Bennett pointed out the large role of a new medium of communication and information: the Internet. He compared the Internet's "instantaneous journalism" with the role of television in the debates during the 1960s elections. He cited examples of Google.com and YouTube.com and their enormous impact on the campaign.

"Sarah Palin was the most searched politician in the last four years," explained Bennett. Bennett also contrasted the role of the "dying breed" of media, which he is a proud member of, with the role of Internet media such as blogs and networking sites. He noted that anyone can have a story and be right, even if it's just for a moment.

While talking about examples of the Internet's influence, he cited the Democratic National Convention and the thousands of journalists constantly blogging and updating on their computers.

"There were no major stories," Bennett said. "But at the end of the convention, everyone had a story."

Near the end of his speech, Bennett questioned whether or not there was a way to deal with this new kind of media. He spoke about his hopes for a new and innovative way to apply American journalism to the Internet. He explained that American trust was the most important thing, and the media lost credibility in this election.

There must be a "new model that links this mission to networking," said Bennett. He added that this was a time for experimentation and exploration, and this election is shaping up to be a huge turning point in American history.

Bennett ended his talk with the conclusion that although the media has had a huge role in this election, in the end it will not be about them. "Ultimately, on November 4th, the story will be told by the voters," concluded Bennett.

Before becoming an editor at The Washington Post, Bennett worked for The Lima Time, a newspaper based in Peru, and was later the Latin American correspondent for The Boston Globe. He joined The Washington Post in 1997 and was a national editor for coverage of national security, defense and foreign policy. He was promoted to managing editor in 2004.

going to change with this election."

"I've got a right to voice my opinions," said Noury, a native of Egypt.

Charlie Felder of Providence, R.I., is voting because he sees it as a civic duty.

"You have a right to say something about your government as an American," he said. "I want to know I've earned my right and affected policy."

Katie Bonner, a 20-year-old junior from Bolton, Mass., plans on voting in this election, now that she is old enough. She's registered in Amherst, while some of her friends are planning to get absentee ballots and vote in their hometowns.

"Some students don't know a lot about politics, they don't really care," said Bonner. But she does. The issues that most concern her are the abortion rights of women, gay marriage and the cessation of drilling in Alaska.

She is voting for Barack Obama because she feels that our country needs a change from George W. Bush, but agrees with President Bush's morals and has always preferred him to his Republican counterpart.

Andrew Flin, of Longmeadow, Mass., and Neff Walker, of Longview, Texas, are also voting for Obama.

When asked why he chose this candidate, Walker answered simply, "Because Hillary isn't running."

"My primary reason," Flin said, "is that I just don't trust McCain and Palin. They give me an uneasy feeling."

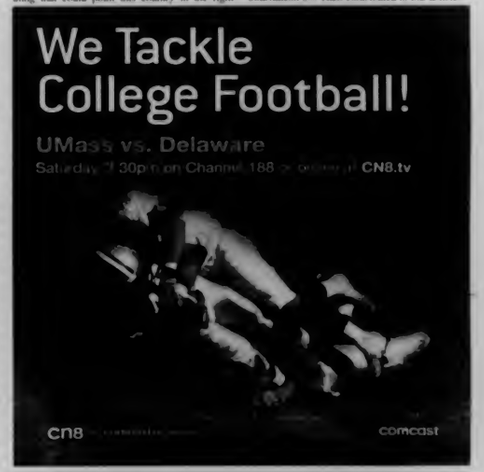
Travis Polito, a resident assistant in Melville Hall, is another Obama voter.

"His poise and his leadership are both something that could point this country in the right direction to overcome the obstacles that have been left for us by the Republican Party."

Polito has conducted a program for his residents to register to vote and distributed absentee ballots for them to fill out – giving them few excuses to refrain from participating in the voting process and to help them commit to change.

"I choose to vote because if I didn't, I could never complain about who became president because I didn't do anything to stop it," said Andie Browne, a junior from Braintree, Mass., who will be voting for the first time.

Browne is leaning towards Obama, as are the majority of her friends.



"Most of my friends are voting for Obama because they grew up in Massachusetts and grew up with liberal values," Browne said. "They are working class citizens, and they tend to agree more with the Democratic side."

A problem Browne believes would increase the amount of voters if solved is the difficulty of obtaining absentee ballots. Since many college students live on campus and away from their hometowns, it's difficult to go home and vote if they are registered at home.

Registering to vote can be done either through the mail or in person, but either way, one must be registered 20 days before all primaries and elections. If done by mail, one must fill out a National Voter Registration form and then mail it to his or her local city or town hall.

This form can be obtained by calling one's state voter hotline number or visit the Web site Eac.gov to download it. To register in person, one must go to any registration location and complete an affidavit of registration which requires a name, residence and date of birth.

Urban Outfitters sets up shop

Worldwide retail chain store arrival receives mixed reviews by residents

By Bethan Allam
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON, Mass. – It may come as a surprise that the off-beat, down-to-earth, eclectic town of Northampton, Mass., is opening an Urban Outfitters, a store many find unnecessary and obtrusive while others are excited for the grand opening.

The Pennsylvania-based clothing store, founded in 1970, has over 140 shops worldwide, including locations in Ireland and Sweden. Now Urban Outfitters is setting up shop on Main Street in Northampton, a prime business location.

Urban Outfitters Inc. owns 5 separate clothing brands including Urban Outfitters, Free People, Anthropologie, Terrain and Leifsdottir. Such a large brand name clothing store does not yet exist in Northampton.

However, some of the locals are not so keen on having an Urban Outfitters move into town; more specifically, the historic location. Centered between the building of the Hampshire Council of Governments, where local disputes are taken to be resolved, and First Churches of Northampton, Urban Outfitters seems rather out of place.

Taking over the former Northampton Institute for Savings building, their hip, urban style may clash with the city's culture.

All three buildings are rather historic. The Council of Governments is over 100 years old, while the church is the first one in Northampton dating back to the 18th century. However, this is not the only reason locals and regular visitors are upset.

"It's pretty disgusting cramming everything together," said Hampshire College freshman Ben Tavares.

A clothing store so close to a house of worship is unnerving to many, even though the center of Northampton is packed as it is. Not only will the historic properties of that area be compromised for fashion, it will come with a high price.

"I think it's great. Everybody needs more overpriced clothing," Tavares said sarcastically.

Perhaps for those who do not have a connection to the town, an Urban Outfitters is just another place to shop, another modernization that needs to happen. To some, it's just some store, in some building. For others, it's near criminal.

Dana Montuori, a young woman who works in Northampton, cited her disbelief when hearing where Urban Outfitters plans to open. She said it's going to be out of place, and that Northampton is not somewhere an Urban Outfitters should be.

The style of Urban Outfitters is in the name, suggesting designs for the city. However, for some, a town like Northampton is somewhere people go to get away from the city life, not needing what Urban Outfitters has to offer. It seems many residing in the town thought the same, attempting to put the building to better use.

A few months back, there were some other ideas of what could possibly occupy the old Institute for Savings building. A prominent idea was to have local artists set up shop to work and showcase their art. Available Potential Enterprises Ltd. received a grant nearing $20,000 to look into a community art studio for the building. Gordon G. Thorne of A.P.E. moved his gallery from Thornes Marketplace in search of another area. The then-unoccupied space was a worthy choice, but before anything could be done, Urban Outfitters moved in.

The attempt at keeping the Northampton art scene alive was dashed by the clothing and furniture store. The art community in town must now find another way to bring artists together and give presence to the work.

As for Urban Outfitters, the first step of moving has taken place. Its sign was recently propped above the doorway, nearly hidden from the street. However, winning customers may be difficult for the store.

different surroundings come with different demographics. The switch from city to college town could take a toll on the overall success of the store, especially paired with the feelings many locals have.

When hearing the words "college student," one immediately thinks of a young adult ready to face the world, yet without a cent in their pocket. With five colleges in the neighboring areas, Urban Outfitters may see that not everyone has enough to splurge on their pricey goods.

"I'm really not down with the Urban Outfitters," comments Hampshire sophomore, Andy Locke.

To him, the store is not only taking over a historical and much-needed property for the town's benefit, but also is "specifically overpriced."

Many may joke that they're short on cash, and Urban Outfitters' prices do not accommodate this complaint. Their clothes range from $75 sun dresses to $200 shoes.

It's even possible for competition to arise with the well-known and well-loved Faces, a fashion and interior design store similar to Urban Outfitters on a smaller, more local scale. With an eclectic collection of little knick-knacks, books, shirts, and more, Faces already appears to be the Northampton equivalent of Urban Outfitters. A must-see when arriving in or around the town, Faces carries a soul unto itself. Even though not inexpensive, devoted fans of the store, as well as newcomers alike, may find it hard to step into a pricier version of what's already there.

"[We] think [Urban Outfitters] is going to be good for the town," remarked Devon McArdrle, store manager of Faces. "Anything that's good for the town is good for us."

See URBAN OUFITTERS on page 5

In Pasadena, CA, an Urban Outfitters store blends into the city surroundings by inhabiting an older space. Urban Outfitters sells a lot of merchandise similiar to what is found in Northampton stores like Faces and boutiques in Thornes Market Place.

alongside historic buildings

There is still a lot of work to be done on the old Institute for Savings Building in Northampton before the planned mid-December opening at 109 Main St. Urban Outfitters Inc. owns over 140 retail stores worldwide in the U.S., U.K., Canada, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark and Ireland.

Perhaps McArdrle is right. Urban Outfitters could bring more business and commerce to the town of Northampton, and to Faces.

However, it's the customer that'll bring this potential commerce to town. If the customer does not bite at the opportunity of supporting a new store, there won't be enough healthy commerce. There are already coffee shops, restaurants, concert halls, and art galleries, all with a special quality that are unique to one another and to Northampton. There's a connection between these shops and the people, and between what is sold and who will buy it.

The question is whether or not there'll be a connection between the people and Urban Outfitters, or between what's there and who will find it interesting. One's pride, or perhaps the product's price, may get in the way of that. Estimated to open in mid-December, only time will tell whether Urban Outfitters is cut out for a city like Northampton.

Presidents and marijuana

Nicholas O'Malley

In this year's election, the national media is ablaze with the prospects of a black president or female vice president. This election will make history. On college campuses, however, a majority of interest is vested in the infamous question two.

When it comes down to it, the history-making aspects of the 2008 election include only two things — the end of George W. Bush's time in office and the prospect of decriminalizing marijuana.

At the University of Massachusetts, it's quite easy to see students raising awareness for the latter. With tables stationed at dining commons across campus, there has already been far more awareness raised for one question than the entire SGA election.

It's great to see students promoting the right to vote. We all know there isn't enough of it. However, the promotion of question two is all we've seen. Where's the promotion to elect the president?

The Cannabis Reform Coalition and other eager students have been tenacious in asking students, "Are you guys registered to vote?" and suggesting, "Vote yes on question two."

Student organizations are all well and good, however, where are the students asking "are you guys registered to vote?" and suggesting, "vote for the man who's going to lead our country."

According to the Web site of William Francis Galvin, secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, "A yes vote would replace the criminal penalties for possession of one ounce or less of marijuana with a new system of civil penalties. A no vote would make no change in state criminal laws concerning possession of marijuana."

In addition, the possession of marijuana would be reclassified as a civil offense. The new legislation would deem possession as carrying an ounce or less of marijuana.

For offenders over the age of 18, the penalty will be the confiscation of your stash and a $100 fine. For offenders under 18, it's the same penalty, but with the addition of a drug awareness program.

It's nothing new to say that not enough people vote in this country. Roughly 112 million out of about 305 million United States citizens voted in the 2004 election. That's 36.7 percent of America for those of you that enjoy statistics.

> While students are in school, they're essentially isolated from most issues of concern in elections.

You would think diehard supporters of either party would be making greater efforts to get votes for their candidate with the election just around the corner. But when you think about it, if makes sense not to bother because college students generally don't care about a whole lot of things.

Things students care about include: where they're getting alcohol, marijuana, Facebook.com, napping, which classes they're going to skip, stealing food from the dining common, and seeing how long they can go without showering or doing laundry.

Things students don't care about include: calling mom, paying for things, writing that paper due tomorrow, the economy, presidential elections, haircuts, police and not rioting.

College students don't care who runs the country so long as they can light up. That isn't to say students care too much about smoking, it's saying it doesn't really matter to students who they vote for.

Let's face it, Massachusetts is a blue state. If the Bay State was a cartoon character, it would be Papa Smurf. The Electoral College isn't a system that motivates people to vote, especially since the popular vote doesn't mean anything. Ask Al Gore.

In addition to the sometimes apparent futility of voting, there's the fact that candidates rarely cater to college students. Sure, education will come up in presidential debates, but the candidates are focused on our parents when discussing this country's school system.

While students are in school, they're essentially isolated from most issues of concern in elections. If a student's parents are paying for college, there really isn't much to worry about. We have steady meal plans, utilities, housing, transportation and an unquestionably liberal campus.

Because of the primarily democratic population of the campus, there's little point in promoting either candidate. Massachusetts is a state that grooms the Democratic Party as the norm, with Republicans a vocal, but small, minority. So by the time students get to the legal voting age, they're pretty liberal.

UMass residents are rarely concerned with most issues in the election. In fact, the only aspect of the election that affects college students is the war in Iraq. Of course, as students, nobody at the school has to be concerned with being shipped to Iraq. However, many people our age are entering the armed forces.

With the prevalence of political apathy on college campuses, the movement for anything in the political spectrum is a good thing. However, it's the absence of the most important aspect of the 2008 election that is an area of concern. By the time students leave their respective campuses, they'll enter the real world with whichever candidate wins this election. So invest in your after-college future, and pick up an absentee ballot.

Untangling the web for students

Melissa Garber

One of the most important aspects of the Internet is the freedom of information. What used to take hours to retrieve from the encyclopedia now takes seconds with Google.

Do you know who the president of Georgia is? Google does in .32 seconds.

The Internet is an incredible resource for everyone. When used to its fullest potential, it can become a crucial tool for local government.

Connecticut is on the right path with their newest Freedom of Information laws. According to a Boston Globe article, "Towns consider shutting Web sites after FOI law," local governments are required to post their meeting minutes and agendas on the site for the public to read. The agendas need to be on the Web site 24 hours prior to the meeting and the minutes need to be posted within a week.

But even the headline for the Boston Globe article implies controversy. Several towns have already voted to shut down their sites.

According to the Boston Globe, "They say they lack the resources to meet the new law's requirements, and that keeping the sites online makes them vulnerable to FOI complaints."

Town meetings are already public events. Although attendance is notoriously reserved for townies and officials, the information presented affects all local community members.

> The advent of the Internet should have inspired local governments, like those in Connecticut, to connect with their constituents at a higher level.

I've been to town meetings and I know they can be long and harrowing, but you walk away with a lot of information on contractor laws and flood plans.

Internet access to the minutes and agenda can only help local government become more effective. There is a reason why the FOI insists on these rules.

So why are towns in Connecticut opting to shut down their Web sites rather than follow some simple guidelines?

The minutes and agendas of town meetings are already recorded. It's as simple as placing a PDF file on a Web site. And for towns that haven't reached the 21st century yet, they just need the documents available at town and city halls.

There's no excuse for town officials to withhold information from the public, which is basically what they are doing. Every citizen deserves to know what happens at these meetings. Why is it taking local governments so long to jump on the Internet bandwagon?

Even our very own SGA struggles to keep students up to date on what happens at their meetings. I know their minutes exist somewhere, but it's hard enough finding which Web site they're even using nowadays.

One I found has Elvis Mendez listed as president. Another lists Aaron Buford. One other site has the current president, Malcolm Chu, but still has Ruth Thompson as Student Trustee.

I thought we voted in Lindsay McCluskey last spring.

This kind of misinformation is unacceptable. Students help fund the SGA budget and they deserve to be informed, not only by the Collegian, but by the SGA about what they accomplish.

How is the SGA representative of the school when most students don't even know when elections are held much less what goes on inside their meetings? Good luck even finding their current Web site.

Local and student governments need to be held accountable. They have a responsibility to inform the public to the best of their ability about what they do. What goes on inside those meetings is not private.

Not everyone can attend every meeting. Newspapers can provide the essential facts, but the minutes of a meeting can help every citizen make informed decisions.

The advent of the Internet should have inspired local governments, like those in Connecticut, to connect with their constituents at a higher level. Not to retreat from the public sphere.

I find it hard to believe it's that difficult for town officials or even SGA members to settle on one Web site, and post their minutes and agendas online. They're funded by the taxpayer's money to work in their best interest. It's in everyone's best interest to keep town hall meetings and the information presented open to the public.

The FOI laws in Connecticut should be enforced all over the country for every town and city hall meeting. Why shut down your Web site when you can engage your community?

Open your mind

Leigh Greaney

With my head slumped down on my desk while waiting for class to commence, I couldn't help but overhear an interesting conversation. I perked up my head as I heard a voice behind me say, "The point of having an open mind is to eventually close it."

As the voice continued to explain his stance about wisdom being linear and having a point of recognition that tells a person what is consistently true, I found myself turning around in my chair. As soon as I was able to mutter, "I have to disagree with you," the teacher starting taking attendance and I turned back around to face the front.

I couldn't focus for the rest of class. All I could think about is how a mind is not a book to be opened and closed. A person's intuitions, mental processes, and knowledge are not things to be labeled as black and white. Opinions change and that's what makes them so great. The grey area should be the most cherished part of a person's thoughts. The part that makes you think, question yourself, and question others is what makes us unique in our species.

Keeping an open mind is to keep yourself centered and grounded in this world. To never be too sure of yourself is to be wise.

It's one thing to be confident in yourself, but there's a difference between confidence and ignorance. To truly have wisdom, it's important to acknowledge that only fools are positive. Once you think you know everything, you know nothing.

> To truly have wisdom, it's important to acknowledge that only fools are positive.

Although I understand that this Zen-like thinking is a difficult idea to grasp, especially when so many things in this world can be labeled as right or wrong through common sense, an open mind is still attainable. You just have to make a conscious effort to commit to nuance.

A good way to look at it is to consider yourself permanently at the beginner's level in life. Always be up for new ideas and the advice of others. Whether or not you choose to agree with someone, it shouldn't affect your ability to absorb new knowledge without any form of retort. Drink it in, and then form your own standpoint. Don't consider yourself an expert over anyone else.

If more people were able to adopt this idealistic tactic of keeping a beginner's mind, there would be no need for "closing" it. What we know is perspective. Perspective evolves as new information is revealed, so we should evolve with it. In this sense, knowledge is not linear — it's cyclical.

We place ourselves on a circular spectrum on what we consider to be true when we consider ourselves an expert. But, what good is an expert unless they have seen the rest of the spectrum? You blind yourself to truth when you think you already know what it is before all the options are unmasked.

I see it everyday — these wisdom-lacking experts on truth. I hear arguments where people cut off other people's explanations telling their opposition, "You're wrong." I'm guilty of it myself sometimes. It seems more difficult to listen than to be heard when you're passionate about something, but what is passion when it lacks knowledge?

The beauty of truth is what makes us so passionate to its meaning. Truth is in our own minds — its varying forms and colors are truths within themselves. Perspective becomes honesty and the more options you're aware of, the more fruitful that truth is.

I encourage you to chew this over in your own life and within your own ideas. Next time you find yourself saying someone is "wrong," do yourself the justice of listening instead. Find out what makes them wrong, but more importantly, find out what makes them right.

You'll be pleasantly surprised that this conversational approach is contagious. If you give someone the respect and the open mind of a genuinely interested listener, you'll find you get it back. It's refreshing. No one wants to be told they are wrong. No one wants to go unheard.

We're here at this university to learn. What can you learn with a closed mind? To be a student is to be a beginner — and there's no shame in that title. If anything, there's more value in it.

We don't know for sure what our purpose is on this Earth. We know our time here is limited and we know our perception of truth can only be proven to a certain extent. What we do know is that life is a journey. As far as I can tell, it's more fun to be an explorer in this world and to discover the truth of the unknown by going out and searching for it rather than already knowing it.

Obama and censorship

Alana Goodman

While renowned free-speech advocates like Matt Damon and Eve Ensler were busy falsely accusing Sarah Palin of "banning books" in Alaska, Barack Obama's campaign was diligently committing actual First Amendment violations.

Senator Obama is billed by supporters as a "bipartisan reformer," but he has recently been using disturbing tactics reminiscent of corrupt Chicago politics in an attempt to silence opposition.

Stanley Kurtz, a National Review journalist and Harvard Ph.D, was just one recent casualty in Obama's war on intellectual discourse. Kurtz was invited onto Mitt Rosenberg's radio show last month to discuss his extensive research into Obama's close ties to unrepentant terrorist William Ayers.

The Obama campaign was welcomed onto the show to dispute Kurtz's claims, but they declined the invitation. Instead, they chose to send out an "Obama Action Wire" e-mail to supporters, slandering Kurtz as a "smear merchant" and a "right-wing hatchet man."

Lainie it to Barack Obama to label Kurtz, who is a Senior Fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, as "slimy" while maintaining that Pentagon bomber Ayers is "respectable" and "mainstream."

The official campaign e-mail encouraged Obama supporters to flood the radio station's phone lines during the show and demand the termination of the interview. Many of them eagerly obliged.

Guy Benson, a commentator sitting in on the program, relayed the experience in his National Review blog. "The [callers'] overwhelming message was clear. The interview must be put to an end immediately and the station management should prevent similar discussions from taking place."

Baffling to Benson was that, "Several of the callers did not even know [Kurtz's] name, most had obviously never read a sentence of his meticulous research," and some callers simply read directly from the talking points about Kurtz on Obama's Web site.

Just for a point of reference, imagine if President Bush had sent out an e-mail to his supporters asking them to take the same action against a well-respected anti-Bush author. This, would be unthinkable — and not just because "well-respected anti-Bush author" is an oxymoron.

The Obama campaign's speech-suppressing hijinks continued on another radio show several weeks later. This time, David Freddoso, author of the carefully researched New York Times best-seller, "The Case against Barack Obama" was set up to debate an Obama surrogate.

This balanced discussion didn't prevent an "Obama Action Wire" e-mail from claiming that Freddoso, a highly respected Evans-Novak Political Report veteran, "made a career off dishonest, extreme hate mongering." The Obama camp once again organized a massive campaign to tie up the station's phone lines and even called this blatant assault on the First Amendment, "fighting the good fight."

In recent weeks, the Obama campaign has also rounded up "truth squads" in several states to silence "false or misleading" attacks by opposition. Far from being composed of private attorneys and investigators, these groups are made up of Obama-supporting public officials, including sheriffs, state prosecutors and elected community leaders.

Missouri Governor Matt Blunt issued a statement last Saturday slamming Obama's "truth squads" as evidence of "abusive use of Missouri law enforcement" and "police state tactics."

"What Senator Obama and his helpers are doing is scandalous beyond words ... abusing the justice system and offices of public trust to silence political criticism with threats of prosecution and criminal punishment," said Governor Blunt.

"Barack Obama needs to grow up. Leftist blogs and others in the press constantly say false things about me and my family. Usually, we ignore false and scurrilous accusations. When necessary, we refute them. Enlisting Missouri law enforcement to intimidate people and kill free debate is reminiscent of the Sedition Acts — not a free society," the governor continued.

If Obama's past gives us any clue, then what he considers "false or misleading" information seems to be anything that makes him look bad. Last month, the American Issues Project was surprised when one of their TV ads describing Obama's ties to William Ayers drew threats from the campaign's legal team. Obama's attorneys attempted to bar the commercial by intimidating TV stations that aired it with litigation.

> If Obama's past gives us any clue, then what he considers "false or misleading" information seems to be anything that makes him look bad.

Last week, similar charges were brought against stations airing a damaging ad by the National Rifle Association that exposed Obama's gun control record.

These bullying tactics are an attempt by Obama to prevent a repeat of the infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth (SBVT) campaign that helped bring down John Kerry during the 2004 election. But, what many Democrats tend to ignore is that the SBVT allegation which sunk Kerry's campaign was true. Kerry had indeed left Vietnam early to join the anti-war movement.

This information was important for Americans to hear. Similarly, we should be allowed to receive all of the facts available about Obama — both good and bad.

As college students, we're familiar with the censorship of unpopular views on university campuses. Two years ago, anti-feminist journalist Mike Adams was shouted down at a UMass Republican club event. Last year, conservative commentator Jonah Goldberg was threatened with violence before his speech at the Student Union.

Obama brings this extremist method of censorship to the mainstream and it could have disastrous effects on the future of free speech.

ARTS & LIVING

Movies to the Dogs

Weekend movies look to suprise

By Arts Staff
Collegian Staff

The upcoming weekend is a mix-bag of dramas, westerns, comedies and Disney's attempt at real-life talking dogs. It's an interesting weekend at the box-office with indie hopefuls and westerns looking for the same box-office recognition that "3:10 to Yuma" got last fall. And Chihuahuas failing in love hopes to bring people to the theater through sheer cuteness.

What will come of the new Simon Pegg movie adapted from a book, and Ed Harris' next try at directing? Greg Kinnear tries to bring emotion and inspiration to windshield wipers. And Michael Cera plays on his talents and his current hot-streak at the box-office.

"Appaloosa"

Ed Harris directs, stars, produces and even claims writing credits in this adaptation of Robert B. Parker's popular 2005 novel of the same name. Set in the 1880s, "Appaloosa" pairs Harris and Viggo Mortensen together as lawmen. Hired to protect a wild-west town from a scurrilous rancher (Jeremy Irons), Harris and Mortensen soon grow antagonistic toward one another as they struggle to win the affections of a local widow (Renee Zellweger).

With the recent success of "3:10 to Yuma," Harris hopes to that his western tale will bring the same crowds.

"Rachel Getting Married"

Jonathan Demme returns from the land of documentaries to direct this tale of a family in dysfunction. Anne Hathaway ("The Devil Wears Prada") stars as the ex-model, prodigal daughter of the family. An insufferable troublemaker, she resurfaces in time to crash the wedding of her elder sister Rachel (Rosemarie DeWitt).

"Rachel Getting Married" is similar in title and theme to Noah Baumbach's 2007 drama, "Margot at the Wedding," but Demme hopes he can prove to be a bigger draw this weekend.

"Beverly Hills Chihuahua"

In its first movie since storming the box office with the animated hit "Wall-E," Walt Disney Pictures hopes to have yet another triumph in "Beverly Hills Chihuahua."

The film is directed by Raja Gosnell, director of "Honie Alone 3," "Big Momma's House," "Scooby Doo," and most recently, "Yours, Mine and Ours."

Drew Barrymore and George Lopez lead the cast as the voices of Chloe and Papi, both talking Chihuahuas. The big-name cast also includes comedians Pablo Francisco, Andy Garcia, Tom Arnold, Jamie Lee Curtis and Cheech Marin.

Chloe (Barrymore) finds herself lost on vacation in Mexico and must use her new-found dog friends to get back home. She must do this amidst trying to escape a man who wants to kill her for her fur.

Spike Lee hoped to reinvergorate the war genre with a World War II movie about the 92 Division that got stuck behind enemy lines in Italy.

Miracle looks for answers

Spike Lee's new film isn't his best

By Alex Sieber
Collegian Correspondent

After over 60 years of cinematic interpretation, it didn't seem possible that World War II movie epics could be innovative any more than the addition of improved special effects and glitzy stars. Director Spike Lee's "Miracle at St. Anna," however, boldly attempts to push the genre forward.

Lee attempts to tell the story of a squad of black soldiers in the pre-Civil Rights movement U.S. Army. It's a story that's been waiting to be told on the silver screen since the end of the war. Unfortunately, the wait for a classic telling of the infamous squad is still on, because what Lee released is a powerful action epic striving for greatness, sometimes succeeding, but ultimately bogged down by the intricate plot.

"Miracle at St. Anna" is adapted from James McBride's tale of the same name, which follows members of the all-black 92 Division, known as the "Buffalo Soldier" division. The 92nd division is similar to the 54th Massachusetts Volunteer Regiment, seen in the 1989 Edward Zwick film "Glory."

As memorable and moving as "Glory's" final battle scene was, "Miracle at St. Anna" trumps it with a scene of pure adrenaline and power that's impossible to not think of Spielberg's "Saving Private Ryan" beach-front scene as an influence.

But the interesting facet of Lee's film revolves around the gaping racial divide that was starting to widen further in American society at the time. This results in some very moving segments that question the reasoning behind why anyone would want to fight for a country that hates them. The viewer is constantly reminded of the racial divide throughout the film's series of flashbacks and flash forwards, that "Miracle at St. Anna" is a representation of our society's wrongdoings and the rise of a unified movement against hate.

The problem with the film lies in the excessive sub-plots that are just too limited in explanation and depth to warrant placement in the film. Lee is known for the inner complexities of his characters (such as those found within his 1989 film, "Do the Right Thing"). But the sheer amount of characters

Indie stays within genre

Cera stays strong in 'Nick and Nora'

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Correspondent

Teen drama-comedies are becoming more commonplace than the spaghetti westerns of the 50s and 60s. Although "Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist" is another tally on the genre, it has potential to do well at the box office. The film, which comes out today, stars Michael Cera ("Superbad," "Juno") and Kat Dennings ("40 Year Old Virgin," "Charlie Bartlett") as Nick and Norah.

Dennings, who would have been better cast as Wednesday Adams, sucked the excitement out of the film whenever she spoke. At times, her voice was less appealing than the death cry of a kitten. She was whiney and her acting was mediocre. Luckily, Cera made up for her poor showing with his awkward, quirky and exceptionally effective style of acting. His role as Nick is typical for Cera, but it hasn't gotten old yet.

Ari Graynor is great as Caroline, Norah's drunkard friend. She provides the comic relief and plays a large role in the overall success of the film.

The story takes place in New York and based around a fictional band called "Where's Fluffy?" which is used as the MacGuffin for the film. The extremely popular band never releases where its shows are located, leaving it up to its fans to figure out where to go. Nick, Norah and a crew of other Fluffy fans spend the night trying to find the show, which of course, leads to all sorts of drama and craziness.

The genre seems to be slightly overplayed lately, with movies like "Superbad," "Juno," "Knocked Up," "Forgetting Sarah Marshall," and soon again with "Zack and Miri Make a Porno." Comparable to all of the Happy-Madison films, these movies fit into their own unique indescribable genre with the same rotation, if you will, of actors playing similar roles. The genre of similar films has become popular due to their realistic and relatable comedic appeal.

The one annoying trend obviously present in this film just from reading the title is the use of Indie rock bands to help build a plot. We saw it in "Juno" a little with Ellen Page's passionate raving about bands no one has ever heard of. In a society where everyone has to "express themselves uniquely," it's not hard to see why interest in underground rock is so pervasive.

If you're turned off by the title or the whole indie rock fad, don't give up on the film. Nick and Norah's Infinite Playlist is a good movie. Overall, it is successful at what it's trying to be and doesn't try to be more than it is. It slightly exceeds expectations.

Michael Cera and Ari Graynor pull the film together. If you're looking for a deep, interesting story, you're out of luck. Nick and Norah will give a few good laughs and won't disappoint.

Subplots hurt Spike's film

receiving back story and personal insights tend to overwhelm and confuse, detracting from what could have been some very memorable character-based moments. One such instance is when Sam Train (Omar Benson Miller) rescues a young Italian child named Angelo Torancelli (Matteo Sciabordi), and protects him from the horrors of war brought upon his land. Lee tries to provoke and inspire through feel-good moments of the film, but ends up with the sweet scene feeling ridiculous and seems out of place in a war epic.

And to make matters worse, Lee is given a powerful story that doesn't need all the subplots.

The majority of Lee's "Miracle at St. Anna" accomplishes its goal: showing the experiences of a black man in a white-dominated army and society with such finesse and craft that almost allows the films flaws to be forgotten. The acting in the film was nothing short of brilliant and ranged, from the soft antics of Omar Benson Miller (Sam Train), to the resolve of Derek Luke (2 Staff Sergeant Stamps). Even Joseph Gordon Levitt, who appears for only about 15 minutes of the film as rookie reporter Tim Boyle, had a memorable part in the film.

If you can look past the excess plot long enough, it will be easy to see that "Miracle at St. Anna" is a flawed, yet wholly entertaining and thought-provoking statement on race relations and the human spirit.

"Flash of Genius"

Marc Abraham's directorial debut has the storyline potential to be a hit. "Flash of Genius" stars Greg Kinnear ("Little Miss Sunshine," "Invincible") as Robert Kearns. He is supported by Lauren Graham ("Gilmore Girls," "Bad Santa") and Dermot Mulroney ("Zodiac," "Must Love Dogs"). The film is based on a 1993 John Seabrook New Yorker magazine article.

The story is about Bob Kearns, the man who rightfully invented the intermittent windshield wiper. Detroit-based automaker Ford steals the idea from Kearns, and uses it in their automobile production.

He ends up spending most of his life fighting a legal battle against the large companies in an attempt to earn recognition for his invention.

The story has potential to be a great legal drama, and an uplifting story about a man sticking to his morals.

"How to Lose Friends and Alienate People"

British actor Simon Pegg ("Shaun of the Dead," "Hot Fuzz") is back with his second film of 2008 in "How to Lose Fiends and Alienate People." Starring along side Pegg is Megan Fox ("Transformers"), Jeff Bridges ("Iron Man," "The Big Lebowski") and Kirsten Dunst ("Spiderman," "Bring It On").

The film is based on Toby Young's 2001 memoir with the same name. The memoir was about Young's five-year struggle to make a name for himself after getting an internship with Vanity Fair magazine. The film's story is similar to the memoir, but fictionalizes most of the names, most notably the name of the magazine. Young is sent to interview Jonathan Lane as one of his first jobs, but never gets past the first question.

The movie's actual plot follows Sidney Young (Pegg) as he is hired by Shapes magazine in New York City. Rather than becoming friends with his fellow employees, Young decides he would rather annoy them, slowing down the likelihood of success.

Patry needs help on offense

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Time and time again this season, the Massachusetts women's soccer team has called on senior forward Vanessa Patry to deliver late in big games.

The Minutewomen's leading scorer and leading offensive weapon has answered, already breaking her career-highs in goals and points from a year ago, while totaling 13 points with five goals and three assists.

But with no timetable set for midfielder Vanessa Lima's return (hamstring injury) and with midfielder Sydney Stoll out for the season, UMass is still looking for someone to front run with Patry to give the offense a second threat. They need someone to create scoring opportunities while alleviating pressure off of Patry to produce.

UMass coach Jim Rudy feels Patry is involved in the offense in every aspect, creating for other players, taking on defenders, receiving throw-ins and restarts. With her around the ball so much, other teams have become aware of her ability to make big plays in the offensive zone, and have created strategy defensive game plans around stopping her.

"They know we go to Patry," Rudy said. "To her feet, they know during the course of play we target to her, to restart everything."

Patry has been part of eight of the 11 goals scored by the Minutewomen, nearly 73 percent of UMass' offensive production so far this season.

Now, as the Maroon and White travel for two games on the road this weekend against George Washington and Richmond, Patry will need other players around her to step up and create chances in order for the Minutewomen to be successful.

"That puts us on two people who haven't started here really, [Cristina] Adams and the rookie [Natalie] Muka to carry the load," Rudy said. "I'm expecting them to pick it up, they've got to or we're going to run Patry into the ground."

Muka, a freshman forward, has played in all nine games so far this season, but has not recorded a point during her first collegiate start against Temple last Sunday. However, she's been successful with corner kicks, most notably finding Patry in the Minutewomen's 2-1 victory against Holy Cross on Sept. 14.

Adams has started two games this season, while tallying one goal and one assist. The junior was impressive in Sunday's tie against Temple, creating the main offensive opportunity for the Minutewomen just before halftime. Adams, who recorded two shots that day, was one-on-one with the Owl goalkeeper, Amy Douglas. Douglas was able to make the save, and the Minutewomen couldn't get any offense going for the rest of the day.

Despite the effort given by Adams, Rudy knows that she must continue to play hard in order to take pressure off Patry and to create opportunities for others around her.

With the increased workload, Rudy is a little concerned that one of his key players might be getting worn out being the leader of the offense.

"Patry's a little bit worn down now because of the amount of work that she has had to do up there without a Sydney Stoll or a Vanessa Lima," Rudy said.

Rudy is also aware that if Patry was to go down, his team would be without a goal scorer who makes others around her better. But he is optimistic that his team would be able to step up and play in her absence.

"It's because of the amount of work she does, it's prodigious. The amount of work she does is amazing," Rudy said.

Freshman Meghan Collins has two assists in nine games (6 starts) for the Minutewomen this season. She is expected to help out more and more offensively moving forward.

Track teams return to action

After a strong home meet two weeks ago where the men's cross country team finished first overall against four competitors, and the women finished third over three other teams – both squads return to action this weekend at Lehigh University.

Each team will take part in the Paul Short Invitational, where they'll be competing against 50 other Division I schools.

The Minutemen's strong performance last week jolted them up three slots in the nation's cross country ranking to No. 10.

The men's race will be an 8000 meter run where sophomore Jeff Hill finished first last season. Also, senior Nils Fischer won this same race two years ago when he last competed at Lehigh.

Last year's top runner for the Minutewomen was Christina DeRosa who graduated, but led the squad to their 30th place finish in tough competition. In order to stay at a competitive level, one of the younger Minutewomen will need to step up and fill her void giving the team a Top 10 finish. Sophomore Shiyi Zan finished second for the Minutewomen last year, but 147th overall and she will need to improve on her time for the Minutewomen.

Next weekend the two teams will compete in Boston at the New England Championships to begin the postseason.

Cristina Adams and the Minutewomen travel this weekend for two Atlantic 10 Conference games. UMass will play George Washington Friday and Richmond Sunday.

Rudy and Co. hit the road vs. GW, Spiders

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

After a disappointing scoreless tie to Temple on Sunday, the Massachusetts women's soccer team will look towards this weekend with hopes of redemption.

UMass coach Jim Rudy said that this was one of the few games where he was frustrated with the game against the Owls, and he wouldn't have even been satisfied with a win.

"I only have so many games left in my career, and I want every game to count," Rudy said. "It was that disappointing. I feel robbed in a way."

Whatever bitter feelings the Minutewomen have toward that game will have to be put behind them against George Washington on Friday before heading to Richmond on Sunday.

"It doesn't look like a stadium. It looks like they threw in a field," Rudy said. "There's one end where it's almost impossible to attack the right corner on the east end and get a cross in."

In their meeting last year, the Minutewomen (4-2-3, 1-0-1 A-10) were up 2-1 before a pass into the backfield was intercepted by the Colonials (4-6, 0-2 A-10), which converted into a second goal and forced a tie.

The only opponent both teams have played is Bryant. The Bearcats led for most of the way before the Colonials responded with two tallies in the 89th minute.

They failed to keep the momentum in their next two games and went scoreless against Wake Forest and Virginia Tech. GW is struggling once again after two straight conference losses to Fordham, 3-2, and LaSalle, 2-0, last weekend.

Despite GW's losing record, UMass has struggled to win at the Mount Vernon Athletics Complex. The last win at that stadium came in 1999. The Colonials' field has an unusual surface that Rudy believes is the reason for the Minutewomen struggles.

GW features midfielder Brittany Eiger and forwards Misa Firitz and Meg Pyle who are nearly six-feet tall.

Pyle usually plays behind Firitz and has been called a late arriver in previous scouting reports. That strategy has allowed her to get three goals, which is why Rudy believes keeping GW from having possessions is important in this game.

"We've got to be aware of where she is at all times," Rudy said.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will be put to the task of stopping one of the hottest teams in the A-10. The Spiders (7-2-1, 1-1 A-10) split their first conference double of the season and rebounded from a 1-0 loss to Dayton by defeating Xavier, 3-1.

Richmond has won all five of its home games this season and has shut its opponents out in three of those games.

Offensively, this team doesn't really stand out, but it has a defense capable of keeping the opposition out of the game. Goalkeeper Andrea Young's three shutouts are second only behind St. Louis' Hannah Perry.

"That's going to be a scary team," Rudy said.

The last time the Maroon and White faced the Spiders, it took a double overtime effort to squeak out a win, 2-1. Former UMass forward Britt Canfield scored both goals, notching the game-winner in the 106th minute.

If there's anything that stands out about the Spiders, it's their aggressiveness. They've committed 100 fouls this season. The Minutewomen have shown that they can respond to contact if the situation calls for it.

Holy Cross played a similar style against the Minutewomen committing 19 fouls. Prior to that game, Assistant Coach Angela Napoli encouraged them to be more aggressive and they got through the aggressiveness to win, 2-1, in double overtime.

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team looks to build off its stellar performance against No. 2 Syracuse this weekend in home games against Georgetown and Siena.

The Minutewomen (7-3) have received national attention due to their first start, their best since 2000. After being on the cusp of the nation's Top 20 rankings, UMass entered this week ranked No. 17 in the STX/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll.

"[The ranking] is obviously a great reward for how hard the team has been working this year," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "But certainly I want to acknowledge last year's group of girls who started putting UMass back on the map."

Sowry, however, will not let the team's rankings change how they play.

"In terms of going into this weekend, it mean's absolutely nothing," she said. "You're only as good as your last game, and we have two crucial games that we need to pay attention to. Should we win? Absolutely, but [field] hockey's a strange game."

Coming off a weekend where they played two ranked teams, the Minutewomen have much easier matchups against the Hoyas (0-10) and the Saints (0-7), respectively. The winless records of both teams are more than indicative of how much they've struggled thus far this season.

Siena has averaged only 0.71 goals per game this season while giving up 4.00 goals per contest. Georgetown has struggled just as much, only putting up 0.60 goals per game and giving up 4.30, including an 11-0 debacle in its match against then-No.1 North Carolina.

Despite their opponents' lack of success, Sowry is still cautious about their upcoming games.

"After the high of last weekend, this weekend is a huge danger for us," Sowry said.

With conferences only four games away, the Minutewomen are looking to fine tune their play. However, the next four games also mark a point in which the Maroon and White will be without two key players, freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall and junior forward Cher King. The two will be competing in the Pan American games in Mexico City.

"Hopefully, [their absence] will not be an impact at all. It's going to give some other players an opportunity to get some more playing time," Sowry said. "But we have pretty good depth on the team."

While Widdall is absent, junior Sarah Williams will be starting in net for the Minutewomen. Williams is not a typical backup, however, with 18 career starts under her belt.

With King absent, the Maroon and White will be drawing from its depth at forward. The team's younger forwards, Katie Kelly, Jill Powers and Amy Nowak, will be looking to fill the void at forward.

UMass has played Siena only twice and has won both times, including a 2-1 win last year in Loudonville, N.Y., a game that was started by Williams. The Saints have scored only five goals this season, three of which have come off of the stick of freshman Sarah Szewczyk.

Georgetown has only played UMass once, a match in 1998 where the Minutewomen prevailed 4-1. The Hoyas are led by first-year coach Tiffany Marsh who has already reached the position of head coach since graduating from Maryland in 2006.

Senior Maggie Farrand, junior Kristen Volpe and sophomore Micaela O'Toole are all tied for the team lead in goals with two each. The Hoya offense has struggled greatly this season, especially in the first half as they have yet to score a goal in the first 35 minutes of a game.

Depth to be tested for UM

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team has dealt with many player losses this season. For the next four games, it will deal with two more.

Starting forward Cher King and starting goalkeeper Alesha Widdall will not be available for the next two weeks while they are competing for the Junior Pan American Cup. Widdall will be in goal for the United States, while King will be on the forward line for her native Barbados.

The tournament will be held in Mexico City from Oct. 3-12.

These games serve as a qualifier for the 2009 Junior World Cup, which will take place in Boston next August.

As the No. 17 Minutewomen (7-3) finish up their non-conference schedule this weekend against Siena (0-7) and Georgetown (0-10), it will be essential for UMass to be at its best as the looming Atlantic 10 Conference schedule nears.

The lineup changes will give UMass coach Justine Sowry a better look at the rest of her players and see how certain players have progressed at this point in the season.

The depth at the forward line eases the loss that it will take with the absence of King. The advantage of having her in the lineup is that she has phenomenal stick skills and agility. Her tenacity helps the forward line swarm opposing defenses and spread out quickly. It is yet to be determined if the Minutewomen can do this without her in the lineup.

Sowry is a believer of team work ethic and doesn't feel that any one player can make or break a team.

"I think after last weekend it was a breakout performance by the rest of our forwards," Sowry said of the forward line's performance against then-No. 17 Albany and No. 2 Syracuse. "Although they don't have the stick skills of Cher, they have great athleticism and they're becoming very aware of where each other are positioned.

"We're never going to be able to beat teams 1-on-1 but we're very good at moving into the right positions and finding open lanes so if we stick to our passing game, I don't think that we will miss Cher," Sowry added.

King's versatility bolsters any line on the team and her already vast knowledge of the game has sparked the play of her teammates as well.

With opponents focusing on King in the forward line, senior Katelyn Orlando has already matched a career-high in goals this season with five, and sophomore Katie Kelly has four goals and three assists for 11 points.

Another outstanding aspect of King's play is her defense. She has two defensive saves, one where a player blocks a shot when the goalie can't get to it in time, and another as a forward when she frequently defends the circle when needed.

However, King's play this season has differed from that of last season. She is more defensively-minded this season and hasn't dominated the stat-sheet as an individual, but her team play has helped the Minutewomen get off to their best start since 2000.

Widdall recently competed for the United States U-21 National team which most recently did a tour of Argentina this past March. She's also been on the U-19 National team and she played in this year's U.S. High Performance Championships in Virginia Beach, serving as goalie for the Pennsylvania-California region.

With the experience that Widdall and King will get from these games, it's Sowry's hope they'll return as better players and impart their knowledge on the rest of the team.

'Born Digital'

Book discusses generation gap

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Ever get the impression that professors just cannot keep up with the technology used in classes everyday? Two professors may agree, so they wrote a book about understanding the technology that separates a generation.

Professor John Palfrey of Harvard Law School and Professor Urs Gasser of the University of St. Gallen in Switzerland have combined their knowledge to write "Born Digital: Understanding the First Generation of Digital Natives."

"As I stand in the front of a room of Harvard Law School students, there is a sea of laptops," said Palfrey. "I wanted to try to understand the students better."

Palfrey said in an interview for insidehighered.com that the book was written for parents and teachers as a practical guide to understanding young people and their use of emerging technology.

"Keeping up is really an important question," said Palfrey. "How much do you need to understand to teach effectively? There are those who teach without technology, and that is fine, and there are some of us who really want to experiment with technology."

At the University of Massachusetts, some professors and majors apply the use of technology while others use none at all.

"I would say in two classes I don't use any computer technology," said senior Mary Kociuba, a chemistry and math major. "To do my homework, Mathematica and MATLAB are required, and I use VASP for research."

Other students feel similarly, stating that they use technology for many of their classes.

"I use programs pretty much everyday for almost everything that I work on," said Matt Bourassa, a chemical engineering major.

Students using technology in the classroom is becoming increasingly present, as is the use of technology in a career.

"Are they trained sufficiently with technology that they will use in practice?" asked Palfrey.

Kociuba thinks that she knows enough of the programs to do the work assigned to her and that it would be impossible for her not to still get a job without that knowledge.

"You cannot graduate today and not know how to use everything," said Kociuba.

Luckily, she feels that her professors know enough about the programs they use.

"They are the ones who taught me how to use the programs," said Kociuba. "Maybe not in high school, professors in college know a lot about technology."

Professors have to know the technology that they use in class, so there are few who are lost in a digital era.

"A qualified professor would be able to use the programs," said Bourassa. "Most professors really seem to know what is going on, only a few don't."

For Palfrey, his concern is that there is a different level of knowledge and understanding between students when using technology. While some know a good source of information from a bad one online, others just click on the first link from Google.

"We need to start teaching digital literacy skills," said Palfrey. "Not all young people have the same sophistication as others using technology."

Some questions about using technology in the classroom are still up in the air, though. It has both a good and bad side.

"Technology can be wide fully useful and terribly distracting," said Palfrey. "If you use it just to use it, then it can be bad. Now, students increasingly have something to teach the teachers."

One of the main concerns is the question of whether students growing up in a digital age are learning differently than the professors that teach them did.

"Yes, they are learning differently," said Palfrey. "To learn more information, you are more likely to go to Google than the library. But, we are not sure if young people are processing and learning differently on a fundamental level."

For now, the main point is that technology is increasingly becoming a presence in the world, and most students are lucky enough to be learning it in school so that they can be prepared for a career.

Palfrey is a professor at Harvard Law School, where he is also vice dean of Library and Information Resources as well as faculty co-director for the Berkman Center for Internet and Society. Palfrey received his Bachelor of Arts at Harvard College, then continued on to the University of Cambridge and finally Harvard Law School.

Gasser is an attorney in Switzerland and Professor of Law at the University of St. Gallen, where he is the director of the Research Center for Information Law. He is a Berkman Faculty Fellow and was chairman of the Forum for European Information Law at the first European Jurists Day.

Getting ahead in engineering, tech

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Professionally dressed students chatted eagerly with representatives from 88 companies at the Engineering & Technology Career Fair on Wednesday, Oct. 1st. Geared toward engineering, computer science, mathematics, technology and physics majors, the fair allowed students the opportunity to talk with employers about potential internships, co-ops and jobs after college. They took the time to browse, ask questions and give out a resumes. Some companies even began scheduling follow-up interviews.

Ginger Goldsbury, the associate director of career services, stressed the fact that within the science, engineering and technology fields, starting early is essential for success and more options later on.

"Most will get something challenging but doable," said Goldsbury of the jobs and internships that students are offered.

What made this event most unique was the presence of alumni representing various companies. Many attended this event as students, so an amicable aura presided over the fair as alumni gave advice on what to do in order to stand out and be successful in one's career.

Additionally, it was a nostalgic event for the alumni as they were back at their alma mater.

For some, the fair was a chance to land a life-changing position, and as various alumni mentioned, someone who introduces them self and shows confidence is determined and will make a good worker.

Joe Goodwill, who graduated from University of Massachusetts in '06 with a masters in environmental engineering said, "Communication and articulation are key."

Representatives from companies stressed the same points; communication and interest. One stated, "As anyone can send a resume by e-mail, the great thing about the fair is that we can meet the person behind the resume, which is sometimes just as telling as a resume itself."

Although upperclassmen have an upper hand on internships and jobs, sophomores and freshmen who attend are equally noticed. Jeff Smith, a representative from Alstom said, "sophomores coming and talking to us is a good thing because even if they are not ready, they are ready to be ready."

Many graduate and undergraduate students attending the fair liked its broad selection of companies and thought it was very useful.

Nirdesh Patel, a grad student getting his masters in mechanical engineering said, "I was more interested in the companies and to see what was being offered."

On the other hand, almost all of the people who were at the fair emphasized that it was overcrowded. With fewer than a foot between the booths, people complained of being blocked while others recommended setting up the fair alphabetically or holding it at the Mullins Center.

Presidential candidate Ralph Nader takes questions following his speech Sunday in Bowker Auditorium.

Candidate addresses UM

BY S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Third-party presidential candidate Ralph Nader's campaign made a stop at the University of Massachusetts yesterday morning.

Although around 250-300 people came to see Nader speak at 11 a.m. in Stockbridge Hall, Bowker auditorium accommodates 700, Nader noticed.

"I guess UMass students like to sleep in on Sunday," he said.

Nader advocated increased political involvement from college students, particularly at the University of Massachusetts.

"This used to be a hotbed of student activism in the 1960's," he said. "That day could come again – should come again. You have the most at stake."

The Nader campaign attributed the lack of turnout to the "media blackout" that has left many voters unaware of Nader's candidacy.

"I didn't even know he was running until I got involved in the campaign," said Oliver Renau from the western Massachusetts Get Out the Vote campaign, who spoke briefly after Nader.

But Nader said that despite being ignored by mainstream media, his campaign has done far better than last election season. He is on the ballot in Washington, D.C. and every state except Texas, North Carolina, Georgia, Oklahoma and Indiana.

Michael Richardson, Nader's national ballot access coordinator, attributed this to the states' complex processes for getting third party candidates on the ballot, calling it "a logistical nightmare."

Richardson said Oklahoma doesn't allow any third candidates on its presidential election ballots.

Nader's speech addressed a broad range of topics including the recent Wall Street bailout, minimum wage, health care reform and the war in Iraq.

"Washington had Wall Street over the barrel and could've made them do anything," he said. "Instead, they stuffed Washington in the barrel and rolled it."

He was critical of Congress for passing the bailout legislation without holding public hearings.

"I'm searching for an historic parallel," Nader said. "In 230 years we've gone from having 13 colonies and King George III to having 50 states and King George IV."

Nader said that the Bush administration has weakened the legislative branch, and both candidates show no sign of strengthening congressional power.

"Congress is supposed to declare war; the last war it declared was on poverty, in the Lyndon Johnson era," he said.

Nader proposed an alternative to the bailout recently passed by Congress, in which a one-tenth of a percent tax on securities speculation would accrue several hundred billion dollars. Then, he said, Wall Street could "bail itself out."

The Nader campaign has also blamed the mainstream media for complicity in the bailout's quick passage.

Dean Rifkin steps down after academic year

COURTESY UMASS.EDU

Janet Rifkin, dean of social and behavioral sciences, looks back at her time at UMass fondly.

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After seven years of leading the University of Massachusetts' largest college, Janet Rifkin said she will step down as dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences at the end of the academic year.

"I feel like I'm leaving the college in a good place," said Rifkin. "It's healthy for a college to have a change in leadership, and I think it's time for me to go in a new direction."

SBS teaches about one in every four undergraduates in a given year and is home to anthropology, communication, economics, journalism, legal studies, political science, psychology, social thought and political economy and sociology majors.

"One of the challenges and pleasures is that it is the biggest college on campus," Rifkin said.

Beyond current undergraduate students, Rifkin also works with graduate students and the college's 44,000 alumni.

"People feel really good about their experiences and are eager to find ways to reconnect, and that has been really interesting," she said.

Establishing connections to alumni and donors is one her major focuses as dean. Rifkin said there is a greater expectation for deans to look for support outside of state funding than there was a decade ago.

As dean, she said she has focused on enhancing the student experience, including trying to offer smaller classes and more scholarship opportunities.

Rifkin said she has tried to improve conditions for the faculty by hiring more professors and providing more resources for faculty research.

Though there is no news on a replacement, Rifkin said she expects to hear soon. It is undecided whether an interim dean will fill in for next year while they do a national search, she said.

Rifkin said she hopes her successor focuses on things like improving the first-year experience, strengthening the advising program and giving undergraduates more opportunities to do research.

One of the biggest challenges, said Rifkin, has been realizing it is hard to please everyone.

"There are always more needs that can be filled," she said. "For everything you can do there are things you can't do, and that can be frustrating."

Though she is also a legal studies professor, Rifkin said she has felt somewhat removed from the day-to-day contact with students as dean.

"I've always liked to teach, and I've always loved the interaction with students," said Rifkin, who now has lunch with students once a month.

Rifkin said she has made no decision to leave the Legal Studies Department but has not decided what she will do once her role as dean ends after graduation.

Fellow colleagues expressed their appreciation of Rifkin's work.

"She has been a really good leader at the college," said Robert Feldman, now in his third year as associate dean of SBS.

"I hope the next dean can build on the work Dean Rifkin has done," he said, citing her understanding of the needs of the faculty.

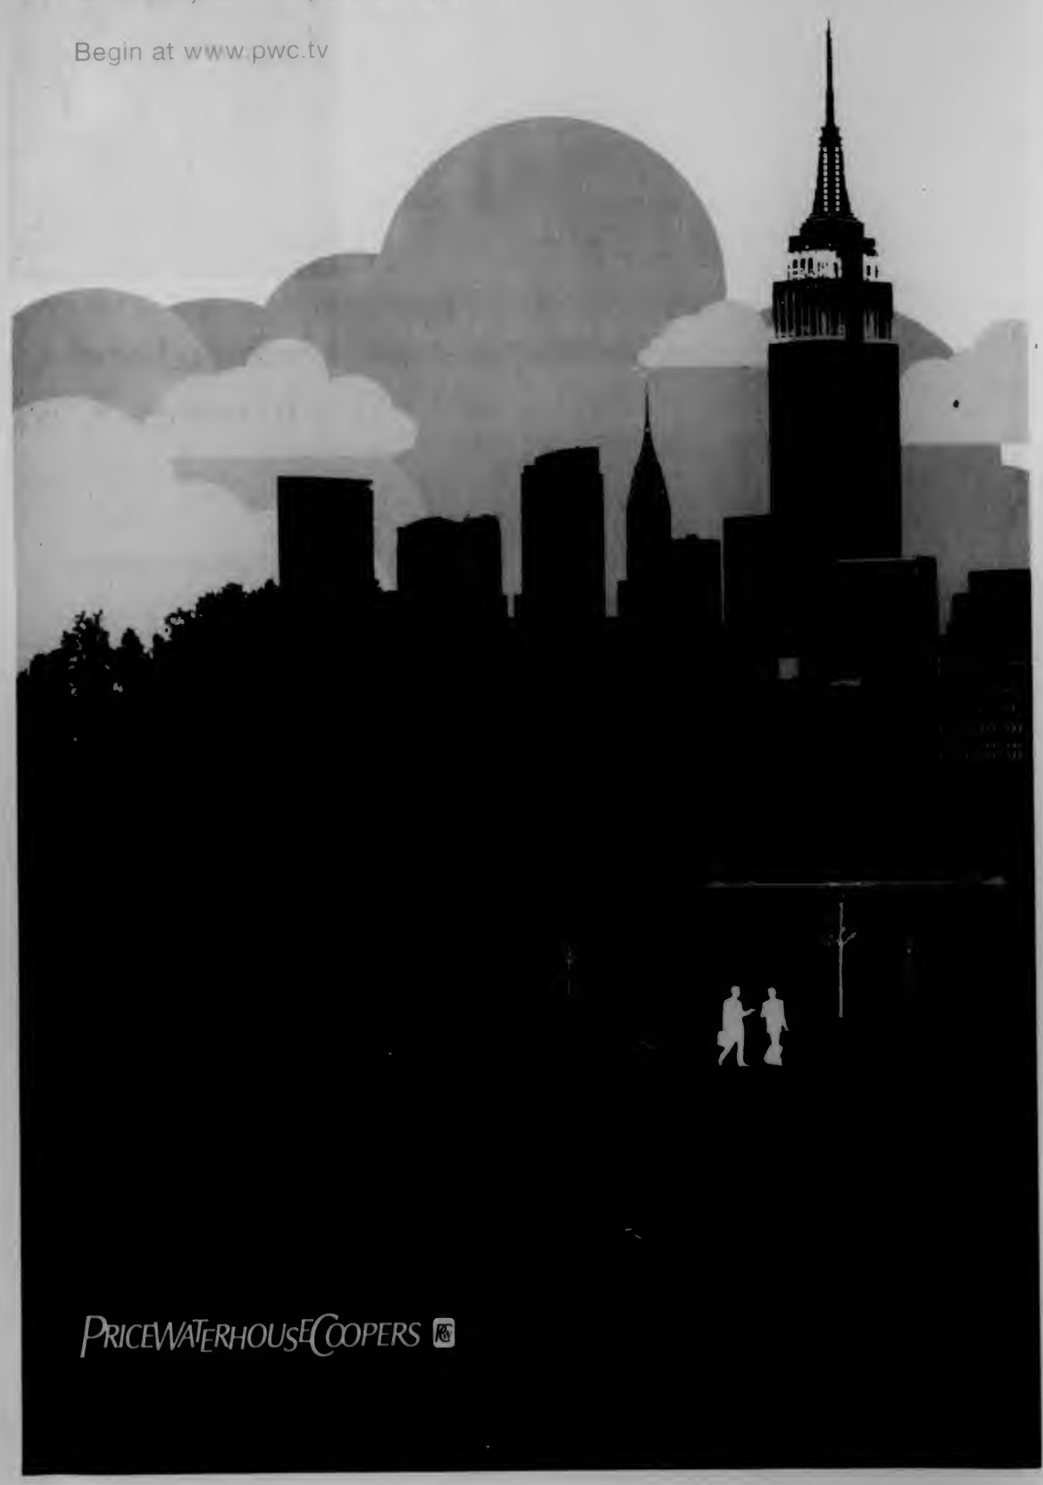
In an e-mail to faculty, provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for Academic Affairs Charlena Seymour called Rifkin "an outstanding leader, administrator and colleague who has advocated for her faculty, staff and students effectively. She has promoted the activities of the College to internal and external audiences alike and has successfully raised the profile of the College."

Seymor continued, "She has been a consummate citizen of this campus and we are indebted to her. Dean Rifkin will leave the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences in a strong position, and we thank her for her dedication, loyalty and leadership."

On Oct. 1, Seymour announced she too will resign from her post at the end of the academic year.

"It is a time of change in leadership," said Rifkin.

Rifkin was appointed dean of SBS in 2005 after serving as interim dean since 2002. She chaired the Legal Studies Department from 1997-to-2002 and has been a member of the department since 1974. She was the as associate dean of the College of Social and Behavior Sciences from 1995 to 1997.



Rifkin has co-directed the Center for Information Technology and Dispute Resolution within the Legal Studies Department since 1997. She served as ombudsperson from 1991-to-1995 and has directed the University Mediation Project since 1980.

Nader asks for more activism

"If you want to see the extent to which the media is on a string from the big corporations, just look at the fact that the term bailout plan fell out of designation a couple of days ago," said Nader for President spokesperson Greg Kaloury in an interview. "They started calling it a rescue plan — turned on a dime, calling it a rescue plan."

Nader said that while the two major candidates argue semantics over the war in Iraq, he's calling for a "six-month negotiated withdrawal of U.S. soldiers and corporate contractors, as well as continued humanitarian aid and U.N.-sponsored elections."

Nader also spoke of the refusal of major networks to allow him and other third-party candidates to participate in presidential debates, attributing it to a "media blackout" that has left many Americans unaware that he was even running.

He said the "Democrat-Republican party," despite rhetoric on both sides, isn't offering much by way of change.

"How many decades are we going to give them?" he said.

He also argued that the U.S. should catch up with western Europe, offering the "basic social benefits of a civilized, productive society," including universal health care and a "living wage."

"If the minimum wage in 1968 was adjusted for inflation — the way Congress adjusts their own salaries — it'd be 10 bucks," he said.

Before concluding with a town-meeting style Q&A with Nader, the campaign asked audience members for substantial contributions. Donations ranging from $50 to $500 were given by attendees.

Christina Branche, a University maintainer, said she donated to the campaign because "they need all the help they can get."

"He speaks to the people," said Branche. "I think it's important at this time to do that."

Nader said that because Massachusetts will be an "easy win" for Obama, independent voters should feel free to "vote their conscience."

He said neither candidate is likely to come to the Pioneer Valley.

"Have you seen McCain or Obama in your state since the spring?" he asked the audience.

Nader left for Vermont immediately after the event. He plans on visiting all 50 states campaigning as a write-in in the five in which he's not on the ballot.

"If you're running for president, that's how you show respect for voters," he said. "You campaign in all 50 states."

Duck season, riot season

Nick O'Malley

Greetings, sports fans.

It's that time of year again. The Red Sox are back in the playoffs, the NFL season is in full swing and the Massachusetts football team has made a triumphant return to McGuirk.

That's right, it's riot season. The time of year when we celebrate our favorite sports teams by going out and destroying property, thereby disgracing the team that we root for. It's the pinnacle of team spirit, really.

Now, the school administration may drone on and on about how rioting can lead to being arrested and having your tenure at the school terminated, which is true. But for every student that we love to The Man, we gain a martyr.

Every time students assemble, we pay tribute to these great heroes.

For every broken window, there is the legendary Murph from Quincy. For every overturned car, there is the unforgettable Jeff from two floors up. For every comrade that is dragged away by heavily-armed police officers, there is that girl that doesn't really like sports but drank too much and just wanted to have a good time, so she took off her shirt.

So what if these people have given up the thousands of dollars they've payed for school and a chance for higher education? They went out in a blaze of glory. The legends of these individuals will last forever.

Actually, they'll be recounted for the next couple of semesters until that story about your friends throwing that burning couch out a window becomes a better story.

What better way to get UMass the national stage than a dateline report that will force parents to never want to send their kids here?

We're constantly hearing about how the administration wants to get national attention for the University of Massachusetts. However, all they've come up with is improving "research" and "academic standing."

This school needs real solutions that produce real attention. What better way to get UMass the national stage than a dateline report that will force parents to never want to send their kids here? This, of course, will lead a large number of students to choose UMass purely out of spite.

Outside of their negative connotations, riots are a pretty social activity. They get kids out of their dorms and into the street. Of course, once this happens, the police demand we go right back into our little holes because some bad apples are "destroying property" and "bleeding." I mean, who bleeds anymore?

Also, any large congregation of students will lead to the inevitable "Yankees suck" chant. Only in the Bay State can the three-syllable chorus be used in any environment.

Football games? It happened Saturday against Delaware. Movie theaters? You don't even have to be watching "Fever Pitch." Elevators? There's probably some guy with a Yankees hat. Funerals? Please, the pastor probably started it.

There are few problems that can't be fixed by a good riot. Many of the issues that plague our campus could be solved by just rioting it out.

We have a lot of groups on campus that butt heads over nearly anything, but even political parties mean nothing when you have both Republicans and Democrats chucking bricks at a window. The SGA isn't getting its message out? Get a microphone and light something on fire. Then you'll get attention. We have a white majority on this campus, but there's no better equal opportunity than getting tear gassed – in crowd control, everybody loses equally.

There's a housing problem at this campus. There's simply too many people. We need to make sure that the only kids that come to UMass are the ones that are really dead set upon coming here. If Southwest looks like a war zone during a tour, the choice between Northeastern and UMass is pretty simple.

UMass is too cheap. How are we supposed to get the top students to come to our school if we don't charge fifty grand a year? It's simply unprofessional. What better way to make our school look more expensive and prestigious than through student activities? And what activities have higher participation rates than a riot?

Horses, tear gas and riot gear aren't cheap. So remember, every time the Police Department demands that a crowd disperse, your education is becoming pricier and more prestigious – just like at Harvard.

Supreme Court in session, out of touch

Eric Magazu

Today is the opening day for the 2008–09 term of the United States Supreme Court. This is an important date in the political year, as political activists of virtually every philosophical position often look to the Supreme Court as the final arbiter of their vision for our country.

Do you recall the uproar when President Bush was selecting candidates for the Supreme Court a couple of years ago? After the tumult quieted down, two new justices were appointed: John Roberts, Jr. and Samuel Alito. These nominees are important because they hold to a certain conservative philosophy, and their presence on the Court has the potential to swing its decisions in the direction of that philosophy.

The ideal of justice ought to result in the best qualified judges making the same judgments in similar cases, without regard to political positions. We notice, however, that this doesn't always happen. I do want to point out that the vast majority of opinions written by the Supreme Court are agreed upon unanimously, we just don't often hear about these cases in the news media. I'm primarily interested in the times when the cases are contentious.

The fact that political activists look to the Supreme Court to write opinions favorable to their positions should be something that heightens our awareness, as this ought to show us that there is something wrong with how the honorable court is operating. The founders of our nation, who constructed our Constitution and early laws, believed that the federal judiciary and the Supreme Court in particular would be relatively weak compared to the other branches of government.

The founders delegated the power to set the parameters for judicial jurisdiction to the United States Congress. The plain wording of the Constitution even grants the Congress the power to remove certain authority, with a few exceptions not relevant to this analysis, from the Supreme Court. Article III, Section 2 of the Constitution teaches us, "In all the other Cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

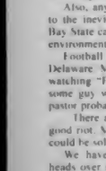
The founders had a vision in which all branches and all levels of government in the United States would act in concert to interpret the Constitution. This would allow for dispersed power among many people, which is a concept that is so essential to prevent tyranny and the concentration of power among an elite class. Since, in our day at least, it is unsafe to rely on any man or group of men to be perfectly righteous, it is essential to make sure that the schemes of sinful people are played off of one another.

The Bill of Rights, when amended into the Constitution, was intended not to grant power to the federal government, but to restrict its power. For example, arguments for a separation of church and state were not meant to grant power to the federal government for the removal of God from secular life, but rather to ensure that the federal government did not interfere in the existing religious and moral order already preexisting in the states.

In the third resolution of the Kentucky Resolutions, Thomas Jefferson teaches us, "that no power over the freedom of religion, freedom of speech, or freedom of the press being delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, all lawful powers respecting the same did of right remain, and were reserved to the States or the people."

There are many issues that are going to be presented to the Supreme Court this term, many of which will go to the heart of our community and national life. It is unfortunate that more of these issues don't go before the Congress, where we, as a whole people, are more properly represented. However, congressmen are simply too afraid to address many of these issues.

The Federalist Papers are a collection of anonymous newspaper editorials that argued in support of the ratification of the new national constitution. A position often quoted from Federalist Paper No. 78 is expressed this way, "It can be of no weight to say that the courts, on the pretense of a repugnancy, may substitute their own pleasure to the constitutional intentions of the legislature." Unfortunately, our legislature fails to address many issues that are at the core of our national life, leaving, improperly it seems, these issues to the courts.



Providence will only give us the government that we deserve. If something is rotten in our national life, this reflects the state of our people. It would irresponsible to blame legislators or judges, or to expect these leaders to fix these problems. The problem is in us. If we address the issues with which we are concerned within ourselves, our churches and our communities, ultimately we will see a legislature and a judiciary that reflects our highest principles and aspirations.

Non-citizen? No choice.

Hannah Nelson

It's no secret that the pharmaceutical business within the United States has a history of being less than ethical. And this time around, freedom is coming at a price for a select minority. This latest development is part of a long history of the governing of women's health issues, particularly when it comes to reproductive and sexual rights. Effective as of August, if you're an 11-26 year-old female trying to become a U.S. citizen, it's mandatory to be vaccinated with Gardasil to prevent the human papilloma virus (HPV) as part of the usual health requirements.

Gardasil is still being called safe even though deaths (in addition to thousands of girls and women reporting unsavory side effects) have been reportedly linked to the vaccine. I've been wary of the Gardasil hype from the start, and the term 'guinea pig' comes up quite frequently in the conversation. HPV isn't even classified as a public health threat, yet is being treated as one by immigration laws. I've never been in favor of mandatory vaccination of girls within the public school system, a decision left within the hands of the states. But if U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services has the gall to impose this discriminatory requirement for citizenship, next it will be for visas and green cards; and why not passports too?

There are currently 13 other vaccines required for citizenship, all of which protect against potential public health threats, which includes communicable diseases such as chickenpox and meningitis. Gardasil is the only vaccine required for a sexually transmitted infection. This 14th addition must also be paid for as an out of pocket expense by the girls and women who fall within the age bracket, upwards in costs of $1,400.

Merck, the purveyor of Gardasil, has been lobbying for the vaccination requirement for girls already within the United States. There is no doubt in my mind that it simply wants to make a quick couple million off of girls' safety. But Merck claims its hands are clean in the immigration requirement issue. But it doesn't plan to interfere either, and nothing less could be expected. Dr. Jon Abramson, chairman of the Center for Disease Control's Immunization Advisory Practices committee, advised against laws such as this as early as Feb. 2007 for the very reason that HPV poses no immediate health threat to the general public.

There is no way of knowing the future reproductive effects that this vaccine could have. Case in point: Diethylstibestrol (DES). In the 1940s and '50s, DES was given to women seen as being at risk of miscarriage. There were side effects on the children born to these women, with female children facing the most serious effects.

I just can't get over the fact that there is so much push for Gardasil, with ads targeting mothers rather than daughters. The advertisements disgust me, pushing mothers to make choices for their daughters on the advice from doctors rather than their own research.

Gardasil had a short research period and a shorter approval time by the FDA. Should the severe 'side effects' such as death increase and get more news exposure, perhaps all this shotgun law making will finally come to an end. But who knows what damage could be done by that point? Pharmaceuticals are taken off the market all the time – ones that have had longer approval and test stages than Gardasil. I have to ask, what if there was a male-only version of something like Gardasil? I highly doubt there would be a run in state governments to get boys vaccinated, or for it to become mandatory for male immigrants.

I just can't get over the fact that there is so much push for Gardasil, with ads targeting mothers rather than daughters.

Children have become overmedicated in this country under the guise of behavioral disorders. It is lower class women who have been implanted with Depo-Provera in an effort to discourage the stereotypical "welfare queen." Vaccination in exchange for citizenship is not much different. In a country that prides itself on a public image of human rights advocacy, I have no choice but to question the motives at hand.

I just can't wrap my brain around why it is so hard to leave the decision over vaccination to the individual. If it isn't Merck getting its way next with its lobbying for the vaccination of all school-aged girls, then it will be visa and green card holders, and there are enough female students from abroad at the University of Massachusetts to know what a decision like that could mean for them. With all appearances pointing to government and pharmaceutical companies being in bed together, they're the ones in need of some protective measures.

Tuition, admission

Paul Payer

The term "safety school" is likely a familiar sound to many current University of Massachusetts students and potential applicants. Although recognized as a solid and respected institution of higher learning, UMass often serves as a popular safety for thousands of college-bound high school seniors and transfer students.

The combination of a low cost and favorable applicant acceptance figures makes UMass a viable choice for prospective students seeking admissions to a quality college. UMass also offers students who do not have access to a parent's cushy trust fund an opportunity to attend a top-tier national university, a factor which often prevents applicants from attending pricier private institutions such as Boston University and Northeastern. Those Universities benefit from higher rankings by the U.S. News, but charge a hefty sum of tuition money in return, and ration their intake of students to account for a significantly lower acceptance rate.

For example, a student considering attending Northeastern University in Boston would have to prepare to produce the means to pay for the $135,876 bill for four years of tuition and fees at the University. In contrast, Massachusetts residents seeking admittance to UMass face a four-year bill of only $40,908. Certainly, financial aid and scholarships are available to some students at both institutions, but one cannot deny concerned parents the right to view those two figures as large factors for consideration in decisions regarding college.

Additionally, the discrepancy in admissions ratios between the two institutions is nearly as pronounced. According to data provided by U.S. News, UMass admitted 65.7 percent of applicants into its' Fall 2007 class, whereas Northeastern only admitted 39.4 percent.

Given the relative similarity in ranking between UMass and Northeastern, 102 and 96 respectively, such a difference in this specific example has been considered by families and aspiring students all across the nation between thousands of different colleges and universities.

The tightened strings of America's purse may warrant a new demand for cost-effective college educations.

That fact is not breaking news, per se, but the financial crisis which has suddenly pushed into the front of newspaper pages and into the wallets of Americans will have a huge impact on the decisions parents and student make regarding which college to attend.

As family budgets shrink and college costs continue to rise steadily, the appeal of state colleges and universities will likely begin to grow. State institutions of higher education have long been considered "the safety schools" or "the economical decisions," but the tightened strings of America's purse may warrant a new demand for cost-effective college educations.

UMass has already experienced an increase in overall applicants, and can likely expect the trend to continue as prospective students enter into uncertain economic times. The number of applicants seeking admission for the current school year rose to 29,000, nearly doubling the total of 16,500 reached in 2003. As reported in the Collegian last month, this increase has produced higher GPAs and SAT scores, due to the larger applicant pool for the admissions office to select from.

Community colleges also stand to see an increase in demand as students seek even cheaper means of gaining a college education. A recent study conducted in 15 states by the American Council on Education found that community college enrollment has increased in all but one of the states surveyed and significantly outpaced increases in traditional four year institutions.

Given both the documented and possible increases in enrollment at State supported and funded institutions, significant concern should be raised when budget cuts in education are discussed, as is the case on the federal level with various programs including the Pell grant, and on the state level in regards to proposals to eliminate the income tax.

While UMass continues to enjoy larger applicant pools filled with increasingly qualified students, attention must be given to the thousands of students who depend on the state college system to offer an affordable education. Turbulent economic times have caused massive increases in federal aid applications, with thousands of students facing rejection in light of news regarding multi-million dollar shortfalls in Pell grant funding and loan programs collapsing upon the weight of the broken lending market.

These factors may actually spell positive growth for UMass (as long as essential state funding for the university remains intact,) as hundreds of students bound for more prestigious but expensive institutions redirect their path westward from Brandeis and Boston College, toward the foliage and farmland of Amherst.

Applications to the University will rise, acceptance rates will fall and all other questionable criterion used in the methodology by U.S. News will fall into place to boost UMass' ranking up the list. What must not be forgotten or lost in transition is the main purpose of state school system not only in Massachusetts, but across the country. That is to provide a quality education for a reasonable price to those who have worked hard and earned the opportunity.

Finding space for puppetry

Non-profit brings original, local art to downtown NoHo

Marionette maker Madison Cripps showcased his puppetry as part of storefrontART.

BY IAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Anyone passing through Northampton's Thornes Marketplace this past summer couldn't help but notice the boutique-less storefront gracing one of the many vendors' spaces on the main level.

In its place, a space was erected in which artists could create. A virtual frame containing 11 painters, printers, sketchers and sculptors which make up the canvas itself, breathes life into an empty storefront.

This was just one of a slew of projects spearheaded by storefrontART. StorefrontART is a section of the Commonwealth Center for Change (C3), a Northampton non-profit organization with the intent to provide cheap space for artists to create, accessible space for artists to display their work and various resources. It offers a helping hand to local artists ready to learn what it takes to become a self-sustained artist in a world where it's simply not always easy to do so.

One artist highlighted in the Thornes storefront was Madison Cripps, a self-described "travelling performer" and marionette maker, approaching the consummation of his Northampton Arts Council-funded Walking Theatre Project. Cripps applied for the grant last spring and finally received the aid a year later, using his home as well as the Thornes space to sketch, carve and paint his puppets, as well as perform with them.

For Cripps, the Walking Theatre Project is his grand finale. After much deliberation and planning, Cripps is on the verge of completing a contraption which once again places him under the artistic title he created.

The result is a 30-pound frame pack which rests on his hips, boasting two stages on which his puppets perform, one at mid-level and one up near his head. Cripps is completely enclosed in the device. This allows him to operate multiple puppets at once, including a caulking gun-controlled head at the top, dubbed "The Head Cheese," as well as "The Money Snake," complete with a spring-loaded mouth.

"My favorite part about the project is the problem solving that goes into the mechanics," Cripps explains. "The technical creativity is really fulfilling, creating the hand that can actually pick something up."

Cripps hails from New Hampshire, though he grew up in Olympia, Wash., before making the trek back east. He is classically trained in drawing and painting, and didn't get into the puppet business until he wound up in Northampton, in an eight by sixteen bedroom on Hawley Street.

He has made 24 marionettes in the past two years, nearly one per month. This is impressive in that it literally takes 30-to-40 hours just to carve a single puppet, let alone plan it out and paint it. Cripps doesn't have a favorite creation, for, as he explained, "it's like choosing between children."

"The amazing part about marionettes is that it puts all my training together," Cripps said. "It combines performance, singing, making things and painting," tied with "audience interaction." He plays the role of both puppet maker and puppeteer, a transcendent, all-powerful position.

"There's no real venue for puppetry," Cripps said. But he has used persistence and inventiveness to create a space which he can work around.

He added, "The space dictates what I can and can't do." This drove him to the compromise of letting his bedroom be the stage, allowing for about 20 people to observe his performances at a time.

"I saw a puppet show in Madison's bedroom and I was thoroughly impressed," C3 Program Director Julia Handschuh said.

With such a small space and with such a small audience, Handschuh became enamored by Madison's "ingenuity using space he already had. He was determined, which was inspiring."

Handschuh's position at C3 allows her to brainstorm various ways to get the community involved in art, as well as ways to break down traditional, assumed barriers in light of more creative, artistic ventures.

Handschuh is originally from Colrain in nearby Franklin County, and returned to the area after six years of performing arts studies at the School of the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston.

"I became interested in alternative art spaces in the city because legitimate gallery spaces were disappearing," Handschuh said. "We had to explore parks, parking lots, anything fueled by thinking about art outside the box."

Now, in Northampton, Handschuh is faced with the same problem. She is concerned with the concept of what art can be.

"We're dealing with a gentrified town," she explains. "We must explore how art can exist in Northampton and to look at the town as an entire canvas, to reinterpret how art is seen and made."

Handschuh saw the possibility for change in the area, and called herself almost "selfish" for her desire to make these changes happen. While it may

Pinback works off the rust

Laid-back Northampton newcomers lack diversity, still deliver for fans

BY ANGELA STASIOWSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

San Diego import Pinback shook the walls of the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton this past Friday, despite not being entirely clear on where that was.

Playing to a 100-person crowd of only the most dedicated Pinback fans, the clubroom was filled with anticipation of its arrival.

The band's laid-back nature was obvious in the stage setup, lacking ornamental lighting and unnecessary accessories. There was, however, a background that displayed various images of American antiquity in the form of black and white film, as well as album art from its latest effort, "Autumn of the Seraphs."

Opening band, Sbach made for unique but fitting segue into Pinback's eclectic rock with its own brand of synth-based music, best described as exceptionally-organized chaos.

Sbach relied heavily on daring feats of the rhythmic variety, balancing its entire act on the shoulders of the exceptionally-talented drummer Spencer Seim. Formerly of the band Hella, his latest project serves as a sort of solo effort to parade his virtuosic drumming abilities.

After a quick transition, Pinback took the stage with surprising enthusiasm. Rob Crow, guitarist and lyricist for the band, appeared as a sort of alternative-pop prophet, with his rugged beard and black baseball cap that concealed his face almost entirely. The image suited him, though it made the band appear to be somewhat of a motley crew, each member displaying a very different image. With such variety, it's a wonder the band is capable of such cohesion.

Pinback seemed a bit off at the beginning of the evening, made worse by Crow's self-professed timing and harmonic errors. He began the 22-song set with the track "Rousseau," off of the group's self-titled 1998 release.

The band proceeded to play a lot of older material, including "Tres" from 2001's "Blue Screen Life," which had not been included on its set list for some time. Perhaps this undertaking was over-ambitious, since the older songs in their set list tended to fall flat.

Afterward, Crow confessed that, "We haven't played that song in almost two years and I remember why now," to which an audience member replied emphatically, "I, for one, loved it!"

Crow and bassist Zach Smith made an earnest effort to please both old and new fans alike, all the while pulling from their limited repertoire of indie label tunes.

When the band finally progressed to the material from their new record, however, there was an immediate, practically tangible improvement in both demeanor and performance. Instrumentation became tighter and the lyrics more cohesive and articulate.

"Torch" made a big impression of the crowd with its solid melody and seamless transitions between nonsensical verse and harmony. With each new song, the band proved that it was headed in the right direction with its mash-up of cheery, synthetic blips and technically flawless bass.

Putting the audience on hold between songs, the artists played a brand of elevator music while they changed instruments and tuned. This seemed to amuse the crowd greatly, but none more so then the band members themselves.

The climactic moments of the evening included the new single, "Good to Sea," which received the most positive recognition and served to further prove that the band has found its niche. With the song's fast-paced, energetic drive, the crowd was finally fully engaged in the performance.

During one of several addresses to the crowd, Crow revealed that he didn't recall ever having played a Northampton venue before, and that he had not heard great things about the club. However, he redeemed himself by saying that, "Everyone here has been really nice to me."

Before departing, Crow swaggered back on stage to sarcastically proclaim that, "Whatever town this is loves to party! And whatever sports team this season is the best!" His sarcastic take on generic stage banter further illustrated the band's insistence on nonconformity.

He proceeded to play a three-song encore, including the hit song "Loro," which was featured in the movie "Elizabethtown." The encore, which was enthusiastically received by diehard fans, also included the recent "Devil You Know."

Despite a relative lack of variety in its set list, and a practically nonexistent stage presence, Pinback's technical prowess presided over Friday's performance. There is something captivating about the harmonies and whimsical lyrics of its work that is simply irresistible to the alternative rock fan. Perhaps now it will look back fondly on Northampton venues.

Despite a sluggish start, San Diego natives Pinback treated fans at the Pearl Street Night Club to its captivating melodies and whimsical lyrical stylings last Thursday.

Latest Palahniuk film retains trademark wit

"Choke," based on Chuck Palahniuk novel, is a more refined and slow-paced film than his most famous film adaption, "Fight Club."

BY MORGAN MEAGHER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For a film about sex, "Choke" is surprisingly unsexy. It is, however, incredibly trite. It's the classic tale of a man's self-discovery.

Victor (Sam Rockwell) is a real freak. He's addicted to sex and unable to love. The film follows Victor as he tries to conquer his demons and reconcile his relationship with his demented, dying mother, played by Anjelica Houston.

Victor soon discovers that his father is not, as his mother always claimed, a traveling Swedish salesman, but something more mysterious. Part of his journey then becomes the unraveling of this mystery. For this task he enlists the help of his similarly freaky best friend, Denny (Brad William Henke), and his mother's new doctor, Paige (Kelly MacDonald.)

Directed and adapted by Clark Gregg from the Chuck Palahniuk novel, "Choke" is nothing like Palahniuk's most famous work, 1999's "Fight Club." Fans of the latter may be surprised by how different the two movies are. "Choke" replaces "Fight Club's" action and brutishness with a slower, more refined story, while still retaining Palahniuk's trademark wit and unorthodox sense of humor.

The title of the film comes from the main character's secondary "occupation." Victor is in the habit of going to restaurants, purposely choking on his food and then keeping in touch with the people who rescue him. He makes up fake traumas to report to these penpals, who are then prompted to send him money, which Victor uses to keep his mother in a private hospital. He writes off the unscrupulous nature of this dubious scheme by claiming that it provides a valuable service to the people who rescue him. He allows them to feel like heroes, a feeling which is renewed each time they send a little cash to help out with his "gingivitis," or whatever this month's malady happens to be.

Whether or not Victor actually believes or cares about the coincidental benefit of his scam is unclear.

Victor's troubled relationship with his mom is revealed in a series of flashbacks, annoyingly signaled by a cliche fade to white. The flashbacks help to illuminate Victor's character. At one point, his love interest accuses him of lying after he puts forth a rather outrageous excuse for the missing chunk of his ear. She's not buying it, and Victor sheepishly agrees with her that he kind of lies a lot.

The viewer thinks little of it, beyond recognizing that at least he's honest about his habitual dishonesty, until a flashback reveals that he was actually telling the truth about his ear. He lied

Spring looks on display at Fashion Week

By Rebecca Babin
Collegian Correspondent

(Editor's note: This is the first in a continuing series on fashion.)

New York Fashion Week is big for a several reasons. First, occurring in early September every year, it is one of the biggest fashion and social events of the season that people flock to not only from New York, but from all over the world.

Second, it is a chance for designers who are both lucky and talented enough to grasp a spot on the tents of Bryant Park to show their upcoming collections for the spring and summer, which dictates the trends for upcoming mainstream fashion.

Third, it inspires budding designers, models and stylists as they hope to one day be involved in such a spectacular process.

Last, it is the first of the four biggest fashion weeks around the world, which in consecutive order make one amazing month of fashion, each being featured in the Collegian every day this week. Here are some of New York's finest.

Oscar del la Renta's collection focused on classic, tasteful looks.

1. Oscar de la Renta

From bathing suits to ball gowns, Oscar de la Renta's spring 2009 collection is classic, beautiful and tasteful – something rarely delivered on the New York runways this year.

Beginning with architecturally shaped one-piece bathing suits that narrow the waistline, de la Renta's collection focused on accenting a woman's attributes and hiding everything else. He accomplished this with his use of wide belts at the waist – picture a chic, collared white cardigan paired with a black and tan fluffed skirt, brought to the side in a ruffle for extra volume with just enough glimpse of leg, all brought together at the waist with a wide, nude patent-leather belt.

But volume isn't all he accomplished in this figure-flattering collection. For those who are searching for the sleek look, he introduced skinny slacks in various colors, paired with knitted sweaters, ruffled blouses or satin trench coats, once again including the wide belt at the waist.

His dresses, ranging day to evening, also captured the accent of the waistline, both with sleek hip-huggers and sweet, sophisticated volume. A cocktail dress with a white bodice, banded horizontally with ribbons of different widths in black, grey and yellow opened out at the waist to a full skirt that was patterned with large, confetti-sized shapes of the same color. It was followed, in contrast, by a triad of sexy black dresses, where the only hint of volume was at the shoulder. True to spring, his collection embraced a bit of floral with a just-above-knee-length citron green, body-hugging dress paired with a short-sleeve satin, pink, painted-floral coat.

As usual, his evening gowns were out of this world, ranging from a floor-length and flowing, white, deep-V gown, cinched at the waist with a red tie belt that adds a flair, to a strapless, lace embellished, white bodice, with a full, black pool skirt stenciled at the bottom with a white leaf pattern. His collection lacked nothing; he used colors and patterns, volume and sleek, hard and soft. He took risks with shapes and styles, delivering something fresh, yet classic. No wonder women love Oscar de la Renta year after year.

2. Carolina Herrera

For her Spring 2009 collection, Carolina Herrera was inspired by artist Hoguelli's colorful pallet and romance. Still possessing her sophisticated design esthetic, she turned her collection up a notch, creating looks women wouldn't mind splurging on.

From short to long dresses, ruffles painted their way across Herrera's collection. Whether few or plentiful, tiny or large, her meticulously crafted ruffles danced down the front of blouses, cascaded down the lengths of gowns and wrapped around the skirts of cocktail dresses. Not only were these elegant and fun ruffles eye catching, but so were the brilliant colors throughout the collection – marigold, crimson and a rich, deep teal brought the renaissance inspired pigments to life.

However, there are no worries for those who stray away from the ruffled look. In true Carolina fashion, she not only delivered classic blouses, trousery and jackets in vibrant tones, but also black, white and grey, with a light touch of spring. Skirts, dresses and shirts alike were adorned with structured florals and petals, while others were constructed with a white light, airy fabric, contrasting with a dark stripe. Four looks all used a bold black fabric with large gold florals splashed across them, including a sweetheart-shaped, strapless bodice paired with a black, hip-hugging pencil skirt, and a high-waisted pair of floods coupled with a sheer, black, ruffled top.

As always, she delivered an amazingly feminine, sophisticated and glamorous collection of evening gowns, truly unparalleled on the runways of New York this season. One after another, classic black and white gown trapsed down the runway, with a few eye-catching tones thrown in between. A guaranteed red carpet look will be a black thin strapped frock with two ruffles that edge the seam of the bust-line and meet in the center, to travel down past the hip then wrap around the skirt of the dress in a tier-like fashion.

Herrera never fails to deliver

Smith's spring collection had a bohemian-chic vibe.

3. Mills by Michelle Smith

As the lights dimmed and the show began, a young, bronzed goddess with long, straight hair turned the corner, a band tied about her forehead and dressed in a flowing, ankle length dress with a happy and bright print. A heavily beaded necklace hung around her neck, and a longer leather necklace with a few feathers hung lower.

It was immediately clear what the inspiration for Michelle Smith's spring 2009 collection is all about: a bohemian-chic vibe. That first look was the extreme happy side of Smith's collection, with the vast majority channeling that theme but not reaching the far end of the spectrum. Followed by an olive green pair of shorts, a purple embellished cardigan and oversized sunglasses, Smith's collection was designed with a youthful, bohemian, fashion forward client in mind.

Another defining piece of the collection was her color choice, as pieces of citron and lilac made it into the vast majority of the pieces. For the more corporate customers, she created an upper-class bohemian look with silk ruffled blouses paired with colorful pencil skirts, and wide-leg trousers paired with cashmere sweaters and trench coats that lack the stiff feeling most work-appropriate clothes usually possess.

Contrasting patterned, colored and textured layers were another staple in Smith's collection. For the younger audience, she paired a cream and brown patterned short with a brown short sleeve silk top, layered with a citron embellished sweater vest. Sounds strange, looks great. She layered a boho-Amish tie-died short sleeve mini-dress with an almost elbow-reaching solid sweater and a brown leather belt at the waist. Her patterns are loud and lovely. Her look is youthful and professional. Michelle Smith brings something to the table, totally different than anything brought to New York Fashion Week this year.

4. Diane Von Furtsenberg

Diane Von Furtsenberg has always believed that a key to a good collection is making women feel beautiful and confident, both inside and out. Always celebrating accomplished and interesting women in her work, she was inspired this season by Diana Vreeland, for the freedom she brought to women's wardrobes.

Like both her muse and her ideal clients, the audience was full of confident and powerful women including Uma Thurman, Venus Williams and Jennifer Lopez. Her models marched down the runway with a sassy swagger, sometimes smiling, which is a rarity on Fashion Week runways. Each look was paired with complimentary floral headdress, unlikely to be worn on the streets but bringing a lighthearted element to the show.

Heavily focused around daywear, one of the key elements of the collection is short, trendy dresses, in wild patterns and colors and various materials. These dresses range from three-quarter loose-sleeved frocks with painted florals dancing across the neckline and hem, to a sleeveless, Native American-inspired beaded, patterned number in clay, black and cream.

She didn't forget about pants either, pairing champagne silk florals that cinch around the ankles with a hand-crafted top with intricate stitching and beading detail and a red blazer to top it all off. She presented figure-flattering one pieces in aqua and black that could easily be paired with her lightweight summer dresses.

The one evening look presented in her collection was both beautiful and tasteful. In all black with an empire waist, tiers of black chiffon making their way down to the floor with a ruffle down the entire length of the left side adding a fun flare. Her love of making woman feel better in the clothes they wear comes through in every piece of her collection.

Diane Von Furtsenberg featured the use of wild patterns.

5. J. Mendel

Gilles Mendel may not have reinvented evening wear in his Spring 2009 collection, but he still delivered beautiful and flattering gowns that can't be ignored. The dresses were mostly silk and chiffon, and made to stand out with the intricate details. His collection featured floor-length and above-the-knee frocks, all but a few sharing a similar hand-pleated, gathered style reminiscent of the Grecians both on the bodice and bottom. Some featured a skinny-strap, v-shaped top, while others had a flutter sleeve or one shoulder look, all with gathering and pleats changing direction from chest to ribs to skirt.

His other gowns were differentiated by a classic and smooth style. Picture a cream-colored, floor-length gown with a wide-strapped, loose top and a deep-v ending just below the rib cage, met with a horizontal gathered panel accenting the waist, followed by a cascading slim skirt, ending in a small train at the back.

His jackets, mostly knee length, but some at the waist, ranged from a soft, silky look, to a structured, leather one. No patterns here. He stuck to neutral solids and earth tones, including bone, pastel purple, soft pink, cobalt blue and an eye-grabbing clay red.

A number of hit this spring collection was no exception. He worked fox and brioadtail as accents into his vests and cropped shrugs, while his mink coats in clay and a soft pink hit the knee, but were made for spring in short-sleeves. Without a doubt, Mendel's gowns will be sprinkled all over the red carpets and best events of spring, making whoever adorns them, women to be envied.

Non-profit group aims to bring diverse art to storefront

sound selfish to strictly do something to better oneself or advance one's interests, Handschuh's self-centeredness in turn extends beyond her status as an individual.

"We want to engage artists in community participation," she said. "I was fortunate enough to be hired post-art-school-craziness, and now we're trying to figure out how to sustain the art community, its vibrancy and participation between artists."

This whirlwind of ideas culminated in the proposal of a non-profit center in Florence, which will break ground in early 2009. This center will act as an umbrella or, as Handschuh put it, "home for local non-profit organizations offering gallery space, studio space, even a café and media lab."

Handschuh is not merely interested in the final art product. She wants to provide aid for artists who haven't a clue about the business aspect, the outreach aspect and the community aspect of art in the area. The center will provide opportunities to teach classes on computer skills and beyond, in addition to the access to an open door for collaboration between artists.

David Simpson, Founder and Executive Director of C3 as well as co-founder of The Haymarket in Northampton, has played a big part in fueling the concept of the center.

"He's used language and energy as a means to get this thing going," said Handschuh. She also applauded him for his knack for "thinking big and following through" and his vision to "imbue life into storefront art."

Under this organization, artists will be essentially plopped down and exposed to one another and their ideas, with much potential collaboration and exposure on the rise. "Let it fester," Cripps said. "See what happens."

"I see an interesting overlap between social change and art," Handschuh said "It's not necessarily straight forward, not necessarily political, but [social change is] inherent."

This change will be on display throughout Northampton as long as C3 is a thriving enterprise, which does not seem to be changing anytime soon. Recently, Smith College donated a storefront in which C3's ARThappenings will display work.

ARThappenings occur four times per year, essentially small, art-minded, "cabaret-style" parties in either "vacant storefronts, urban spaces or community oriented businesses." The next event takes place Nov. 14 at The Haymarket in Northampton.

Other works in progress include a rotating graffiti wall in the Kirkland Ave alley in Northampton, for which C3 recently submitted a proposal to the New England Foundation for the Arts and a local Madison Cripps performance at the Ashfield Fair Columbus Day weekend, where he will be performing with his Walking Theatre Project.

Handschuh seemed utterly enthralled with and transfixed by the Northampton arts community. With regards to local off-the-radar art, she explained, "A lot of stuff was already happening, we just wanted a way to bring it all together. Many projects create parallels to the arts community in general – like the Kirkland Ave site – hiding right underneath the surface, just removed from Main Street."

Another flashback reveals the origins of the choking scheme. Except for the flashback showing Victor's first encounter with anonymous sex, each of the sequences show the young Victor with his mother, a radical who was in the habit of stealing him away from his foster parents. Her motives are never revealed, nor do we find out why Victor was placed into foster care in the first place.

The relationship between the boy and his loony mother is grossly underdeveloped, considering that it's the one which set him on his peculiar path in life, and he spends the whole film trying to get straightened out again.

It seems the theme of "Choke" is underdevelopment. The movie, running a meager 90 minutes, could have stood to be a solid two hours if only Gregg had gone deeper into the issues raised therein. In addition to neglecting Victor's relationship with his mother, the film skirts around the compulsive choking, which it could have explored to greater effect. Instead, it focuses on Victor's official job as a "historical interpreter" at a Plymouth Plantation-style village, where Victor plays "the backbone of colonial America" – an Irish indentured servant.

The movie delves fairly deep into Victor's addiction with numerous sex scenes, each more cringe-inducing than the last. The sex is realistic in its awkwardness, as there are no attractive people in the film – at least, no one who is attractive by movie standards. Anjelica Houston is the most beautiful actress in the film, but she's too old and too goofy to be sexy in it.

"Choke" creeps into the awkwardness of people's sexual foibles, including one hysterical scene with a neurotic rape-fantasist whom Victor meets online.

The film is anything but subtle. It hammers the viewer over the head with messages about personal discovery. A few scenes are nothing more than one character explaining to another just what his issues are, as if character and audience alike didn't already know. Thus, some of the scenes are dull and tedious. The ones that aren't, however, are frequently funny. In particular, the scenes at Victor and Denny's job where everyone is required to speak in Colonial-style English – a rule enforced by their uptight, ridiculous boss – is consistently hilarious. The patients at the hospital, who each are convinced that Victor is someone who wronged them early in life, is very amusing to watch.

All the joy of "Choke" comes not from the basic story, but from what's done with it. The dialog and the acting help buoy the movie, as does the somewhat sick twist about Victor's parentage. The film is quite quirky, and for all its faults, it succeeds at being funny, and twisted.

A legend of film remembered

By Matt Kushi
Collegian Staff

A legend died recently. His legacy will never fade away as far the movie industry goes. Legendary actor and owner of "Newman's Own" food company, Paul Newman died this past Sunday, Sept. 26 of cancer at the age of 83. While America mourns the death of a legend, it also remembers the life of a man who made sure that he was true to himself.

Paul Newman made a name for himself as a hard-working actor. He came into the movie industry in the early 1950s, around the same time that Marlon Brando was making a name for himself. When Newman was breaking in, it was thought that he would be tough competition for Brando in Hollywood. In fact, one of the roles that made Brando a star, Terry Malloy in the film "On the Waterfront," almost went to Newman. Who knows what would have happened if it had been Newman instead of Brando uttering the line, "I could have been a contender," after losing out on a fixed boxing match.

It soon became evident that no one needed to vouch for Paul Newman to make his mark. Starting in 1958, he roared onto the A-list of actors with "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof." This was followed with one of his more memorable roles as "Fast" Eddie Felson in "The Hustler," where he portrays a supremely confident pool shark.

In 1967 and 1969, Newman played his two most memorable roles in "Cool Hand Luke" and "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid" respectively.

In "Cool Hand Luke" Newman plays a man who gets put on the chain gang and tries to fight the system. It is this movie where the memorable line, "what we have here is failure to communicate," is spoken by the chain gang boss after one of Luke's rule infractions.

In "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid," Newman played the famous 19th-century western outlaw. This was the beginning of the legendary connection of two of Hollywood's biggest stars Newman and Robert Redford.

Newman would go on to star in many more films with success up into 2006, when he announced that he would be retiring from the movie business.

During his lengthy film career, Paul Newman brought unrivaled life t roles in films ranging from "The Sting" to "Slapshot" (above).

Newman was not just an actor. He saw that there was more to do in life.

In the fall of 1988, Newman opened "Hole in the Wall Camps." These camps are designed for children who had serious medical conditions that altered their lives. The camps, which are still very successful to this day, give children hope and joy.

Another side of Newman that came out, and one which many who don't know movie industry history can relate to, is his line of food products entitled "Newman's Own." Newman's many food endeavors eventually led him to make as much money from his products as he did from his entire acting career, a fact that Newman was greatly amused by. Much of the money made from the food products was to many different charities.

There was still yet another side to Newman which only came out later in his life, his love for auto racing. While he made a few movies on the subject, like "Winning" (1969) and the Disney-Pixar Animation "Cars" (2006), it wasn't until the 1980s that fans found out that he actually raced in some circuits and was the owner of a race team.

While his many endeavors are amazing, what set Newman apart from many of his Hollywood contemporaries was his desire for privacy. Newman shunned the glamorous life of Hollywood and instead, chose to live in a farm house in Westport, Conn. In the celebrity crazed time that we live in, such privacy would never be granted. The fact that Newman fought for and won the respect of the media for his privacy is amazing. So too is the fact that he remained true to his wife of 50 years, Joanne Woodward. While he had three children from a previous marriage, his marital status after his second marriage in 1958 stayed the same until his death.

While the country mourns the passing of this legend, it celebrates what a tremendous human being Paul Newman was. He will be greatly missed by not only friends, family and Hollywood. Paul Newman will be missed by those all over the world that he so greatly influenced with his wisdom and happiness.

So it is with a degree of sadness that we bid you adieu, Paul Newman. You are now one with the ages.

Defense picks up slack for Coen, UM

three consecutive three-and-outs on defense and would have had four if not for the roughing the passer penalty on Corey Davis.

The Minutemen had only forced opposing offenses to nine three-and-outs through the first four games, but forced the Blue Hens' to seven in their performance on Saturday. The defense also forced a turnover on downs.

"I think we just manned up. It was do-or-die time," Miles said. "I think what really helped us was the bye week and getting back in tune with things, just working on the little things, fundamentals. I think we've improved and showed up today."

Having the bye week before this week's game was evidently beneficial for the defense. One area they focused on was the run game where they may have been most impressive.

"During the bye and during this week, we went offense against defense, good on good in the run game, and if you're out there the sparks are flying," UMass coach Don Brown said.

The running game had been allowing over 200 yards of rushing per game and was going against a Blue Hens team that was averaging 200 yards of rushing per game. The Maroon and White only gave up 127 yards on the ground, but just 65 after Delaware's opening drive.

"Not only was the run defense impressive, the secondary was stifling. After allowing Delaware to complete two passes on the opening drive, quarterback Robby Schoenhoft completed just three passes the rest of the game. The Blue Hens' quarterback finished the game with 40 yards on 5-of-15 passing.

All together the Minutemen's defense allowed 167 yards of offense compared to the UMass' 459.

One of the best signs for the team was that the defense did this in a game when its star, Coen, was not at his best. Coen put up decent numbers (18-of-32 for 228 yards and one touchdown) but he threw three interceptions that prevented the offense from scoring like it normally does.

"I wasn't really helping the cause with those plays, but guys made some big plays for us," Coen said.

Some of those plays were Miles' 52-yard interception return or Josh Jennings' tackle of Schoenhoft on fourth-and-eight to force a turnover on downs.

The play stopped any momentum that the Blue Hens' offense had as they were marching down the field in the opening drive of the second half.

Schoenhoft had dropped back to pass but had no options, so he decided to take flight when he saw an open right side of the field. Just before the quarterback passed the line of scrimmage, Jennings grabbed the quarterback by the ankles and dragged him down for a loss, giving the Minutemen the ball.

The tackle was one of three-and-a-half for a loss by Jennings and one of 16 total for the linebacker. The 16 tackles set a new career high for the junior, whose previous high was 13 earlier this year.

"Our playmakers are making plays. That's what it's all about. I never lost confidence in my group," Brown said. "This is a good group. Obviously we've done it one week, we've got a long way to go."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

Senior linebacker George Byrd brings down Delaware running back Jerry Butler in Saturday's game. The Blue Hens marched down the field early in the first quarter on a 15-play, 79-yard drive, but were held scoreless for the remainder of the game.

Minutemen rebound to topple Delaware

turned it over on our side of the 50, I didn't feel like [Delaware] could get it in on us," Brown said.

At the start of the game it looked like another run-and-gun type of game, which so far this season the Minutemen are very accustomed to.

The opening drives for both teams resulted in touchdowns.

UMass started the game scoring with ease. Coen lobbed a pass over a Delaware defender, which a leaping Jeremy Horne caught, broke a tackle and high-stepped his way to the end zone for the game's first score.

The ensuing Blue Hen drive lasted for more than half a quarter. Delaware (2-3, 0-1 CAA) capped off a 9 minute, 9 second, 79-yard drive on a touchdown pass to tight end David Agnone to tie the game at seven. It was Delaware's longest drive of the season.

The Minutemen defense would not allow another Blue Hen. They forced eight punts, seven three-and-outs and the Miles interception.

"Coach always tells us to make them earn it ... and they earned it, 79 yards, 15 plays. They earned that one and that was just the last one," Miles said.

UMass running back Tony Nelson rushed 23 times for 164 yards. Nelson was looked upon more as the game progressed, wearing down the Delaware defense.

About a minute into the second quarter, wide receiver Joe Sanford threw an option pass 37 yards downfield to an outstretched Nelson.

Nelson came down with the ball and seemed to be flat on his back as the ball popped out.

"I wasn't real happy with [the fumble call] because I thought his back was flat on the ground and the ball popped out," Brown said.

Delaware defensive back Charles Graves picked up the ball and returned it 33 yards to the Delaware 41-yard line.

But like during much of the game, the UMass defense stood tall and forced a punt.

The Blue Hens' quarterback, Robby Schoenhoft, threw for only 40 yards and one touchdown. Delaware running back Johnathan Smith, rushed 16 times for 53 yards.

Coen's main target of the day was Horne, who caught eight passes for 144 yards. Victor Cruz caught five for 76 yards.

Coen, despite throwing three interceptions, had 228 yards and one touchdown on 18-for-32 passing.

"The way the guys played today, the emotion we played with, that trumps everything that I did, because there were some people out there who had some great games," Coen said. "I kind of got to be the goat and watch them do it, and really watch these guys play well and the defense come back to form."

Patry, offense held scoreless

Richmond back Sarah Hilt took a shot deflected by Luckey, which went to Kat Russell – who converted on an attempt inside the box.

UMass had at least four opportunities at the goal, but most of them were blocked by the Spiders' defense.

The loss on Friday came after the Minutewomen faced an uphill battle on the slanted artificial field. It allowed the Colonials' defense to smother them by allowing UMass one shot in the first half.

The Minutewomen responded with seven shots in the second half, but it was not enough to make up the deficit from the first period.

GW's Erica Wright recorded the opening score after receiving a cross from Lauren Kelly. The midfielder got the ball past Luckey in the lower left corner of the net to take an early advantage.

Kelly received her second assist of the game during the 44th minute. Her cross met midfielder Cynthia Gamboa and she headed the ball to the right side of the net.

"I don't think we were ready to play [the first half] and GW was motivated," Rudy said. "I think both [goals] were just a lack of focus."

The loss continues the woes that come with playing at the Colonials' stadium. The last time the Minutewomen won at the Mount Vernon Complex was 1999.

UMass returns to the friendly confines of Rudd Field where it will play Xavier on Friday and Dayton on Sunday. The Minutewomen will follow that with a three-game stretch on the road, which makes next weekend especially important.

downfall, as most of their scoring attempts were stopped in the midfield and immediately turned around for shots-on-goal.

UMass barraged Siena with 31 total shots, 21 of which came in the first half. By the end of the half, Siena coach and UMass alumnus Bill Davidson pulled Tesak in favor of fellow senior Renee Clavette, who gave up two goals and made four saves by game's end.

Another advantage that the Maroon and White had over the Saints was its seven penalty corners to Siena's two in the first half. The Saints wouldn't earn another penalty corner for the rest of the game.

The Minutewomen got a scare after Orlando scored her sixth goal of the season. In the play, Orlando took the feed from Novak and made a diving shot but stayed on the ground clutching her leg and sat out the rest of the game but she was seen walking around shortly after the game had ended.

Defender Jackie Tait finished the scoring for the Minutewomen, scoring on a 1-on-1 penalty stroke midway through the second half.

In the absence of King, Sowry inserted numerous players, including four freshmen, into the game to get them more playing time.

Coming off of a year in which she sat out due to a back injury, redshirt sophomore Amy Novak had an impressive showing of three shots-on-goal and an assist, her first point since 2006.

MikeGillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Young players stepping up

Sowry was impressed with all of her young players.

"They all got some pretty good playing time today," Sowry said. "Amanda Dietz and Christine Cutry in the backfield got another opportunity and I thought they were solid back there and Emily Krueger got a little more time on the forward line."

Sowry also praised Panciocco for her adjustment to the midfield position, a slot where she is expected to play more of in the future.

The game against Siena was UMass' only game this weekend as the Sunday matchup against Georgetown was postponed due to an outbreak of norovirus on the Georgetown campus. The Minutewomen will get some much needed rest by only playing one game.

"It's just something that we'll deal with as we move forward, in terms of now, it's a good opportunity for our girls to get a day off," Sowry said. "It's a good time for rest, but I hope that the Georgetown players are fit and healthy."

It is unlikely that the Georgetown game will be rescheduled with conference schedules approaching for both teams. The Minutewomen will begin Atlantic 10 play Friday at Richmond.

Wide receiver Jeremy Horne celebrates after scoring the first touchdown of the game in the 17–7 win over No. 16 Delaware Saturday at McGuirk Stadium. The redshirt junior led the UMass receiving corps with 114 yards as the offense finished the day with 459 yards of total offense.

With its back against the wall, having lost its last two games, the No. 18 Massachusetts football team was in a must-win situation Saturday against Colonial Athletic Association rival No. 16 Delaware.

"This game meant a lot more than the rest of them," UMass free safety Jeremy Miles said. "We took the field with a purpose today. That's how you win big games."

With fewer than 11 minutes remaining in the fourth quarter Miles read a hook route, snatching the ball before it got to its intended receiver. Miles outran the Delaware offensive linemen to seal the game for the Minutemen, 17-7.

"I just knew if he let the ball go and I jumped [the route] it was going to be good – so I just jumped it and took a chance," Miles said.

The Minutemen (3-2, 2-0 CAA) finally got the performance they needed from the defense, which has struggled all season long. Despite the defensive troubles, UMass coach Don Brown never lost confidence in his defense that, for the past few years, has been the trademark of the Minutemen.

With the way the Massachusetts football team's defense had been playing, an off-day for Liam Coen would not have only meant a loss but possibly the end to its postseason hopes.

But the defense that showed up, as the No. 18 Minutemen beat No. 16 Delaware, 17-7, at McGuirk Stadium on Saturday, was not what UMass fans have been accustomed to seeing this season. After the first Blue Hen's offensive drive, the Minutemen's defense became something it hadn't been all year dominant.

After Delaware scored on a 15-play, 79-yard drive that consumed 9 minutes, 9 seconds of the first quarter, the defense knew what they had to do.

"They didn't come out and do anything special, so I knew it was just all us. We just had to stay focused and bend but not break," free safety Jeremy Miles said.

After Delaware's (2-3, 0-1 CAA) first drive, the Minutemen's defense didn't even bend. They would not give up another score the entire game. The Blue Hens got one more first down off a UMass roughing the passer penalty during the entire first half.

Saints record 1 shot against Williams in net

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The individual skills of numerous players were put on display this past Saturday as the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team routed Siena, 5-1.

Four different players scored for the No. 17 Minutewomen (8-3), including a two-goal effort from sophomore Jaime Bourazeris. The Saints (0-8) were outmatched in every statistic except saves (12), made by two different goalies.

Junior goalkeeper Sarah Williams made no saves while allowing one goal in the game. However, this shows nothing of both Williams' and the UMass defense's skill, which allowed just one shot-on-goal, which came off of a breakaway from Saints defender Jenn Reich, late in the second half.

"We wanted to get back to our passing game," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of the Maroon and White's tactics against Siena. "I thought we did that reasonably well today, passing rather than dribbling. It was a good opportunity to play [bench players]. Everyone got good time and Sarah [Williams] got an opportunity back there as well."

With this being the first game the Minutewomen were without starting goalkeeper Alesha Widdall and forward Cher King, other players minimized the personnel losses by making contributions of their own.

Senior captain Erin Parker scored the first goal of the game – fourth of the season, grabbing a rebound after a corner attempt and depositing the ball in for the score within the first two minutes of the game.

Parker was in on the next goal too, passing the ball in from a penalty corner to Mary Shea who faked the shot, leading to Bourazeris' first goal of the game. Parker's goal and two assists gave her the team lead in points with 14.

Bourazeris and Parker would hook up again on a corner as the first half ended, as Parker this time inserted the ball to Katelyn Orlando, who faked the shot and Bourazeris sent the ball past Saints goalkeeper Jennifer Tesak, who had eight stops for Siena.

"We went back to some of the basics that I think we stray from that I think we were working on earliest in the season," Parker said of the team's continuity. "We really concentrated on our passing game and getting a lot of communication from the team."

The Massachusetts women's soccer team is now in an offensive slump after failing to score in Sunday's 1-0 loss to Richmond and Friday's 2-0 defeat to George Washington.

UMass' losses knock the Minutewomen (4-4-3, 1-2-1 Atlantic 10) back to a .500 record and a losing conference record. The last time they were at .500 was after the Sept. 10 win against Bryant.

UMass was 1-1-2 following that win and have since worn down opponents with its defense and timely scoring from forward Vanessa Patry. UMass coach Jim Rudy warned earlier this week that forwards Cristina Adams and Natalie Muka would have to step up, especially with Vanessa Lima's hamstring injury.

Teams have figured out that the Minutewomen like to go to Patry whenever possible and have made it more difficult for her to get shots off by doubling her when she gets the ball.

"I think they know where she is," Rudy said. "We still have to get someone besides Patry doing some damage up there."

Opponents' double-teams have caused UMass to go scoreless for three straight games dating back to the Sept. 28 scoreless tie against Temple. The last time it failed to score in three straight games was in 2003 when Syracuse, Boston University and Central Connecticut State shutout the Minutewomen in September.

However, that was when UMass was in its non-conference schedule. This time, the scoring drought is against A-10 opponents.

Patry was limited to four shots the entire weekend. Three of those came against The Spiders.

"She was unbelievable," Rudy said of Patry's performance on Sunday. "She played a considerable amount and hopefully as she gets fitter, she's going to get better at scoring goals."

Although the Minutewomen had difficulty scoring against Richmond, Rudy believed the defense could hold off the Spiders because almost all of the shots came from long distance.

The shots came from as far as 30 yards, long enough for goalkeeper Lauren Tuckey to pick up four saves without working too hard at the net. The lone tally for the Spiders came with 25 minutes left in the game.

With junior forward Cher King already unavailable for the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team, the Minutewomen (8-3) took a huge hit when senior forward Katelyn Orlando left Saturday's game against Siena with an apparent knee injury in the second half.

UMass had already been utilizing an adjusted lineup while King was participating in the Pan American games in Mexico. Freshman Nikki Pancicocco was moved to midfield while junior Jill Powers, sophomore Katie Kelly and Orlando attempted to maintain the front line without King.

"One of our goals was to get back to basics and just have good awareness of each other," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "I think we have become a little bit individual in recent weeks even though the energy's been there, it's individual energy and we need to start having good awareness of each other."

In the first half, the Minutewomen showed no noticeable offensive lapses, scoring three unanswered goals. Siena (0-8) played like a winless team, tallying one shot in the first half to UMass' 21. The Saints were also out-cornered by the Minutewomen 7-to-2 in the first half and 11-to-2 for the game.

The Maroon and White continued its success in the second half; however, six minutes into the half Orlando fell to the ground holding her knee in pain after a goal. During the play, Orlando was in front of the net and took the feed inside to score the goal. However, as she shot, the Siena defender took out the senior forward, rolling up on her leg.

After she limped off, the Minutewomen had to regroup and finish out the half.

"We started subbing more, with our freshmen and forwards coming off of the bench," said captain Mary Shea said. "People stepped up in the positions they needed to step up in."

"We were really working hard in terms of attacking the goal and getting into the right scoring positions," Sowry said of her remarks after Orlando left the game. "We told [the team] to keep to the goals of the game, to pass the ball and to just play [field] hockey."

With Orlando out, Sowry turned to her younger players to pick up the slack. Excluding freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdal who is also competing in the Pan American games, the Minutewomen had four freshmen on the field at several points in the second half.

Freshmen Christine Cutry, Amanda Dietz, Emily Krueger and junior Kylie Jellie all posted season highs in minutes played. Cutry, Krueger and Jellie all played 27 minutes while Dietz was on the field for 48.

Student accused of UHS pill theft

David J. Bach, a UMass student, was charged with allegedly stealing Adderall pills from the University Health Services pharmacy, where he worked as a clerk, and replacing the pills with Ibuprofen before their distribution to patients.

BY MATT ROCHELEAU

The University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) has charged a student worker for allegedly stealing Adderall, a controlled substance, from the pharmacy at University Health Services (UHS).

David J. Bach, 19, of 13 Bach Lane in South Hadley, pleaded innocent Friday at his arraignment and is due back in court for a pre-trial hearing on Oct. 30, according to the Eastern Hampshire District Court clerk's office.

Police suspect Bach, a biochemistry and molecular biology major, of substituting the prescriptions with over the counter ibuprofen pills while working as a clerk at the pharmacy, according to a statement from Ed Blaguszewski, director of the University's Office of News and Information.

Pharmacy staff is contacting individuals who filled these kinds of prescriptions between Sept. 2 and Oct. 2 to verify contents, Blaguszewski said.

"Patients regularly taking medications are typically accustomed to the appearance of their pills and are likely to question those which appear different," Blaguszewski said. "UHS medical experts also noted that adverse effects from consuming the substituted remedies are unlikely."

An anonymous UMass junior from the College of Engineering, noticed the pills he received on Sept. 10 from UHS looked different from the Adderall he received in the past.

The student said he wished to remain anonymous because medical records are a confidential matter.

He said he noticed the pills were round instead of elliptical and blue instead of brown when he had the prescription filled, but did not give it much thought because he still had pills left from his last bottle.

Once that bottle was almost empty, he decided to do a Google search of the numbers "44 291" engraved on the pills because they did not match the "b 972" imprinted on his Adderall. The results said the pills were a Walgreens brand of Ibuprofen called "Walprofen."

He then went to UHS to ask about the pills. The staff at UHS

Anticipating economic cuts

BY KATE OLESIN

Editor's Note: This article is the first in a series this week about the United State's economy.

The national issue of the downward spiral of the economy is beginning to resonate at home as the state of Massachusetts begins some serious budget cuts.

Gov. Deval Patrick's office announced on Oct. 2 that it would slice $1 billion from the Legislature's budget, a figure excerpt from his own office's budget, the Boston Globe reported.

However, that's only the beginning since Gov. Patrick also added that he expects to slash "hundreds of millions" in layoffs and budget cuts by Oct. 15, according to the Globe.

The state is reacting to the national financial crisis. With dwindling funds and the condition of the credit markets making it hard for the state to borrow, paying the bills is getting tougher and tougher.

With the state budget starting to cut back, the University of Massachusetts system waits with baited breath, but a sense of determination, since the governor did indicate that higher education budgets would be affected.

"I think certainly it's a moment that President Wilson and the Chancellors and senior officials have been preparing for, for some time since certainly the economic news has taken a downturn in the recent weeks," said Robert Connolly spokesman for the University President's office. "There's a

It is inevitable.

At some point in their day, UMass students will hear a cellular phone ring, and most likely, it will be their own.

In the off-chance that they don't, there is an absolute certainty that they will either see or hear another student using his cell phone. It is simply part of today's technologically-dependant society.

The use of cell phones in public is expanding into academic areas that traditionally were communication free, such as the classroom or study areas, leave many students with varied opinions.

Even within the walls of W.E.B. DuBois library, students have the option to keep their cell phones on vibrate, according to signs posted in the Learning Commons. There are also "Cell Zones," portable sound-proof booths where students can enter to have conversations without disrupting others who are studying.

However, many UMass students find that more often than not, people disregard using these booths and elect to answer their phones in the library.

Many students argue that in a world of almost constant communication, it is not a big deal anymore.

But to some students, there still is some sort of cell phone etiquette. There are places where cell phone use should be prohibited, or instances where people should refrain from answering, no matter how discreet they try to remain.

UMass sophomore and psychology major Stephanie Saint Paul believes that cell phone use in the library is acceptable within reason.

"It doesn't really bother me, unless they are really loud about it," Saint Paul said.

"If they are discreet, it is okay. I know I run to the Cell Zones," agreed junior and comparative literature major Katie Roussos. "I think it is good that the library has them, if you need to use your phone and don't want to leave. I see some people using them, but I guess some people don't even remember."

Other UMass students admit that they see many other students ignoring the cell zones and simply answering their phones in study areas.

"I don't think it [the use of the Cell Zones] is followed," said junior and management major Dave Piper. "If you are talking about something private, you shouldn't be talking about it

Discussion on South Africa

BY CHRIS RUSSELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

South Africa is still grappling with the legacy of apartheid 14 years after the policy was made illegal, according to a panel titled "Racial Conflict and Transformation in South Africa" held last Thursday night in the Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts.

The multi-disciplinary panel said that South Africa faces many social, economic and political problems, and could not presently be called a "peaceful" society.

Upon South Africa's transition to democracy in 1994 there were "huge race-based inequalities" according to James Heintz, associate director of the Political Economy Research Institute at UMass.

Heintz blamed this on apartheid, the policy of racial segregation that had kept the black majority economically, socially and politically inferior to the white minority.

In 1994 apartheid was made illegal and Nelson Mandela was elected President in South Africa's first democratic elections, which was also the first time a black African held any position in the government.

The new government relied mostly on the free market to improve peoples' economic situation. They feared a radical redistribution of wealth would cause business and capital to leave South Africa.

According to Heintz this has mostly "favored people who already have wealth," leaving millions of poor blacks no better off then they were under apartheid.

Inequalities also have persisted in access to basic needs, such as healthcare.

According to Jeremy Sarkin, professor of law at Hofstra University, the predominately black, public healthcare system is marred by "long waits, inadequate facilities and insufficient funds." It serves 90 percent of the population, but accounts for 10 percent of healthcare spending.

The predominately white private system, on the other hand, is "world class healthcare," and serves 10 percent of the population, but accounts for 90 percent of the spending.

Sarkin expanded on apartheid's influence on present day South Africa by discussing the prison system and the amount of police brutality in the country.

in a public area.

"I've never used a Cell Zone. They are kind of inconvenient. It is more convenient to answer it where I am."

"Just keep it quiet [in the library]," said UMass junior and psychology major Sarah Leva. "I've seen one or more people be rude about it."

Many students seemed to have varying opinions about where and when it is okay to use a cell phone, as well as text messages.

"It is rude if you are in a meeting or having a conversation," Leva said.

"I think on buses people shouldn't have conversations on the phone. In public there is not really a time and a place for it."

While some forms of cell phone etiquette seem to exist, a way to simultaneously use cell phones in public without offending others or making a bad impression remains ambiguous.

"I [believe there is a cell phone etiquette], but I don't follow it," said UMass junior and hospitality and tourism major Alex Green.

"I feel like there should be etiquette, but sometimes I don't think of it."

When it comes to text messaging, Green does not believe that the same rules apply.

"There is no texting etiquette. I text everywhere. But, I guess it depends. If you are loud about it, I see how it could be distracting," Green said.

"I keep my keypad on silent. I feel that the majority of students here text in class, and I don't see why they wouldn't. It is so easy to."

But others disagree.

"If I text in class, I feel kind of guilty," Leva said.

"In a small class or discussion, you shouldn't text," Roussos said.

Indeed, almost all college students text.

Although there is no spoken conversation involved in text messaging, it is difficult for students in social situations to figure out where and when it is alright to do so.

"Sometimes, even when you hang out with people, they will be texting. I do it, and I wonder if they think I am being rude," Roussos said.

Most students agree that even though some situations may bother them, the convenience of using cell phones overrides being polite.

Many students agreed that simply being courteous of others, and being aware that the use of cell phones can potentially be distracting or even offensive, will help people cope with cell phones.

The Daily Collegian's Guide to Cell Phone and Texting Etiquette

By Lisa DeBenedictis, Collegian Staff

1) If texting in class, a lecture is ideal. With the exception of sitting up front, there is virtually no way to tell. Just keep the phone on silent. However, in a smaller class or discussion, it's pretty obvious when a person is texting, so unless you are really good at hiding it, wait until class is over.
2) If you are having a conversation, especially a one-on-one, it is kind of rude to keep texting somebody else the entire time. Stop multi-tasking.
3) In public areas, such as libraries, buses or restaurants, only answer if it is important, and try to keep it as quiet and brief as possible.
4) Never ask someone out for the first time or for that matter, break up with someone, over a text message. Just call, or better yet, do it in person.
5) Texting while driving is a very bad idea.
6) If you want to end the text message conversation, don't simply stop responding. Let the other person know, so they are not worried about what they may or may not have said that was potentially upsetting.
7) "Ok" is such a waste of a text message.
8) Be aware that the tone of a text message is very difficult to decipher, so if it is an emotional topic, you may want to switch to the phone. Never an emoticon.
9) If you do choose to have above conversation on your cell phone, having that conversation in a public place is also probably not a good idea. Fighting with your mom or crying because of your boyfriend while on the phone tends to make things awkward for other people around you.
10) As far as a drunk booty call or text message goes, try to avoid it at all costs. But if you do, and it doesn't go over well, or if you receive an unwanted one, it is acceptable to simply pretend as though it never happened. Remember, with text messages, there is always the small chance that it didn't send, so that could end up working out in your favor.

found the pill counts – records indicating how many pills are given out to each person – to be accurate, so he said that the pharmacy told him there was nothing they could do.

This weekend he received a call from UHS telling him of the alleged pill theft, he said.

The issue was resolved without the student running out of Adderall, or taking any of the Ibuprofen of was given on Sept. 10, he said.

He said that under different circumstances, however, it could have been worse.

"If I was diabetic or something this could have been very dangerous," he said.

Another student called the alleged theft selfish.

"He wasn't considering other people's health, he was only thinking about himself," said senior Shazia Akhtar, a UMass student and biology and psychology major.

Effects of 'apartheid'

South Africa ranks number 14 for their amount of prisoners in the world and 569 people died in policy captivity last year.

The similarities to apartheid are clear, according to the panel discussion: between 1984 and 1986, when black activism and opposition to the government were at their height, security forces killed 2000 and arrested 26,000.

The security forces relied on the system of torture, murder and intimidation to maintain the apartheid system, according to the lectures.

Thomas Pettigrew, professor of social psychology at the University of California, Santa Cruz discussed this when he talked about his experiences with the security forces during a visit to South Africa in 1956.

He compared the South African secret police – the 'Special Branch' – to Hitler's Gestapo and spoke about how they spied on him for attending African National Congress (ANC) meetings. The ANC was one of the main black opposition groups, leading the police to threaten "to throw me out of the country if I kept attending meetings."

Pettigrew – who is white – also had to keep associations with black friends secret.

"To go to dinner with my African friend we had to violate the law, and so much of African life was like that," he said.

Voters register as deadlines approach

As the deadline for voter registration nears, many college campuses are pushing for youth registration, and are finding that the majority of college students are in support of Presidential candidate Barack Obama.

By Emily Schuttheis and Lauren Callahan
UWire

"Are you registered to vote at your current address?"

For many college students across the country, hearing this question is a common part of campus life as student groups work hard to register voters before the approaching deadlines.

Twenty-six states and the District of Columbia have voter registration deadlines on or before Friday, October 10th – which is less than two weeks away.

Though student groups on both ends of the political spectrum are more involved in this election than ever before, the emphasis on voter registration efforts seems to be largely on the part of the College Democrats and Students for Barack Obama.

Dan Reilly, a sophomore at Providence College who is involved with the College Republicans on campus, said that the group is involved in voter registration to a certain extent, but also pointed out that since college students tend to be overwhelmingly liberal, "generally getting people registered doesn't help our party."

The situation is similar at the University of Texas at Austin, where the University Democrats, as part of a major voter registration effort, initiated a movement to have all students in the dorms registered to vote. They took their case to the Department of Housing on campus, and were allowed unprecedented access to every resident.

"The University of Texas has never allowed voter registration cards to be distributed in the dorms," said Andy Jones, the communications director for University Democrats.

"People who lived in the dorms went to the dorms they live in and put voter registration cards under doors, 'guerilla-style.' This was frowned on by the university. Yet this year, UT has allowed us to distribute 10,800 cards [one for every student who lives on campus] in the dorms."

Jones agreed with the assessment that, while Republicans are active on campus and care about registering students, the voter registration drive on the University of Texas at Austin has been all but dominated by Democrats.

"As far as the College Republicans are concerned, they do care about registering voters. Many in their organization are deputy voter registrars. We do not clash on this subject," Jones said.

"The difference, however, is that the College Republicans have not advocated for registration cards in the dorms nor do they hold voter registration drives, rallies and events like we, the University Democrats, do that affect the community."

Despite this major push by student groups to register young voters on college campuses across the country, not all groups agree on the best place for students to register.

At the University of California, Davis, the College Democrats have placed their focus mainly on getting students to vote by mail rather than to vote at their current address on campus.

According to College Dems President and Don Gibson, this isn't necessarily an issue of strategy – it's more for the convenience of UC Davis students.

With vote by mail, students have "lots of chances to vote – 30 days, rather than one day," Gibson said. "You either forget about it [on Election Day], you have a midterm, have a paper – you'll be focusing on that rather than on voting."

At the University of Pennsylvania, however, the Penn Democrats and UPenn for Obama stress the importance of registering to vote on campus, both because it's easier than having to figure out each state's voting rules, and because Pennsylvania is one of several critical states that could very well determine the outcome of the election.

Penn Dems President Lauren Burdette said students should register to vote on Penn's campus "unless there's a state senate race or U.S. senate race you're really invested in."

Students are receiving the same message at the University of Colorado at Boulder. The state of Colorado is in serious play for the first time in years. Since both parties are campaigning hard in the state, College Democrats President Jesse Jensen said that voter registration has been concentrated on getting students to register in Colorado.

"We make sure that students understand how valuable their vote will be in Colorado in comparison to states whose races are all but locked up," Jensen said. "Beyond that, it's difficult to tell a student where you think they should vote. The one point we stress is that it's a personal choice."

"In Colorado, as long as you are living at that residence for 30 days prior to the election you are eligible to vote from that address," he added, noting that many new students would be eligible to register in Boulder.

And at George Washington University in the District of Columbia, where to register is really left up to each individual. The GW Democrats use a voter registration Web site, voteforchange.com, to register students on campus.

The site, set up by the Obama campaign, has information about rules and deadlines for every state so that students can register either in D.C. or in their home state. When students stop by the GW Democrats' table on campus, they can use a computer set up at the table to register and ask questions.

Though the choice is ultimately up to each student, GW Democrats Membership Director Jessica Gordon said they are encouraged to register in their home states since D.C. is already "basically 120 million percent Democratic."

According to Gordon, GW's student groups aim to register 100 percent of eligible students on campus by the Oct. 6 deadline.

Students on both sides of the political aisle said, voting is the important thing, not where a student is registered.

"It doesn't matter to us where students vote," said Erica Pederson, communications director for the Young Democrats at Arizona State University. "Although we do try to push students voting in Arizona because then they can vote for our local candidates, we are just encouraging them to vote, period."

The huge push for voter registration this fall means increased participation – but also an increased chance that issues will arise.

Political organizations on campus are keeping their eyes open for allegations of fraud or complications that could occur in the final days and weeks of registration.

As they push to register as many students as possible before each individual deadline, these students are finding current registration policies that could be improved for the next cycle.

"The process doesn't exist in a format that is conducive to the lives of our newest generation," Jensen said. "I think it is laughable that online voter registration doesn't exist in Colorado. We need to follow the examples of states like Washington to allow students the ability to participate in the political process."

Economy may affect UMass

commitment to working through this moment and we'll get through as the University has worked through these moments before. There's light at the end of the tunnel."

According to Connolly, each UMass campus is working on its own plans in reaction to the state budget cuts. But it would mostly concern faculty and staffs' paychecks, since a "preponderance" of money the UMass system borrows from the state goes to those positions. However, the University is rather limited as to what it can do, seeing as the budget cuts are coming in the middle of the fiscal year.

"It's a general sense that [the campuses] are going to have to look at whatever spending reductions are going to be made and take a comprehensive look at their budgets," said Connolly.

As for UMass Amherst, University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said that UMass will adapt to whatever comes its way, which includes borrowing less, slowing or postponing building projects, or dipping into the state's appropriated funds.

"It really is premature for us at the Amherst campus to be talking about how [the national crisis] may affect us at this point," said Blaguszewski. "But it's no secret that if the credit markets remain tight everybody will be affected here."

Despite the economy's bleak outlook, UMass and its new chancellor are gathering their forces to deal with budget cuts.

"Chancellor Holub and budget officials at UMass Amherst have been preparing plans to work through financial difficulties," said Blaguszewski. "These include pending mid-year cuts in UMass Amherst's state appropriation of $227.3 million, and the challenges we face in financing the campus' building program amid the international credit crisis."

"While it is still uncertain exactly what impact events will have on our finances, we will make choices focused on the long-term interest of the University and our pursuit of excellence," he continued.

In addition, to the state and national financial crises, question one eliminating the state income tax, placed on the ballot bill threatens to violently shrink the University systems' budgets if passed next month.

"Question one on the ballot would eliminate the state income tax," said UMass Amherst spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "Clearly that would have a very damaging effect on the University's finances and we would have to consider very deep cuts and fee increases going forward."

"I think [question one] is related of course because everybody is concerned about their finances and proponents of the state income taxes are making their case. We certainly support that [the income tax] is money well invested for the future of the Commonwealth and in today and tomorrow's young people and their economic opportunity," continued Blaguszewski. "But people are making this decision in a difficult economic climate."

AmherstWire, a student-run online news magazine, created a set of videos interviewing UMass economics professors who shared their interpretations of the financial crisis and its trickle down effect into the state economy.

"The result [of the national crisis] is less money goes to the state of Massachusetts as well as the other 49 states," said economics professor Richard Wolff in the video interview. "What does the state of Massachusetts do with the tax money? It supports the University of Massachusetts and if it gets less taxes we're going to get less money.

"Less money for scholarships, less money to hire TAs, less money to pay the professors, less money to maintain the buildings, charging more fees, charging more costs…all the thousands of little ways the University – caught up in this system – is going to be squeezed," Wolff continued. "University students are going to be pressured to make more payments while they get less services."

As for the crises effects on financial aid, University administrators are optimistic, intending on working hard to keep their availability.

"Until we know the dimension of [the budget cuts], those dimensions will obviously determine the steps that we take," said Connolly.

"Tough times are where you have to continue to make investments in the right places and certainly there are a lot of things that the University does to spur the economy and touch people's lives in positive ways. The fiscal outlook overall is pretty challenging but financial aid is one of those areas where you have to invest in … Intelligence, education and innovation are our basic economic raw materials."

Financial aid has experienced great growth over the past few years, which is something the University aims to continue despite the state cuts.

During the previous fiscal year, 2007-2008, the University system saw $473 million in all forms of financial aid, up from $229 million in FY 2002-2003, according to Connolly.

As for student loans, the UMass outlook remains skeptical and uncertain, since the national crisis is severely effecting borrowing ability.

"How [the credit markets' state] may affect student loans going forward is unclear," said Blaguszewski. "We had an issue early this year with the Massachusetts Higher Education loan board and their inability to arrange financing for the fall semester. UMass Amherst managed to provide alternate ways for people to get their loans and that didn't turn out to be a significant problem. Again, we're okay on that front now, but we'll need to monitor that."

Some UMass students didn't feel as though it affected them, except on the prices of the products they've been buying. But others said they don't feel their toes dipped in the crisis just yet because other than college, they have relatively no ties to the financial market.

"I'm not completely financially independent yet," said senior, biochemistry major Nicole Zarba. "I don't own a house I don't have kids. I'm still free floating, just renting apartments for a little while. I feel like if I was owning a house and stuff I would be more concerned about it and more worried about where the economy is going to go. But maybe when I'm actually at that point in my life I'll have something to worry about."

Kate Olesin can be reached at kolesin@dailycollegian.com

With Gov. Deval Patrick passing legislation to cut budgets, and the pending Question 1 to eliminate income tax in Massachusetts, UMass may be forced to cut back financially.

HIV epidemic increasing in the US, according to CDCP

By Tiffany Gibson
Southern Middle Tennessee State U.

An August study by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention found that HIV is spreading faster in the United States than expected, resulting in 56,300 new cases a year.

Kevin Lawson, testing and training coordinator for Nashville Cares, said that young people from the ages 24 and under make up half of these cases.

"They can be straight, gay, white or black," Lawson said. "We're talking about 27,000 young people every year becoming infected with HIV."

Lawson said that the CDC now requires everyone between the ages of 13 and 64 must get an HIV test once a year as part of their routine health care.

"This is to help us decrease stigma around HIV testing, and find 250,000 Americans who are currently living with HIV, and don't know it," Lawson said.

Even though anyone is capable of catching HIV, there has been an increase in the number of women that have contracted the disease.

"Black females account for more cases than white females," Lawson said. "[But] women still account for a little less than half of the [56,300] cases."

Black women are nearly 15 times as likely to be infected with HIV as white women, and Hispanic women are four times as likely to be infected as white women, the CDC study said.

The study also found that black men are six times more likely to become infected as white men, and are nearly three times more likely as Hispanic men.

Lawson said that the reason for these statistics is because there are more viruses in the black community because people who are infected are spreading the disease to others.

With the majority of young adults from the ages 24 and under attending universities, HIV testing has become a necessity to health services on college campuses.

Middle Tennessee State University's Student Health Services offers several kinds of sexually transmitted disease tests, including HIV.

A rapid HIV test, which consists of a finger prick and blood sample, allows students to see their results within 15 minutes.

Since this is a preliminary test, if a negative reading appears, a serum HIV test will be given to the student for an additional charge of $16.

A serum HIV test involves taking a blood sample and sending it off to a lab to be processed.

"Anyone who is sexually active should get tested every six months," said Allison Neal, senior anthropology major.

Student Health Services also offer an STD panel test for $60, which checks for H.I.V., hepatitis C, hepatitis B and syphilis.

"We see very few positive results, but that's not to say we don't have them, because we do," said Pat Spangler, medical director for Student Health Services.

Spangler said that the problem is that young people don't hear about HIV now as much as they used to.

"When it first came out, everybody was scared to death, because we didn't have treatment for it," Spangler said. "In the '80s, it was a death sentence, because anyone who contracted the disease was dead within two or three years."

"Now you hear about famous people like Magic Johnson who have had HIV for over 10 years, and people think it's not a big deal," Spangler said.

Lawson said that people fail to realize that the treatment for HIV doesn't work on everyone.

"We've only had these drugs for 10 or 12 years, and we don't know their long-term effects," Lawson said. "We don't know if they'll stop working soon or if they'll do more damage to the body."

In order to educate students, Student Health Services and Nashville Cares have teamed up in previous years to hold HIV awareness days, which allowed students to be tested for free. Students also obtained information and pamphlets on how to protect themselves from HIV and STDs.

Rod Washington, freshman graphic design major, said he thinks that by having HIV testing on campus, it will make it more accessible to students.

Spangler said he wasn't sure what events are going to take place this year, but with a new Health Educator joining the Health Services staff this month, he said he hopes to branch out and do more things to inform students.

Croc killing in U. Miami

By Chelsea Kate Isaacs and Sarah Marshak-Pilchick
The Miami Hurricane/U. Miami

An eight-to-ten foot long endangered American crocodile was found headless and tailless in a canal on the University of Miami's campus on Wednesday. While the investigation of the brutal killing is ongoing, students and investigators alike speculate about who committed the act and what their motive could have been.

A mesh bag with fishing chum discovered on the canal bank, located next to UM's Flipse Building – where the University of Miami Police Department and the department of Parking and Transportation are – suggests the crocodile was lured to its death, then its head and tail were severed off with a weapon that has not yet been found, said Officer Jorge Pino of the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission.

"It could have been someone that just wanted to do this as a prank or someone who needed the animal for food," Pino said. "There's nothing that would indicate that the animal was shot."

"We don't have a suspect at this time," said Carol Pratt of the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission. "Crocodiles are rare so maybe someone thought it would be a great trophy, but they would be so restricted in what they can do with the parts [of the body] since American Crocodiles are endangered and it is illegal to kill them or possess any part of them."

An individual seeking the parts of an American Crocodile would be able to find the animals throughout South Florida, South America and Central America, said Pratt. With just three American Crocodiles on the University of Miami's campus, many students wonder why the perpetrator chose an enclosed community such as UM.

Pino was unable to specify the exact time that the incident occurred.

About ten offices are located on the ground level of the Flipse Building, with large windows directly facing the location in which the crocodile carcass was discovered by a university service worker. The offices are shared by UMPD and Parking and Transportation employees, who typically end their shifts at about 5 p.m. on weekdays. If the crocodile had been murdered in the middle of the night, those employees would not have been working in offices to witness the incident. The only area of the Police Department that remains open at night is the dispatch office, located at the entrance of the building.

"There's no surveillance on the Flipse Building [facing the canal]," Pino said.

University officials from the department of Student Affairs and UMPD refused to comment about what university department is responsible for funding the installation of surveillance cameras and implementation of security measures on campus.

There are apparently security cameras on the southeast corner of the Dickinson-West lot, southwest by Hecht Residential College, on the Ceramics Building facing Dickinson Drive and Ponce de Leon Boulevard. The university would not comment on the functionality or role of the cameras in the investigation.

Santeria, a religion that combines elements of African and Catholic beliefs and whose followers historically participate in animal sacrifices, does not seem to be involved in the crocodile slaying said Michelle Gonzalez Maldonado, an assistant professor of Religious Studies. There are approximately 60 botanicas catering to the needs of Santeria followers in the greater Miami area, according to Cubanexile.com.

"The incident with the crocodile on UM's campus has absolutely nothing to do with Santeria or Voodoo," Maldonado told The Miami Hurricane in an e-mail. "Animal sacrifice in these religions is a sacred act, one that brings you closer to the divine, and is always performed in a ritual setting. In addition, authentic practitioners of these religions would never abandon the body of an animal intended for sacrifice in this manner. The animal, as part of the ritual, is considered a sacred object."

Safe sex?

Greg Collins

"To the left, you will see the Student Union, representing one of the most vibrant and diverse student bodies in the country. On the right, you will see, uh, a collection of tents organized by Trojan Condom, an aspect of UMass Amherst's comprehensive safe sex education program."

I could just imagine what tour guides were thinking of saying as I saw them lead prospective UMass students around campus last Wednesday. This was on the same day that the popular condom company, Trojan Condom, parked an 18-wheeler in the middle of the library lawn, with its huge company logo capable of being seen from far away. Trojan Condom set up tents on the grass, where bananas representing penises and condoms were in plain sight of passers-by, including tour groups.

This display, authorized by UMass Health Services and the administration, was deeply offensive. Sex is a topic best left to be discussed in private environments, such as between children and parents, patients and doctors, and clergymen and church-goers.

Why? First and foremost, sex is a serious act with serious consequences for those who do it irresponsibly and for those future human beings who will be born as a result from this irresponsibility. It goes without saying that the possible consequences not only include contracting venereal diseases, but they also include being forced to quit school in order to support a child and having to raise a baby in a fatherless household.

Given these realities, the question begs – does modern-day safe sex education, including public school teaching of contraceptive usage, university promotion of public condom displays and the general portrayal of sex in a light-hearted manner, actually work? That is, have out of wedlock births and STDs decreased due to safe sex education? In general, do teenagers and college students make more responsible sexual decisions after being exposed to comprehensive sex education?

I have issued the challenge in the past to University Health Services and VOX, Students For Choice on campus, to reveal data demonstrating that modern day safe sex-ed has a direct impact on the reduction of STDs and out of wedlock births.

I am still waiting to hear definitive, empirical results proving this to be true.

Sex is a topic best left to be discussed in private environments, such as between children and their parents, patients and their doctors, and clergymen and their church-goers.

However, empirical results from 1950-1960 show something completely contrary to the conventional wisdom that safe sex education actually produces safer sex. The rate of venereal diseases and teenage pregnancies had been going down for years before the introduction of modern day sex education during the Sexual Revolution in the mid-to-late 1960s. For instance, syphilis infections in 1960 were half of what they were in 1950.

Following the implementation of modern safe sex education, STDs and out of wedlock births increased rapidly. Do not be fooled by people who say that this correlation does not equal causation. The message encouraged by this form of sex education – sex is fun, sex is casual, sex is fine as long as you use contraceptives, which will be readily provided to you – directly contributed to the increased rate of venereal diseases and teenage pregnancies.

This is where the biggest problem manifests itself. Members from VOX, the Not So Ready For Bedtime Players, Health Services and the UMass Administration have no incentive to seriously reconsider the effectiveness of modern safe sex education because they do not feel the direct consequences of sexually undisciplined cultures in a bubble like UMass.

Until they have lived in an inner city and experienced first-hand what happens when a culture sees sex as casual, pleasurable and fun – the very same message propagated by such groups – they will never truly realize the detrimental effects of the modern-day safe sex mindset and culture.

It's a mindset and culture that results in two-thirds of black children being born out of wedlock. It's a mindset and culture which prioritizes hedonism over education. It's a mindset and culture which prevents children from being nurtured in two-parent households.

If these groups really want to promote safe sex education, they should tutor teenage mothers in Holyoke and Boston. They should help children born out of wedlock in applying for college. By doing this, they would allow the very people who claim to promote safe sex to see the damaging consequences of perceiving sex as a pleasurable act in a light-hearted manner, as well as the incentive structures of government welfare programs which encourage such promiscuity. This will make the ramifications of sexual irresponsibility much more receptive to college students than banana skits and Trojan Condom tents.

Until safe sex promoters change their practices to be more in-line with this sort of education, they will be harming a group of powerless people who suffer the most from modern day sex education – born and unborn children alike.

Predicting question 2 to go up in smoke

Scott Harris

On this campus, the legal status of marijuana is apparently a hot-button issue. I have been solicited by hippies when I enter the Worcester Dining Commons virtually every night for the past two weeks seeking to persuade me that Question 2 – a ballot question which decriminalizes the possession and usage of small amounts of marijuana – should have my "yes" vote.

I wish I owned a shirt that said "I am not registered to vote in Massachusetts," and I try to look at the ground so they leave me alone, but you cannot avoid them. They are like chicken pox.

To be honest, I had never really known marijuana to be an issue that stokes people's fury. After all, if you think marijuana should be legal and you have a right to smoke it, chances are you are already doing so regardless of what "the man" has to say about it. It also occurs to me that Question 2 is going to fail and fail miserably. Those people who annoy me when I am trying to eat might just be the reason why.

In 2008 alone, more than 700,000 jobs have been lost around the country. The number of people who are employed earn less than what the government considers to be in poverty has jumped from 11.2 percent in 2001 to 14.5 percent in 2007 primarily because the cost of food and gas have skyrocketed over the past couple of years.

There are 51 million Americans without healthcare. 14 million of which are children. While all of this is going on, our country is 10.4 trillion dollars in debt and just gifted 700 billion more dollars that our national treasury does not have to the richest people in the country.

Don't forget we're fighting two wars. Education, energy, foreign affairs, taxes, immigration, marijuana – which one of these things does not belong?

After all, if you think marijuana should be legal and you have a right to smoke it, chances are you are already doing so regardless of what "the man" has to say about it.

In this election, the youth vote can prove absolutely pivotal in helping to elect either Barack Obama or John McCain. If you are a young voter, chances are you skew favorably toward Obama. If you get to the polls, you'll help him win. If you stay home, you help McCain win. While the pitiful young mantra of "my vote doesn't count" or "my vote won't change the result" still reigns supreme with the anti-Man.

The truth is that it would only take a small movement in the youth's share of the electorate to swing the election either way. In 2004, youth voters made up 12.6 percent of the national electorate. Gallup, one of the most respected pollsters, has two different models for projecting the race for the White House in 2008.

If the national share of youth voting increases from 12.6 percent to 13.6 percent, Barack Obama is virtually guaranteed wins in Ohio, Florida, Nevada and Virginia. If it stays flat, Barack Obama wins none of them.

Which result are you more comfortable with?

The fact that it took marijuana to get college students active around campus is a little disconcerting when you consider how much is at stake in this election for people of our generation. I think I am used to that. Hippies are hippies, and hippies only care when you take away their drugs and restaurant menus for late-night ordering.

So, what do I think about Question 2? If I was a Massachusetts voter, I would probably vote for it. Like I said above, people who want to smoke pot are smoking pot so maybe it would be better for the UMass Police to stop the rising rates of crime on campus than bust people for having a good time in their own personal space.

I mean, I have the freedom to be a conservative, which has proven to be far more harmful to this country than pot has ever been. So, if that's not illegal than marijuana shouldn't be either. Now, if you are dumb enough to actually get caught, then you deserve the fine. Otherwise, just leave the hippies alone is what I say.

When the ballot question goes down in flames, I can return to my normal, hippie-free life when I could enter the Worcester Dining Commons without having to explain why "it's, like, about freedom man," is not an effective way to persuade a voter to your side of an issue.

For now, I think I will bask in the endless laughter of flustering them by repeatedly claiming that science has reached a consensus on pot as a gateway drug and its effects being ten times more harmful than cigarettes.

Breaking the mold

Eli Gottlieb

I'm warning you, my readers, that I will probably attempt and fail to think deep thoughts. The coming of the Jewish High Holy Days, roughly a week straight of contemplating whether I've been a good person before God this past year, always put me in a gray mood.

Not to worry, however. Rather than spill my sins on the page, I'm here to tell you yours.

Well, actually, what I'm going to tell you is what technically isn't a sin but should be.

I want to tell you, my readers, of an ill in our society that is bizarre in its sheer profundity – so ubiquitous that many have mistaken it for human nature. I myself have only a very little first-hand information to tell me it isn't. Here is the revelation – our society, culture or nature has nearly no tolerance at all for diversity.

Now that I've gotten every member of the ALANA Caucus jumping up and down in agreement with me, I can explain precisely what I mean. I do not mean diversity of race, sex, class or any other factor outside of a person's control. Our society is well-known as one of the most tolerant on earth concerning those factors. Our profound flaw shows up as a lack of diversity in personalities.

Try the following experiment:

As you walk down the street, perhaps to class or to get a meal, attempt to identify people their stereotypes or snatches of conversation. A few extremely obvious groups emerge easily – members of Greek organizations, followers of different religions and athletes. Now begin looking a little deeper at every single person you pass or meet. Look for repeating patterns and you will find them. Sometimes you don't even have to look – sometimes you just see four people walk down the street with one outfit and two personalities between all of them.

I don't know what everyone else feels about this phenomenon, but it sickens and terrifies me. I don't even understand why it does. I simply have an instinctive revulsion towards even the slightest uniformity in human beings. But this horrifying illness of our kind expands outwards from the individual.

Even once we leave dorm life, people choose to live in dwellings built to extremely similar specifications despite the relative cheapness and ease of producing designs that at least appear different.

One only has to vary a small number of things in a small number of ways – a dozen variables with a dozen possibilities each, for example – to produce a large enough variety of clothing, dwellings, vehicles or tools that affect the image each person projects outwards to the world could that could appear profoundly unique, and yet we do not even try for this.

We somehow yearn to give up individuality and difference for the easy life of an ant like all other ants.

Once I lived in a town where the local developers had attempted to fix this commonality. I genuinely never learned that each house was a permutation of a template until I asked about the "custom" designs. Once I moved away from there I never saw even such pseudo-uniqueness again – just the continuous and creepy repetition.

Instead it appears we endeavor towards things that are uniform. We participate in activities that impose a group identity on us. We clothe ourselves according to these group identities, we listen to music based on them and we even vote based upon them. We automatically dislike the things our group dislikes – witness the senseless tribal hatred of Red Sox fans for the Yankees and their fans.

We somehow yearn to give up individuality and difference for the easy life of an ant like all other ants. However, the formative things that give us such powerful identities are stupid and arbitrary – as little as where we live or what friends we made in early childhood. Why can't we live as individuals?

I, personally, refuse to believe that this blight arises from some mythical "human nature" or that – even if it does – we can't fix it. We fix or suppress a thousand things reported to be a part of "human nature" every day, generally through measures known as "civility" or "common sense." It's the reason I haven't had to go kill a deer for my lunch today or kill a man for my wife today.

Surely we've got it in us to stop thinking as a "we" and begin thinking as an "I." Surely a person can wake up in the morning, put on clothes that they like, speak the thoughts they've always wondered if others think, listen to the music and speakers that speak to them uniquely, make the friends that like them uniquely, and, in the end, be the person whose God-given identity and evolution-given genetic code are unlike any others in the world.

The High Holy Day season has put me in the mood to make a religious proscription that the ancient sages missed, perhaps because they could not fathom the possibility of its necessity. You will not make yourself in the image of another person. That is abomination.

You're so vain, you probably think this column is about you

Tina Ortiz

College campuses across the nation are swarmed with a rampant infestation. Worse than rodents and more deplorable than roaches, the most common pest to plague any college campus is the cheater. Not the "I'll sell you my test from last semester" cheater, oh no he's okay in my book. But the "I promise to be faithful to you while I'm abroad for a month" cheater.

If you aren't one yourself, chances are someone you are close with is. They adhere to a repulsively unethical set of moral standards. With the divorce rates at monumental highs in comparison to past years, I fear that a savage species of disloyal humans are multiplying. The once strong voice of morality that I thought was internalized by the majority seems to be muted in many people of the college-age demographic.

Technological advancements in communication and large arenas are opening up for cheaters to do their despicable work. Infidelity can now come in many forms whether it is texting, iChatting, or the numerous ways Facebook facilitates the destruction of relationships. College-aged students are at a very critical time in their identity development and should be aware that experiences with romantic relationships quite often have a lasting impact in adult life.

Is it that once a cheater always a cheater? I'm notably bitter, but not willing to resign my belief in repentance just quite yet.

Being a better person and learning from past mistakes is admirable and holds a significant amount of respect in my opinion and the opposite is true. Those who cheat then realize that they've hurt someone and still cheat not only show signs of early sociopathology, but more importantly lie to at a substantial risk. Relationships don't seem to be worth it anymore. A guy or girl with traditional views has no place on a college campus flooded by those who drown their values in 30 racks.

It seems that the only way to avoid all of this unnecessary heartache is to stay clear of college relationships entirely. Even if you do choose to be single and not cheat, aren't worthy of forgiveness.

Even if you do choose to be single and not cheat, you can never really be sure that you aren't with someone else who has a dirty little secret.

In times of weakness I admittedly find dark solace in the fact that those who choose to live a life of promiscuity and disloyalty put themselves at greater risk of catching a plethora of infections and diseases - a kick in the crotch from karma herself if you will.

Although condoms are useful, HPV, a disease that can cause cancer and infertility in women is a virus that can be transferred even when using a condom, and infects 75 percent of sexually active people. So cheaters beware, that one night stand in Salamanca may just follow you for the rest of your life.

Cheaters are dirty and put the innocent people that they you can never really be sure that you aren't with someone else who has a dirty little secret.

Is it too much to ask loyalty and respect from one another?

From an evolutionary perspective, it seems that those who cheat are merely acting out some ill-fated genetic disposition. In that light, it would make sense to mate with as many people as possible. After all, sexual monogamy is one of the rarest behavioral traits in all animals. Maybe those like me who expect different are fighting and loosing in an evolutionary battle.

I'm reasonable, and don't believe that once you become official with someone that all attraction to others comes to a halt. You can't help who you are attracted to. Being in a relationship doesn't mean seeing the world through some non-sexual lens, but rather making an internal choice to be a part of someone else's life in a unique way.

When you cheat, you make an internal choice to violate that promise in spite of its obvious emotional consequences. When the dust settles, it's indisputable that cheating is always wrong and those who make decisions to do so owe it to themselves to do some significant soul searching. Hurting others in pursuit of personal pleasure is selfish and shows weakness of character.

Although I find little room in my heart for sympathy for those who cheat, I've seen first hand the trust issues that develop ironically enough in the cheaters themselves. The moral dissonance that comes with cheating creates a suspicion that everyone you meet is just as untrustworthy as you are – so you cheat more thus perpetuating an ugly habit.

Face it. When we're all old, all the Botox and Viagra in the world won't ignite our ancient libidos and what's really going to matter is how you used your time on this earth. So when the sky's open up and you find yourself face to face with your maker, you want to be able to say that you spent your life loving others and didn't waste it being an untrustworthy coward.

Slim and Eagles land

Group brings folk sounds to Iron Horse Music Hall

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Langhorne Slim needed a mythology.

Slim, who will perform at the Iron Horse Music Hall tomorrow, entered into a precedent when he started playing his blue-infused folk rock, popular form of a genre rooted in tall-tales and anonymously-penned ballads of grossly over exaggerated feats of strength.

A mythology is mandatory.

There were more stories for how Leadbelly got his name than there were songs in his repertoire. Woody Guthrie's biography is as entertaining as the ballads he wrote – spur of the moment – that can be found by the scores in the Library of Congress. Bob Dylan hijacked the first name of a Welsh poet and lied to anyone who asked him about it for decades.

But in an age where legal names can be found on the internet and the life of the ramblin' man must be buttressed by a couple grand in gas money, a mythology is hard to come by.

Sometimes you have to do it yourself.

"I was patiently waiting for somebody to give me a nickname that I thought suited me," Slim told NPR in May. "The truth of it is, when I was young, I really wanted to be a black blues singer, and it's taken me up to 27 [years] to realize that's not gonna' happen for me."

Slim, formerly Sean Scolnick, named himself after his hometown in Pennsylvania.

"I just thought it just sounded cool and sort of fit in the tradition of the music I was listening to at the time," he said.

His songs are often peopled with folksy love interests like "Mary" (who is "sweeter than corn on the cob") and "Loretta Lee Jones," often pursued by first-person wanderlusts with a tendency to overindulge.

"I packed a picnic lacking seriously on food/had more wine than I knew what with to do," he sings in "Restless," off his self-titled album released this April.

Slim's music also focuses more on the simpler pleasures in life. In "Diamonds and Gold" also off "Restless," he warns, "you can have all the diamonds/and all the gold/but someday you're still gonna' get old/gotta learn to get happy along the way."

But Slim told the Nashville Scene in September that his message applies more to himself than anyone else.

"I'm not preaching to anybody, I'm talking to myself," he said. "That's really for me to figure out to be in the moment a little bit more, and appreciate what's going on when it's going on."

Slim and the War Eagles will be stopping off in Northampton before embarking on a European tour at the end of October, promoting the April release of his self-titled album, which was actually recorded in 2006 and slated for release the following year. Unfortunately for Slim, his label, V2 Records, folded before the release and the album was put off until he could find a new label.

Slim found a home in New York-based Kemado Records and released his eponymous album this year.

The energetic folk singer has crafted an image as folkie as his pseudonym. His upper-arm is adorned with a nautical anchor and his trademark pork-pie hat would seem glued to his head if it didn't have a tendency to fall off when he hammers too vigorously at his acoustic guitar.

It's all a part of the mythology. He plays hard. He breaks strings. He sings about booze and lost lovers and being on the road. The War Eagles smoke cigarettes during and between songs.

And their instruments look as battered as Slim's boots.

Slim will bring his mythology and the War Eagles, which consists of Paul Defiglia on the upright bass and Malachi DeLorenzo on drums, to Northampton tomorrow. Slim and the War Eagles will be headlining a show with indie-blues band the Heartless Bastards and the all-female folk trio Those Darlins.

Creator tells all about show

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

If you don't find jokes about humping robots, monkeys with AIDS or the violent dismemberment of what looks like your childhood toy collection funny, then Cartoon Network's "Robot Chicken" is not for you.

Despite all this, "Robot Chicken" is still going strong and winning Emmy awards after three seasons.

This might come as a surprise, as the controversial, stop-motion, sketch-comedy series isn't what one would call sophisticated.

Their Emmy is for its intricate animation techniques, as the show points out after a two minute sketch in which two characters take turns farting on each other.

The 25 episode season, which originally aired in two installments, will be available to own on DVD today.

The show's 10 minute running time has become TV gold in the age of the YouTube video with skits running no longer than the stint of a TV commercial.

It's a fitting comparison considering that the show started out as a web project.

The brainchild of Seth Green and Matt Senreich began comprising animated shorts in 2000, released online under the name "Sweet J Presents."

The two eventually pitched the idea of a series to Cartoon Network, but co-creator Matt Senreich explained in an interview that the studios weren't so crazy about the name.

"They didn't like 'Sweet J Presents,' so we submitted over 60 titles to the network and they all got rejected," Seinrich says.

"'Robot Chicken' was a name we got from a local Chinese restaurant menu and we loved it. Then we realized we screwed ourselves because then we'd have to come up with a reason for the show name," Seinrich said.

While the show may seem juvenile due to the intense animation process, much effort goes into the scene behind the camera. The show utilizes a painstaking animation technique, which is called "stop motion animation."

The technique has been used in such classics as "Wallace and Gromit," "A Nightmare before Christmas" and "Gumby."

It involves manipulating a stationary object to seem as if it's moving on its own, a process that used to be done by hand and can now be executed with computer software.

Classic cartoon characters are mutilated while the show puts pop culture in a blender as segments about Smurf villages turn into jokes about Hurricane Katrina.

Senreich explains just how some of these ideas get through the writing process, one that involves a round table meeting of comedic mad scientists including himself, Seth Green and their two head writers.

These ideas then need to be approved in a 3-1 vote or they are confined to the cutting room floor.

"We try to justify why we don't like a skit, but at the end of the day, it's just people with a different sense of humor," Senreich says. "And we hope our sense of humor is the same as everyone else's out there."

Once these ideas are cleared, they are placed on index cards with an average episode rendering fifteen unfiltered ideas.

From there, decisions are made based on the amount of figures needed to be produced for the sketch. This includes the amount of toys, sets and original hand sculpts needed to be made and ordered.

This process is fitting for Senreich, a self-described "geek," who began working for Marvel comics at age fifteen.

He is proud to tap into the "geek culture" by representing his upbringing while he "plays with toys for a living."

It also allows Senreich to personally meet some of his own heroes.

The show has had a wide variety of marquee celebrity guests including George Lucas and Senreich's personal favorite pair, Burt Reynolds and Dom DeLuise.

Speaking on behalf of his show's success, Senreich is grateful for all of its achievements and remains modest.

"It's become a running joke that at the beginning of every season, we're going to be canceled and we're renewed," Seinrich said. "I'm just hoping it won't be now so Cartoon Network can keep paying my bills for longer."

Seinrich believes the show will have lasting success like that of "The Simpsons."

"We're just gonna keep working on it as long as we can, and we're not bored," Seinrich said. "Right now, we're just having a lot of fun doing it. In a perfect world, maybe it turns into a 'Saturday Night Live' that is around for a really long time, with different people coming in. But for right now, we've got to enjoy it."

Fashion hits London

Staff select their favorites from British fashion week

By Rebecca Babin and Emma Lieverdes
Arts Staff

(Editor's note: This is the second article in a continuing series about fashion.)

London is famous for more than just inclement weather. It is also home to some amazing and innovative designers.

Londoners are some of the most fashionably and impeccably dressed people in the world (sweat pants aren't even on their radar), so it is only natural that the city is home to the second of four major fashion weeks.

The rainy city's week of fashion is the smallest in the month process of the spring-summer season to come, but nevertheless it delivered some wonderful collections.

Christopher Kane

For a young designer who has ascended the fashion ladder from Central Saint Martin's student to innovative designer, Christopher Kane certainly met the mark with his spring-summer 2009 collection.

Kane's collection was at once both futuristic and primitive.

Indeed, the collection seemed something that a more grotesquely sophisticated Pebble Flintstone would have donned before clambering onto the back of some prehistoric creature.

Playing with colors from red to mustard, with some splashes of citrus, black and green, Kane used a palette that brings to mind fire and earth, two elements that primeval men once had to conquer.

Leopard-print tops and towering, strappy platform heels were the order of the day, while leather skirts and mini dresses were adorned with three-dimensional half circles, harking back to the palettes of Kane's fall collection last March.

The collection was geometric, but kept with the ancient theme. In one case, a dress was splashed across the chest with a giant gorilla's face.

Kane managed to dress his women for many occasions, from separates to little dresses to skinny pants and a flowing top, all ornamented with the sculptural, scalloped three-dimensional circles. Overall, Kane created a contemporary yet wearable (outsized gorilla faces aside) line for the spring.

Sinha-Stanic

Fina Sinha and Alsander Stanic's (Sinha-Stanic) spring collection was comprised of two very contrasting themes: the teddy girls of the fifties and natural disasters.

The Teddy Boys of the 1950s were a British subculture movement, characterized by their sharp, tailored way of dressing and slickly coiffed hair. Think Kenickie in "Grease." Their girlfriends, or "teddy girls," were invoked in Sinha-Stanic's line, with killer skinny pants, sharp sleeveless jackets and crisp white button-downs.

On the other hand, pieces that reflected nature's wrath came in the shape of smart dresses and separates in black, depicting conceptual lava, water and palm trees.

The collection began innocently enough, with gentle colors of baby pink and soft chartreuse. As the show wore on, the general concept became progressively more anxious and dark. Hot pink jackets clashed with orange pants, and the entire air of natural disaster turned the show from a bit nostalgic to far more sinister.

In general, Sinha-Stanic's spring-summer 2009 show was a lean step up from the overdone collection of last fall.

Topshop Unique

Topshop Unique is always an interesting collection, not only for its fun styles but also for its affordability. While most designer duds go for hundreds or even thousands of dollars a pop, Topshop Unique offers more reasonably priced clothes, if you can get your hands on them.

Fortunately for the United States, the British brand and its Unique label are going international with a new flagship store opening next spring in New York City.

Across the pond in London, the eighties were alive and well at Topshop Unique's spring show. Washed denim, heart patterns and ratty hair tied up with giant bows made the line fun, wearable and nostalgically modern.

One-piece wonders complete with built-in ripped waists were entertaining, while loud prints, baggy silhouettes and slouchy boots upped the chic factor and made the entire collection current. The oversized sweater trend that characterized the eighties showed up, and high-waist pants were commonplace.

Nothing for the authoritative woman was also present at the show, and came in the form of slightly exaggerated shoulders and younger-looking power suits.

At the helm is Karen Bonser, who made the collection into a truly youthful and energetic one. While the 1980s did not see fashion's greatest moments, the collection was translated in such a way that everything was wearable without being cheesy.

Nicole Farhi

Nicole Farhi's breezy collection was styled in true English fashion from start to finish.

The collection show began with a tea dress perfectly fitted for a woman with hips, detailed with a wide ruffle at the bottom, pockets, a narrow red and cream waist belt and painted with delicate florals – not to mention the hat festooned with a black ribbon. From that first appearance on the catwalk, the collection was attention-grabbing.

That same painted floral pattern was sprinkled throughout the show, sometimes as a pair of trousers paired with a sweet embellished cardigan, or as a long sleeve blouse paired with a yellow blazer and knee-length, cream skirt, finished off with a black bow around the neck, or even as a shorts suit, with a cap-sleeved blazer and soft pink blazer and cuffed shorts.

Her black pieces were few and far between, but were the bold and sophisticated accents that the collection needed. There was a collared shirt-dress, paired with a grey belt and soft yellow shoes that would be perfect for any occasion.

The definition of little black dress made its way down the runway, with an ever-so-slight cap sleeve, and pleats at the waist giving room for hips. Although the collection was small, fourteen looks in all, it was a show-stopper and easily one of London Fashion Week's best.

Amanda Wakeley's pieces used bright colors and bold prints.

Amanda Wakely's spring 2009 collection was creatively arranged into mini collections within the larger whole, beginning with a set in safari colors – khaki and olive green.

There were short ponchos, pocketed shirt-dresses accessorized with tan leather belts at the waist, body conscious, lightweight tank dresses, and a rolled sleeve, collared, button-front, shorts jumpsuit, paired with a structured vest and brown waist-belt. There was a summery white collection featuring both flowy and body-conscious pieces. There were one-piece bathing suits with side cut-outs showing bits of skin, knee length tight day dresses, and floor length, loose jersey-like dresses.

Next was a patterned set of tan with a red stripe that danced around the garments. A short flouncy number with ballooned sleeves showed just enough upper thigh, while hiding the hips and accenting the waist with a wide piece of red satin. This mini collection also included a chiffon, floor length, bathing suit cover and a skinny strapped dress, deep v, empire wasted dress, sure to make whoever wears it look as light as air.

This was followed by a bold orange set featuring three dresses ranging from short to long and one in between. The short and sexy orange number was embellished with bronze circles along the neckline, traveled down the center, and double as a wide belt at the waist, not to mention being paired with strappy stilettos of the same hue.

COURTESY WWD.COM

Nicole Farhi uses spring styles in her line.

Another white collection immediately succeeded – this time chiffon and flowing away from the body, embellished with metallic, mirror-like squares at the ribs or top of the dresses. Her runway show finished with a sexy deep olive dress, fit for a night on the town adorned top to bottom with the previously mentioned circles providing not only an amazing texture, but a light catching color that makes the dress sparkle and will surely to turn heads.

Classical plays for older crowd

BY DIANE HAITHMAN
LOS ANGELES TIMES

LOS ANGELES – The audience for live classical music, theater and dance is, like, dying – OMG!

They're sitting in the dark concert hall or theater, aging so fast that their gray hair will be white by intermission. And someday soon, the last of the bunch will keel over, done in by the effort of yelling "Brava!" at a plus-sized soprano.

Although performing-arts professionals don't envision the problem in such drastic terms, it's generally accepted that the audience for live performing arts is aging at an alarming rate – and, to paraphrase the prehistoric rock band Led Zeppelin, soon to buy a stairway to heaven.

But the "graying audience" theory bears examining. And many performing-arts professionals offer compelling reasons why texting an obituary for live performing arts may be highly premature.

Deborah Borda, president of Los Angeles Philharmonic Association, has heard the alarms for decades.

"When I first started in the business, they said, 'The audience is going to be all old people,'" says Borda, who was formerly executive director of New York Philharmonic and held leadership positions with orchestras in San Francisco, Detroit and St. Paul, Minn.

"But if you look at the statistics kept by the American Symphony Orchestra League, you'll see that concert attendance is up throughout the United States. And if you look at the Los Angeles Philharmonic at Walt Disney Concert Hall, we're averaging 92 percent attendance."

Borda has more reason to be thinking about youth than most: The Philharmonic recently hired Venezuelan wunderkind Gustavo Dudamel, 27, to take over as music director in 2009, replacing 50-year-old Esa-Pekka Salonen.

But who is in that growing audience at American orchestra halls?

Quite a few gray-haired folks, according to the National Endowment for the Arts.

Sunil Iyengar, the endowment's director of research, reports that in 1982, the average age of those attending a classical music performance was 40; in 2002, it was 49. A similar increase has occurred in audiences for plays and musicals, ballet and jazz concerts.

True, Iyengar adds, the median age of the general population is creeping up as well: It was 40 in 1982 and had reached 45 by 2002. Still, that average is not increasing as fast as the age of the performing arts audience.

"You are not seeing a one-to-one ratio," Iyengar says. "Even in jazz, that typically has the lowest median audience age of all the art forms – in 1982, the median age was 29, and in 2002 it was 43."

Even so, representatives of arts organizations offer compelling reasons why seeing gray hair in the audience is nothing new and not necessarily a cause for panic, because there has always been "new gray" waiting in the wings to replace the old.

"A colleague of mine says the audience isn't graying – it's always been gray," says Teresa Eyring, executive director of Theatre Communications Group, a national service organization for American nonprofit theaters.

Marc Scorca, president and chief executive of Opera America, a nonprofit service organization, grumbles that arts journalists who pontificate about the graying audience see more gray hair because they've been given the most expensive seats, the ones young adults can't afford.

"I always encourage photographers and writers to go upstairs and see who's there," Scorca says.

Scorca cites two reasons for a noticeable lack of young adults in all seats. Ticket prices can be steep – and even if they have the money, young people often don't have the time. People in their 20s, he says, are late-night clubbing or off on ski weekends. The question for them is seldom, "Dude, where's my 'Carmen'?"

Also, people in their 30s may be consumed with toddlers and careers. Highbrow entertainment doesn't get on the agenda "until someone ... gets to be in their mid-40s, when the kids are old enough to leave on their own and the knees won't take the skiing and they want to be home by 11 o'clock at night," Scorca says.

Performing-arts organizations need patrons who have the time and wherewithal to commit to subscription packages instead of the last-minute single-ticket purchases favored by younger audiences.

"It's more expensive to sell single tickets," says John Tavenner, director of marketing for Los Angeles Opera, because finding single-ticket buyers often involves display ads or radio or TV promotion instead of mailing or telemarketing to the usual subscription base.

Susan Medak, managing director of Berkeley Repertory Theatre, says that 20 years ago, busy parents were 20 to 40 years old. Now that group is age 30 to 50 – suggesting that those who are "too young" to have time for live performance are no spring chickens themselves.

Medak's theater can boast success in attracting the youth audience. For the last several years, 20 percent of Berkeley Rep's single-ticket buyers have been under 30. But being older, she says, can deepen the theater experience.

"While pop music and TV is really geared toward a specific generational moment, in theater, the older you get, the more points of entry you have to the material," she says. "You have more life experience, and, frankly, more history of seeing other work that gives you a larger context."

Medak's comment raises a notion that is less easily quantifiable than the age of the performing-arts audience: Could part of the reason for the graying audience be that tastes change with age?

Jesse Rosen, executive vice president of the League of American Orchestras, recalls a conversation he had with Salonen about the "life cycle phenomenon" that tends to affect attendance at live performances.

"He used a wine analogy, that when you're in college you drink Thunderbird at $2 a bottle, then you move up to Gallo, and when you are 40 or 50 you're ready for a nice Bordeaux," Rosen says.

There could be scientific basis to such thinking, speculates University of Southern California music professor Bryan R. Simms.

Although he disagrees with the idea that taste in the arts changes or "improves" with age, he says listening to classical music calls for a higher level of concentration than listening to pop.

"Maybe a readiness to concentrate on music, or on anything else, increases with age, hence a susceptibility to the classics," Simms says.

But Tavenner insists that it's "overly optimistic" to expect that people will develop an interest in the performing arts simply as a function of age – early exposure is still required.

"I think the bulk of the audience is not going to appear magically like that, which is why performing-arts organizations spend so much of their resources and time on education and community outreach," he says.

That suggests that the real challenge of aging audiences may be not that they die, but that they require specific marketing strategies. Audience development, Tavenner says, is not limited to the young.

"We're thrilled to be hip to 50-year-olds," he says.

Rosen says that as the world presents more entertainment options, performing-arts organizations must struggle to appeal to audiences of every age.

"With so many more avenues and opportunities for people to spend their leisure time that are a lot easier than getting up and going to a concert, we can't simply keep doing what we've been doing in the past," he says.

"There's an apocryphal story about the Boston Symphony: that up until the 1960s, they would send out a letter listing their repertoire and, based on that, they sold out their series – that was all that was necessary," Rosen says. "But we did some research five or six years ago about audience motivation that showed that today people come to a concert to be moved in some spiritual sense."

For both the young and the "new gray," Rosen says, the concert experience now has to be about something besides the music.

"They are also looking for something that is very human and personal that connects with them," Rosen says. "Being moved emotionally and spiritually, the experience of being touched by live performance – those are the messages."

Late Oscar winner remembered

BY GEOFF BOUCHER
LOS ANGELES TIMES

HOLLYWOOD – The creature creators at Stan Winston Studio specialize in Hollywood miracles – they brought dinosaurs to life for "Jurassic Park" and turned metal men into movie history with "Iron Man" and "The Terminator" – but their next trick will be their toughest. The illustrious special effects shop will try to hold onto its history even as it sheds its late founder's name and abandons his storied workshop.

Stan Winston, the four-time Oscar winner, died in June at age 62 after a seven-year battle with cancer. He was universally eulogized as one of the true wizards of Hollywood.

"The entertainment industry has lost a genius," California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said at the time, "and I lost one of my best friends." Steven Spielberg and James Cameron spoke at the funeral, and across Hollywood there was reflection on what made Winston and his shop so special. "He came to special effects from a background of acting, which informed everything," director Jon Favreau said. "It was always about performance, not just puppetry."

Winston became a brand name in Hollywood decades ago (he won his first Emmy in 1973) and his namesake studio became an industry landmark with its collection of aliens, robots and magical beasties. But now, just months after his death, neither Winston's name nor that workshop will be part of the day-to-day life of the company he left behind. All the latex masks and robotic critters have been crated up or already moved to a new facility that is more modern but also far less charming.

Stan Winston Studio will also give up the ghost; the company name is changing to Legacy Effects, which is somewhat ironic for a company pushing away so much of its history.

The real treasure of the company, though, is its talent, not its heirlooms. That's the main reason behind the name change. John Rosengrant, who started working with Winston on the set of "The Terminator" (1984), said that he and the three other partners who would lead the company forward all valued the studio's towering tradition but they had decided it would be best to take a step out of its considerable shadow.

"This was not an easy decision," Rosengrant said. "When Stan died, we lost a friend, a mentor, a teacher, an inspiration – the whole gamut. Everything he did and everything he represented, it's ingrained in us. It would be hard to do anything but 'the Stan way.'"

In the days after Winston's death, the announced intention was to rename the company the Winston Effects Group. But after weighing that idea, the partners informed the Winston family that they would go in a different direction. "We did receive the blessing of his widow, Karen, but I'm sure there was mixed emotions for the family. I know there was mixed emotions for us."

It's a delicate dance when a Hollywood company lives on after its namesake founder dies, especially if that founder happened to be an icon. It's common for companies to keep the leader's prestigious name, hence the Walt Disney Co., Warner Bros. Entertainment and – in an especially good parallel – the Jim Henson Co., founded by a master artisan of singular imagination.

All of this went through the minds of Rosengrant and the other three Legacy partners: Shane Mahan (who also began working with Winston on the first "Terminator" set), Lindsay MacGowan (a Brit who was hired while Winston was working in England on the 1986 film "Aliens") and Alan Scott (who came in during the "Terminator 2" production and now leads the shop's escalating effort in TV commercials, of which it made more than 100 last year).

"He was turning over the reins to us during 'A.I.' and 'Jurassic Park III,'" Rosengrant said, referring to two 2001 films involving Winston's close friend Spielberg. "Stan was on the set for 'A.I.' but he really turned over a lot of the duties at that point to the people here. He was passing the torch to us. He was very supportive of people finding their own successes here, and really, he will always be part of anything we do. When we get a new project, a new challenge, we all look at it through Stan's eyes."

That led to great success on "Iron Man," a triumphant meshing of practical and CGI effects. Winston was "in the room during key moments and for key decisions," according to director Favreau, but a Mahan-led team did most of the heavy lifting. Favreau has worked repeatedly with Winston, both the man and his studio, and he said that Legacy will continue to have his confidence. "I have no reservations at all. We know them and they know us, and their work is top-notch."

The last two major American movies that will have Winston Studios listed in the credits will be "Terminator Salvation" and then the Cameron-directed 3-D film "Avatar," which is fitting considering the importance of both the killer-robot franchise and its original director in the career of the late wizard.

"That," Rosengrant said, "will be a bittersweet thing for a lot of people." The Winston name will also appear on a German film called "Pandorum." After that, the Legacy era officially begins (as far as movies are concerned) with the Bollywood production "Robot" and then, if things go as expected, with "Iron Man 2" in 2010. Legacy is doing some early design work for a planned movie for "Green Lantern," the DC Comics character, and its contributions to "Grey's Anatomy" hint at a push into television series work.

Work in Hollywood is based on "delivering on what you promise and reputation and relationships," Rosengrant said. That's very true, which is why the leaders at Legacy are still fretting about trading their past for their future. "(Mahan) was talking to James Cameron and he told him about the name change. Jim thought about it and then he said that it was the right thing to do, you know, that it was fine. You got to understand, he and Stan were very, very good friends, so that meant a lot to us. Really, we were all breathing a sigh of relief."

Stan Winston, movie monster creator, died in June. Winston formulated the creatures for "Gremlins," Predator for "Predator," and Steven Spielberg's dinosaurs for "Jurassic Park."

Senior Brandice Balschmiter will anchor a strong pitching staff for UMass next year. Freshman Sara Plourde is the newest addition to the Minutewomen's pitching staff and was impressive in fall ball.

UMass sweeps UConn, Holy Cross in final fall ball series

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In preparation of defending its Atlantic 10 title, the Massachusetts softball team just concluded its fall ball schedule with four games over the weekend.

The Minutewomen took all four games, two against Holy Cross on Saturday and two against Connecticut on Sunday and learned a lot about their team, according to UMass coach Elaine Sortino.

UMass Softball

"It was great because we could see how our pitching stacked up after the summer and the work that they did," Sortino said.

Sortino was happy with the way her pitchers performed during the fall ball schedule but still knew there were things they could improve on over the winter.

As for the team's ace, Brandice Balschmiter, Sortino feels she needs to utilize her change up more.

"It's become very, very deceptive and she has got to get that moving pitch going down," Sortino said. "I think her rise ball did really well, as well."

With Bailey Sanders, Sortino feels over the winter she needs to improve on her rise ball. Sortino wants the junior to get a little more break on the ball, get it to break firmer, and then feels Sanders can be more effective.

The newest addition to the pitching staff, freshman Sara Plourde also saw time during the fall. The freshman must make adjustments from playing in high school to playing in college.

"[Plourde] got away with blowing the ball by bad hitters," Sortino said. "Hitters have better eyes [at the college level], so she has got to be able to locate her pitches and get them to spin a little bit better."

NEW FACES

Scanning the roster for the Minutewomen there are some new names that people may not recognize. The 2009 roster has six freshman, all of which impress Sortino.

Plourde is a recent addition to the pitching staff and Sortino sees her as a "mainstay" on the staff. Not only will Plourde help out Balschmiter and Sanders on the pitching staff, but she can also contribute to the team offensively.

Tawny Palmieri and Kyllie Magill have played great defensively at second base and shortstop, respectively. Palmieri has also done well at the plate and scored runs hitting from the ninth spot.

Two other new faces that will be presences in the outfield will be Jordan Storro and Stephanie Mix. Sortino called Storro a "stud" and a strong player. She also commented on Mix's speed. Both will be a big part of a great defensive outfield the Minutewomen will showcase next spring.

"This is the best outfield on a UMass team I've ever coached, the greatest outfield I've ever had," Sortino said. "I feel really good about it."

Lastly, one freshman who may have impressed her coach the most during fall ball was Katie Bettencourt.

"Betancourt must have hit .900 for us this fall, I can remember her getting out just once," Sortino said.

NEW STYLE OF OFFENSE

Where the Minutewomen depended a lot on power last year to produce runs, they may have a very different approach when it comes to next season.

"I think offensively we're going to have the opportunity this year to manufacture runs, which last year we had to kind of depend on the long ball and extra base hits," Sortino said. "I think we have a little more capability offensively and definitely more speed."

Last season UMass hit 137 extra base hits as they won the A-10 title, including 42 home runs. As a team the Minutewomen had a .451 slugging percentage.

UMass was 40-of-51 in stolen bases last year but look for them to attempt more stolen bases this year with its new-found speed. One of the threats on the bases next spring for the Minutewomen will be Mix.

"[Mix has] incredible speed, wait till we turn her loose," Sortino said. "I'm looking forward to that."

Charlotte wins first three in A-10 play, led by junior Beam

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Back-to-back Atlantic 10 women's soccer conference champions, Charlotte, have started off conference play firing on all cylinders.

After two consecutive loses, in which they were shutout against No. 16 Wake Forest (8-3, 1-2 Atlantic Coast Conference) and held to one score against Virginia Tech (6-4-2, 1-1-2 ACC), the 49ers have won their first three conference matchups. In those three games, they are averaging over five goals per game. Charlotte looks to continue its hot streak when it hosts Temple (3-5-3, 0-1-2 A-10) this Friday.

A-10 Soccer

After recording her first career hat-trick, Charlotte (7-3-1, 3-0 Atlantic 10) junior midfielder, Hailey Beam, led the 49ers to victory against St. Bonaventure (6-6, 1-3 A-10) and La Salle (5-5-2, 1-2-1 A-10). Last week she was named to Soccer Buzz's National Elite Team of the Week and earned A-10 Player of the Week honors, another first in her career.

Beam was named to Soccer Buzz's National Elite Team of the Week last season as well after being named MVP of the A-10 Tournament.

Charlotte freshman forward, Oni Bernard, was named A-10 Rookie of the Week for the second time this season, continuing the 49ers' streak of having a player receive the honor each of the last three weeks.

Bernard scored a goal and added an assist in a win against Saint Louis (5-3-3, 1-2 A-10). She has tallied a total of 15 points on the season, tying her for fourth in the conference.

RICHMOND OFF TO BEST START EVER

Though tied for second in the conference with Fordham (6-4-1, 3-1-0 A-10), Richmond has the best overall record in the A-10. The Spiders (9-2-1, 3-1 A-10) have gotten off to their best start in school history after shutting out UMass, 1-0, recording their third consecutive victory. Richmond improved their perfect record to 7-0 at home.

The Spiders travel to Pittsburgh this Friday to face Duquesne (4-3-3, 2-1-1 A-10), which has won two of its last three games.

DAYTON ON THE RISE

Dayton has quietly climbed up the conference after starting the season with a sub-par record. The Flyers' (8-3-1, 2-0-1 A-10) defense has been the reason for the turnaround in their last five games, holding opponents to a total of two scores, posting a record of 4-0-1.

URI AND XAVIER'S STRUGGLE

Xavier has had a disappointing season as they sit at the bottom of the conference. The Musketeers (1-9-1, 0-2-1 A-10) have had no offense to speak of and have suffered shut outs in half of their total games.

The same can be said of Rhode Island's offense, which has been shut out in its last four games. The Rams' (4-8-1, 0-4 A-10) chances at winning the conference now seem bleak after a promising start. Rhode Island hosts Dayton this Friday as it looks to get back to their winning ways.

NCAA WOMAN OF THE YEAR

Recently graduated Charlotte woman's soccer star, Lindsey Ozimek (2004-07), is one of the 30 candidates for the 2008 NCAA Woman of the Year award. The three-time All-Conference selection remains on the list after the original was narrowed down from 130 to just 10 from each division (I, II, III).

Ozimek led Charlotte to the 2007 A-10 title in her senior year, well-warranting her the honor of possibly receiving this prestigious award. The NCAA Committee on Women's Athletics will choose a national winner from among nine finalists, three from each division, announced next month.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Sarah Helldoerfer is tied for fourth in points for Rhode Island. The senior has started 10 games for the Rams and has five points off two goals and an assist.

Alabama holds off Kentucky

BY GREG OSTENDORF
CRIMSON WHITE FUNNELCAKE OF ALABAMA

TUSCALOOSA, Ala. – Alabama jumped out to an early 14-point first quarter lead but had to fight to hang onto a 17-14 win over Kentucky Saturday.

"This is the first opportunity for our team to actually play after they have been recognized on the national level, and that's a different kind of psychological management to handle success," head coach Nick Saban said. "I would say we didn't handle it extremely well today."

The Crimson Tide came into the game ranked No. 2, the highest ranking the team has reached since 1993. Kentucky came in undefeated but had yet to really play a formidable opponent.

Alabama got on the board first when Glen Coffee blew past the entire Wildcats defense for a 78-yard touchdown run to give the Tide an early 7-0 lead. It was Coffee's fifth touchdown on the year and his second from over 75 yards on the season.

"I only had to make one cut to get up the field, and everybody blocked for me who was supposed to block, so it was pretty easy," Coffee said.

Later in the first, Kentucky quarterback Mike Hartline dropped back on third and long, and under pressure, the ball slipped out of his hands. Rolando McClain picked it up at the four yard line and took it in for a touchdown.

"I saw the quarterback cock back, and the ball slipped out of his hands," Javier Arenas said. "I caught the ball in my hands, but I bobbled it for a second. Then [Rolando] snatched it out of my hands and scored. It was a great play on his part."

Alabama stopped Kentucky on their next drive to get the ball back and was looking to put the game away when Coffee fumbled the ball at the Wildcats six yard line.

The drive turned out to be the last scoring threat for either team in the remainder of the first half.

Alabama went into the break with a 14-0 lead as they dominated Kentucky on the stat sheet. The Tide had 253 yards in the first half while the Wildcats finished with only 60, but missed red zone opportunities kept the game close.

It was more of the same in the second half as neither offense could get anything going. The first seven drives of the third quarter resulted in either a three-and-out or a turnover.

Finally, with the crowd losing interest, Kentucky made two big plays to get in the end zone and cut the lead in half.

From his own 37, Hartline found running back Derek Locke on a slip screen that Locke took down the middle of the field for 36 yards. Kentucky ran almost the exact same play to Dicky Lyons Jr. on the next play, and Lyons took it 26 yards to the house.

After Kentucky got the ball back, the Tide needed a big play. They got it from cornerback Kareem Jackson, who jumped up and intercepted a ball underthrown by Hartline.

"I split the zone like I was supposed to, and I picked the ball off," Jackson said. "It was a big turnaround for us. It brought the momentum back because we had just turned the ball over."

From there, Alabama went back to its strength – running the football. Coffee ran the ball five straight times for 36 yards and picked up a pair of first downs.

The drive stalled when quarterback John Parker Wilson scrambled and came up just short of the first down on third-and-5. Leigh Tiffin came on to attempt a field goal, but he missed his second kick of the game to keep it a one-possession game.

Alabama got the ball back with about 10 minutes to go in the game, and they went right back to their horse, with Coffee running right through a worn down Kentucky defense.

After a series of short runs, the junior finally broke one to the outside. He took off down the sideline, but when he was tackled, the ball popped out. Kentucky couldn't find the handle on the ball before it went out of bounds, and Alabama caught a break, keeping possession.

Alabama moved inside the five but couldn't get across the goal line and had to settle for another field goal. More importantly the Tide ran off eight minutes on the clock, and this time, Leigh Tiffin made the field goal to put the game away.

Kentucky scored a late touchdown but ran out of time as Alabama hung on to remain undefeated.

Coffee was the star of the game as he rushed for 218 yards on 25 carries. It was the sixth-most rushing yards in a game for an Alabama back and the most since Shaun Alexander gained 291 yards against LSU in 1996.

Despite the career day by Coffee, he was more concerned about the two fumbles he had deep in Kentucky territory.

"The fumbles come to mind first," Coffee said. "When you fumble the ball, you affect your whole team, especially when they get the ball back. The 218 yards aside, I've got to work on the fumbles."

Alabama gets a much-needed rest with a bye week this week.

"I think once you play six games, physically, emotionally and mentally, you're players are probably tired," Saban said. "There are plenty of things we need to work on in this bye week to improve our team, but I also think our team needs some rest right now."

The Minutemen begin conference play on Sunday Oct. 12 against Rhode Island. For UMass to make the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the team's goal coming into the season, it must win six of its nine conference games.

UM set to face 2008 College Cup winner

Koch mentioned that one of the keys for the Minutemen to have success is to not allow any goals in the first 15 minutes. If UMass can survive the initial flurry of the Demon Deacons, the Minutemen will give themselves a chance to pull of an upset.

"The main thing is we have to prevent scoring in the first 15 minutes," Koch said. "They have scored a number of goals early against other teams. If we can weather the storm, so to speak, it will be a good game."

As usual, the Minutemen defense will be anchored by senior Chris Brown, who has started every possible game in his career (73 straight starts), and has been the backbone of the defense all season. It will be his responsibility to insure that the defense plays aggressive and keeps as much pressure as possible on Wake Forest.

One of Wake Forest's major strengths is team speed. They are widely recognized as having some of the fastest players in collegiate soccer and very good at maintaining control of the ball while moving at full speed. The Minutemen must not give them room to run.

"[We have] to take space away from them, we can't slow down. If we can take away the space they want to run into, then they won't be as fast," Koch said.

Wake Forest averages nearly 18 shots per game and more than half their shots are on net. Even if the Minutemen defense has an exceptionally good day, it's likely that senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons will have a busy night.

He is considered one of the top goalkeepers in the nation and he will be given the unenviable task of being UMass' last line of defense against the Demon Deacons. However, Koch did mention there is an upside to Simmons facing a lot of shots.

"All goalkeepers, the more action they get, the more they're in the game, so that's a positive," Koch said.

If the Minutemen are to pull off the upset, it will be their defense that gives them the chance.

Offense sharp in win

UMass dominates play against New Brunswick

By Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team started out its first weekend of formal practice with a 6-0 win against New Brunswick.

The Minutemen began the game a little out of sync, as New Brunswick controlled play for most of the first period. When UMass got back into the groove of playing, senior Alex Berry scored 17 minutes, 5 seconds into the first period. UMass then picked up the pace and dominated play.

The offense continued to succeed, scoring three goals in the second period and added two tallies in the third.

UMass Hockey

"We were a little on our heels in the first 10 minutes," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I thought [New Brunswick] really carried the play. They had real good stick skills and they skated fairly well, they just didn't skate with us for the entire 60 minutes."

In the exhibition game, the Minutemen showed their speed, ability to get loose pucks and their capability of transitioning the puck. The Minutemen still have things to work on, despite outplaying their opponent.

"There were certain aspects of the game - situations in the game - that we didn't read very readily, that we didn't react to or respond to, which would be a natural thing at this point," Cahoon said.

Special Teams

The Minutemen scored five of their goals using special teams, an impressive statistic for a team that began formal practices that day.

Cahoon was surprised with his team's power play and how they moved the puck around successfully in the offensive zone. With quick passes and speed, the power-play lines scored four of the team's six goals.

"Our power play and penalty kill was up to par," co-captain Cory Quirk said. "That was good for us."

UMass' fifth goal came when Scott Crowder scored 18:48 into the second period when it was a man down. The penalty kill was successful in not allowing a goal, but Cahoon still considers that a weakness.

"[The penalty kill] is one of the areas where we broke down a little bit, situation wise. We haven't spent a lot of time on killing penalties in the little ice [time] that we've had," Cahoon said. "We've got a lot to work on in that area."

Cahoon used veterans to execute the penalty kill, besides freshmen defenders Michael Marcou and Matt Irwin. Using the veterans was in the Minutemen's favor because they used what they learned in previous years to limit the number of chances for New Brunswick despite being limited in practice.

Goaltenders

Having two returning goaltenders this season continues to benefit UMass. Sophomore Paul Dainton and junior Dan Meyers split time in goal on Saturday.

"[We've] got two good goaltenders right now, and that's a great place to be. They both made good saves at critical points in the game that really helped us out," Cahoon said.

Dainton started the game and was credited with the win after playing 30:24, while Meyers was in goal for 29:36. Dainton faced 12 shots and Meyers stopped nine.

"They both push each other in practice each day and they are getting better everyday," Quirk said.

Dominant line

The forward line of left wing Berry, center Quirk and sophomore right wing James Marcou combined speed and skill to score three of UMass' goals.

The chemistry between the three forwards is evident as they worked together in Saturday's game. The forward line began playing together last year and their experience in playing together has carried over to this season.

"It is just about knowing each other. I think that helps a lot once you know who you are playing with and their tendencies and all that," Quirk said.

The Minutemen take the ice again this weekend at the Ice Breaker Tournament in Boston. They will face off against Michigan State on Friday and North Dakota on Saturday.

The Massachusetts' hockey team won its first exhibition game of the 2008-09 season, 5-0 over New Brunswick. UMass' power-play line scored four of the team's five goals.

Quarterback Chris Whitney has been a dynamic offensive threat for No. 9 Villanova. The sophomore has thrown for three touchdowns and ran for another three.

JMU runs over Hofstra, URI defeats Brown after loss to BC

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Correspondent

Looking to extend its stay as the number one team in the Football Championship Subdivision (I-AA), James Madison routed Hofstra this weekend, 56-0. For the fourth week in a row, JMU quarterback Rodney Landers rushed for over 100 yards and collected four touchdowns.

The Dukes (5-1, 3-0 Colonial Athletic Association) continued their romp by running the ball down the opposition's throat, but the Dukes also found success through the air this week. JMU's eight complete passes accounted for 96 yards but three were caught for touchdowns. The Dukes totaled 375 offensive yards.

CAA Football

At the other end of the field, Hofstra failed to cope with the superior JMU defense. Even though the Pride's (2-3, 1-1 CAA) offense possessed the ball for nearly eight minutes longer than the Dukes, they could not seem to find a leak.

Hofstra only made 1-of-15 third-down conversions and missed a field goal in their only trip to the red zone. The Pride totaled 195 yards and threw two interceptions, with one being returned for a touchdown.

James Madison will now travel this weekend to play No. 5 Richmond (4-2, 2-1 CAA), while Hofstra travels to play Bucknell (3-1).

Rhode Island rebounds

Following an unforgiving performance against No. 11 Boston College, Rhode Island bounced back, 37-13, over Brown, to get its second win of the season. The big part of this win was URI quarterback Derek Cassidy. With 298 passing yards and a career-high five touchdowns this week, Cassidy earned his first CAA Football Offensive Player of the Week award.

But the Rams' offense was the secondary effect of the impressive defensive performance. With 2-of-4 turnovers turning into offensive touchdowns, the defense set up Rhode Island for multiple opportunities to score. The Rams' special teams also proved a challenge for No. 25 Brown (2-1), as the Bears missed both of their field goal attempts, one of which was blocked.

URI will now prep itself to host Towson (2-4, 0-2 CAA) in a conference game this weekend.

Richmond rides defense

No. 6 Richmond's defense performed once again this week as it downed the Virginia Military Institute, 56-16. Although VMI (2-3) rushed for 267 yards, its passing game failed against the Spiders defense, as the Keydets did not complete a single pass and threw an interception. Richmond also converted two fumbles for touchdowns.

The Richmond offense took advantage of the weaker VMI defense and claimed 419 total yards with five rushing touchdowns. The Spiders also would score 2h unanswered points in the second half. Richmond looks to play James Madison this weekend.

Wildcats sneeks by Tribe

Although William & Mary's freshman Jonathan Grimes earned both the CAA Football Special Teams Player of the Week as well as the CAA Football Rookie of the Week, his performance wouldn't be enough to boost the Tribe to a victory. Villanova won, 38-28, with a strong offensive performance in the first half, but put up just a field goal in the second half.

William & Mary's next game will be against undefeated New Hampshire (5-0, 1-0 CAA) on Saturday and Villanova will travel to play Rhode Island.

Wake-up call

Junior Bryan Hogan has been shut down by opposing defenses, as well as the rest of the stagnant UMass offense. Hogan, last year's leading scorer, has yet to record a point this season and has been held to only eight shots.

Goalkeeper Zack Simmons and the UMass defense will have a tough test tonight when they face No. 1 Wake Forest. Simmons 1.04 goals against average will opposes Wake Forest offense which averages 3.6 goals per game.

Minutemen to face No. 1 Wake Forest prepare for A-10s

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

No matter what happens tonight in the Massachusetts men's soccer team's match against No. 1 Wake Forest it will be great preparation for Atlantic 10 conference play.

Today is one of the most talked about games on UMass' 2008 schedule. The teams are unequally matched, but they were close to playing one another in the 2007 College Cup Championship game — Wake Forest played Ohio State in the championship game after the Buckeyes beat UMass to advance to the championship round.

The Demon Deacons (10-0) are considered to be the nation's best team. The defending NCAA champions have won their last 35 non-conference games, their last 27 home games and they hope to extend their unbeaten streak dating back to last year to 16 games tonight.

"They possess the ball very well, they combine very well and are a short passing team," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "[Wake Forest has] great players, great complex, very, very good coaching staff. They play in a very good conference, they are very well supported."

This season the Demon Deacons have 36 goals, eight coming from senior Marcus Tracy. The forward has scored more goals this season than UMass has altogether. In the Atlantic Coast Conference, Tracy is ranked first in points (22) and is tied for first in game-winning goals (three).

The Deacons average 3.6 goals per game and their opponents' average .70. They have allowed seven goals this season, the same number UMass has scored.

Its top goal keeper, junior Akira Fitzgerald, has allowed five goals in his 883 minutes, 55 seconds played this season. He has made 26 saves with six shutouts. Senior Zack Simmons, notably, one of the top keepers in the nation, has held UMass to one-goal losses this season averaging 1.04 goals against (a season total of nine goals against) in his 780:36 this season.

Wake Forest routed Virginia Tech in its previous game, 8-2. Virginia Tech was the fourth team that played in the 2007 College Cup. The game proved that Wake Forest has depth in its scoring, five players scored goals — Tracy, sophomore defender Ike Opara (two goals, four on the season), junior midfielder Austin da Luz (three goals on the season), sophomore midfielder Corben Bone (three goals and eight assists this season) and junior forward Cody Arnoux (three goals against Virginia Tech, five on the season).

"I think we've got to play our best game against Wake Forest and Wake Forest has to be a little off," Koch said. "They are a fantastic team, but we're going down there to get a result, we're not going down there to get beat."

UMass is entering the game knowing that it needs to be on its game. Not only do the Minutemen need to be strong offensively and make sure they don't make mistakes, but defending as an entire team will be crucial for this game. The Minutemen will need an all-around team performance and to play hard for the entire 90 minutes. They also need to frustrate the Demon Deacons and make it difficult for them to play their game.

The Maroon and White are excited to take on tough competition that will only benefit them as they enter A-10 play this coming weekend.

"We're also focused on that we continue to improve," Koch said. "No matter what happens [tonight] it will be good for us to play against that kind of competition. It's only going to get us ready for Rhode Island [on Oct. 12]."

The Minutemen must finish on their chances, take shots from critical scoring areas and play with the intensity they had in their game against Vermont on Sept. 28. Koch has been working with his team on crosses and making sure his offense works together as a team.

Defense to be challenged against Demon Deacons

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has built its program, its philosophy and its reputation on defense. Tonight the Minutemen will have to live beyond their reputation if they hope to slow down defending national champion Wake Forest's offensive machine.

The amount of goals that the undefeated, No. 1 ranked Demon Deacons (10-0-0) has scored so far this season is impressive by soccer standards. After 10 games Wake Forest has scored 36 goals, which is an average of 3.6 goals per game. In the Demon Deacons' game last Saturday against Virginia Tech, they scored eight goals while not allowing a goal until the 75th minute in their 8-2 win. By comparison, UMass has scored seven goals this season.

"We've got to make sure that we don't make mistakes and defend really well as a team," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We are going to do a lot of defending [tonight], no question about that. We will defend a lot and look for the counter."

Wake Forest's top two offensive threats are Marcus Tracy and Corben Bone. Tracy is the team's No. 1 option. The forward has racked up eight goals alongside six assists, while Bone is an excellent set-up passer. The midfielder has tallied eight assists with three goals. However, even if the Minutemen can shut those two down, the Demon Deacons have three other players with four or more goals.

UMass has shown a stout defense up to this point in the season. It has allowed nine goals and managed to keep every game within reach. Not once have the Minutemen fallen behind by more than one goal at any point in the season. Of course, the Maroon and White have not faced an opponent with Wake Forest's goal-scoring prowess either.

See M. SOCCER on page 8

Stuart Amick and the UMass offense has managed just seven goals through eight regular season games. The sophomore did, however, tally a goal in UMass' 5-0 victory in an exhibition game this past weekend.

UM successful in exhibition, bench gets valuable experience

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The low key, no-pressure scrimmage on Saturday afternoon proved how the Massachusetts men's soccer team can play, although the competition wasn't as tough as expected.

UMass (2-4-2) beat the Winstars soccer academy, 5-0, getting goals from various Minutemen including sophomore Stuart Amick, junior Bryan Hogan (two goals) and freshman reserve Jason Villagomez (two).

"They weren't as good as I thought they were going to be, but we played really well too, especially in the first half," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We played a good game and they weren't as strong and couldn't keep up with our speed."

UMass Soccer

INCREASED CONFIDENCE

UMass has struggled to score goals, but in Saturday's scrimmage the Minutemen proved differently. They showed their ability to attack as they moved the ball quickly, made accurate passes, had good supporting runs and attacked with numbers.

"I think they allowed us to [attack with numbers], and I think we also tried to do it," Koch said.

The Minutemen can use Saturday's scrimmage as a confidence booster and a reminder that they know how to score. However, as Koch reminds his team, they can't get too excited because they are playing a completely different team on Tuesday in No. 1 Wake Forest and Sunday in its Atlantic 10 opener against Rhode Island.

This season, UMass has scored seven goals (not taking into account the exhibition game from the weekend). None of the seven goals have come from last years returning leading scorer Bryan Hogan, who is seen as a strategic finisher for the Minutemen.

In the scrimmage, Hogan reminded his team that he can score goals, but needs to continue scoring when it comes to A-10 play.

DEFENSIVE STRENGTH

The Minutemen have worked on their defense since the start of the season, and it shows, only allowing nine goals against. UMass' back four (typically senior Chris Brown, junior Stuart Thompson, junior Dan Lepone and freshman Andrew Henshawl and goalkeeper senior Zack Simmons continue to be strong as they hold teams to one goal leads.

A strong defense will be even more crucial as the Minutemen travel to North Carolina on Tuesday.

"[We have to] defend really well as a team. We're going to be doing a lot of defending on Tuesday, no question about it. We'll defend a lot, looking for the counter [attack]," Koch said.

RESERVES SHOW TALENT

As UMass entered the second half of Saturday's scrimmage many reserves got a chance to play, when they normally don't see many minutes on the field.

"I thought the guys that don't get to play as much got a lot of time and I'm pleased with the way those players played," Koch said.

Specifically Villagomez, who stood out as he scored two goals in the second half of the game.

Having a deep roster will continue to be beneficial for the Minutemen as they enter A-10 play. Taking players off the bench and having confidence in them when they take the field allows the starting lineup time to recharge.

Bill goes to Bush

Massachusetts Senator Edward Kennedy was instrumental in the passing of a bill expected to help the mentally ill.

Law to help the mentally ill

BY JESSICA SACCO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The House of Representatives passed the Mentally Ill Offender Treatment and Crime Reduction Reauthorization and Improvement Act last Wednesday. The act will help provide money to help mentally ill individuals.

Senators Edward Kennedy and Peter Domenici introduced the proposal in 2007, when Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, an original co-sponsor with Senator Arlen Specter, worked to have the bill approved by the Judiciary Committee in March. Legislation had been pending in the Senate since April.

The bill authorizes $50 million in grants to help state and local governments create or expand mental health courts as well as treatment and training programs to help address the needs of mentally ill offenders to reduce repeat offenses. An additional $10 million is authorized to teach law enforcement officers and agents to recognize and react to situations involving mentally ill individuals.

"Senator Kennedy understands that far too often individuals are arrested and subjected to the criminal justice system when what they really need is treatment and support to overcome mental illness or substance abuse disorders. His bipartisan bill provides strong federal support for helping local communities address this crisis and improve treatment outcomes for mentally ill offenders," said Anthony Coley, spokesman for Senator Kennedy. "He commends Senator Domenici for his leadership on this bill and on so many other initiatives to improve our nation's mental health system."

According to a study conducted in 2006 by the Justice of Department's Bureau of Justice Statistics, more than half of all prison and jail inmates were found to have a mental health problem. This includes 56 percent of state prisoners, 45 percent of federal prisoners and 64 percent of local jail inmates.

The findings are represented based on a survey of prison and jail inmates' recent history or symptoms of mental disorders that occurred in the last year as opposed to an official diagnosis of mental illness.

Female inmates were seen to have a higher rate of mental health problems than men. However, overall, these problems (for both men and women) were primarily associated with violence and past criminal activity.

"I have witnessed the challenges associated with mentally ill offenders who are a part of the criminal justice system, and I believe resources are necessary to help

Seymour set to resign

BY SADIE TROMBETTA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Provost Charlena Seymour, described as thoughtful, generous, and supportive, by her colleagues, recently announced that she will be resigning at the end of this academic year.

Seymour and the Department of the Provost are responsible for an array of duties concerning college deans, department heads, faculty and staff, the President's office and many areas of student life. The Provost's Office works closely with all nine colleges, the Commonwealth College, the chancellor, the Faculty Senate and the Director of Libraries.

Seymour's co-worker, Associate Provost for Faculty Recruitment and Retention, Andrew Effrat, said that the Provost Office is "the heart and soul of the academic enterprise" here at UMass.

Seymour will leave at the end of this academic year. According to the Chancellor's Office, a committee will be formed to find a replacement. The committee with be composed of broad representation from all around campus. "In doing so", the official e-mail sent out to all students said, "we not only honor Charlena, but we can build an even stronger university going forward."

Before her years of commitment to UMass, Seymour attended Howard University and received a bachelor's degree in fine art, followed by her masters and doctorate degrees in speech and hearing services at The Ohio State University.

Seymour also has a long history with the University of Massachusetts. She came here in 1971 as an assistant professor, and by 1976 she was an associate professor, a post she held until 1989. In 1984, she became chair of the department of communication disorders until 1992. In 1994, she served as dean of Graduate School until becoming the interim provost and vice chancellor for academic affairs in 2001. After a national search, Seymour was given the permanent position of provost.

Because of her experience as a professor, Seymour maintained a connection to the students at the University. Although her job, unlike teaching, does not involve working with students directly, all of the things she does in the Provost Office affects students undergraduates and graduates alike.

Seymour's colleagues had glowing remarks for her. Effrat, who worked with her through faculty recruitment and retention, said she is "knowledgeable, accessible and energetic."

"She is a person who can see both the forest and the trees," Effrat said. "She is visionary and attendant to detail."

"She always made me feel like I worked with her – not for her," said Kathy Godek, assistant to the Provost. "We worked together as a team. She gave me opportunities that I never thought I'd ever have (meeting Bill Cosby, Maya Angelou and Tony-winning choreographer George Faison). At the end of the day, she always said 'good night' but most importantly, she always said 'thank you.' There will never be anyone else like her, and I'm so glad that I had the opportunity to work with her throughout her term as provost."

"The University is a far, far better place for her being a leader here," says Effrat. "She made a major difference for the quality of life and growth of the faculty, and to the diversity of faculty and students."

Minutemen fall 2-0 to No. 1 Wake Forest

UMass' play strong despite big challenge

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In real life, David doesn't always beat goliath, but sometimes he can put up a fight.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (2-5-2) lost to No. 1 Wake Forest (11-0-0) 2-0 in a match that was far more competitive than many expected.

Wake Forest is currently the undisputed best team in the nation, having beaten previously No. 2 Maryland, 4-2. The Demon Deacons had been riding a 27-game home winning streak, a 16-game overall winning streak, and led all Division 1 teams in goals scored, with 36 in 10 games before tonight.

"They have guys who played in the Bay state games, they've got guys who played in the Olympics and the World Cup,

Mortgage crisis hits Hampshire College

BY DANIEL SCHEER
COLLEGIAN HAMPSHIRE CORRESPONDENT

The Commonfund, the fund that maintained Hampshire College's liquid assets, froze the distribution in its Short Term Fund on Sept. 30 due to its exposure to mortgage-backed securities.

Hampshire College protected $8.1 million out of its $10.2 million investment moments before the fund shut down. "There's still some money down there," said Jerry Bobdanowicz, director of Finance at Hampshire College's Business Office. "We pulled out what we could; we were fortunate," he said.

Hampshire College President Ralph Hexter is grateful for the eleventh-hour save. "The important thing is to react as quickly as possible," Hexter said. "You can't sit on things. You have to act."

The Commonfund held cash received from tuition payments, gifts, bookstore sales and summer programs.

"We used it on a daily basis," said Bobdanowicz. "It was cash that provided payrolls and other bills of the college. Those funds were the daily fileblood of the college."

Mark Spiro, Vice President of Finance and Administration, explained in an Oct. 2 press release that Hampshire will be able to pay all of its financial obligations.

"The college's cash flow remains strong with $8.1 million available today, and although access to the remaining $2.1 million may be delayed, we do not foresee any difficulties in meeting our payrolls or other financial obligations," Spiro explained.

The Business Office queried the fund about its subprime mortgage holdings in an e-mail exchange on March 18, in response to the credit crunch the year before.

"Fund director Mark Fitzgerald assured us that these holdings represented only 6.3 percent of its portfolio and that its reserve balance 'should provide...the necessary cushion to weather this storm,'" Spiro said.

Hampshire's endowment manager, Prime Buchholz and Associates, Inc, notified the Business Office on Sept. 15 that, according to Spiro, the Commonfund held non-agency mortgage-backed securities at 12 percent of the portfolio rather than the 6.3 percent reported earlier by Director Fitzgerald.

Prime Buchholz suggested the College withdraw its assets from the fund.

"They weren't specifically advising their clients to get out of the fund, but they were certainly advising their clients to

UMass student builds new Web site to combat downtime boredom on campus

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A few hours to kill, homework to avoid and nothing to do – it's something known as boredom, and it affects everyone eventually. Justin Ho said he sympathizes with this and wants to help.

His creation, boredfriday.com, is a brand-new social-networking site at the University of Massachusetts that allows students to post announcements of upcoming events, sell and buy items and even look for peers with a common interest.

It also counts down the time until each post is scheduled to happen.

Users can register with an official UMail account.

"The fundamental idea for boredfriday.com is to simply find other people who have nothing to do right now, this second and to make each other not bored, whether it be by playing a sport outside or video games inside," Ho said via e-mail. "I've had one girl try to look for running partners and someone else looking for someone to share fingernail paints with."

"In addition to alleviating boredom, I hope that some people even make friends out of this site," he said.

Users can search the site – which has been public for about a week – or create their own "ticket," something Ho describes as a request with a time limit.

Ho, a 23-year-old senior graduating this semester, likes to use the example of a student who wants to order a pizza, but wants someone to split it with. He said any student can create a ticket with a 15-minute duration that asks other readers if they want to split a pizza.

The user would then include relevant information like toppings, and current deals and discounts, place it under the "Food" category, add his location to be more specific and click "Create Ticket."

"Your ticket will then appear on the front page for 15 minutes before it expires," Ho said, adding that the time limit can be extended.

"With any luck, another bored and hungry student will see your ticket and respond to you that they're interested."

Students can also post information about classes, search for future roommates, ask for favors and offer professional help.

Ho said he came up with the idea in August and after consulting Paul Lam, a friend at the University of Rochester in New York, the two started exchanging ideas.

They started fine-tuning the site, with Lam focusing on a marketing technique and Ho putting the site "to code."

After crafting the site, Ho, a computer science major from Andover, Mass., began placing fliers in certain dormitories in the Northeast Residential Area to see if students would be interested.

"Students have responded very well, and have further fueled my motivation for this site. Some already posted tickets and a whole bunch registered."

"I know for a fact some students have already sold goods and met up on the site, despite the fact it was only publicized in four buildings. Several students from Northeast even took the time to suggest changes, additions, even submit logo concepts," Ho said.

"I'm more than happy with the positive response I've received from Northeast. Using their feedback, I have made revisions to specific areas of the site over the weekend," he said. "Final touches should be revised by Tuesday, then I hope to go campus-wide within two weeks, and hopefully the campus will take well to it."

be cautious," explained Bohdanowicz.

Bohdanowicz said that the Prime Buchholz warnings were clear. "You really had to read between the lines to see the warning signs," he said. "There were some obvious signs that the Commonfund's liquidity was eroding."

The fund's declining reserve account was among those signs. "This fall the balance should have been high because of fall tuition payments," Bohdanowicz said.

"You have this big influx of cash; generally colleges would have sent this excess cash to the Commonfund," he explained.

In reality, the Commonfund had almost completely liquefied its reserve account. Bohdanowicz noted that there was $145 million on the reserve balance approximately a year ago and then zero at the middle of September.

"The Commonfund was transferring funds from that reserve account to shore up interest rate returns it was crediting to its participants," Bohdanowicz explained. "It was trying to maintain attractive interest rates."

Having competitive interest rates was one of the primary reasons Hampshire invested in the Commonfund, an investment group popular among U.S. colleges.

"The Commonfund gave us better investment rates and daily liquidity," Bohdanowicz said. "That was the attraction to going to the Commonfund along with 1,000 other schools."

To prevent a run on the bank, Wachovia, trustee of the Commonfund, will parse subsequent distributions of its troubled fund over a period of 12 months.

"Institutions will be able to withdraw funds equal to 10 percent of the value of each school's balance immediately, while the remaining 90 percent will be placed in a second tranche for later distribution according to the following rules based on the maturity dates of the underlying holdings," Spiro said.

Hampshire College has invested in the Commonfund since 1975.

UMPD crime log

Compiled by Adam P. Coulter, Collegian Staff

According to University of Massachusetts Police Department Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald, during the routine patrols and arrests this week a UMPD officer was "severely injured" at McGuirk Alumni stadium when he was allegedly kicked in the groin while making an arrest on a male student who was naked and diving into a pool in the bed liner of his truck.

"This is the sort of incident that gets quickly out of hand," said Archbald.

Tuesday

Jaibon H. Amarante, 24, of 377 Ashley Blvd. 3N New Bedford, Mass., was arrested on North Pleasant St. at 9:52 p.m. and charged with larceny under $250, resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest and threatening to commit a crime. Amarante was spotted by an officer attempting to stuff a bicycle into the trunk of his car, which was parked halfway on the sidewalk and halfway into the road. The officer then performed field sobriety tests on Amarante, which he passed. While investing the incident, the bike was found to belong to someone else. Amarante was then placed under arrest after a brief resistance. While at the station, Amarante allegedly threatened to "break the booking officer's neck," said Archbald, warranting the threatening to commit a crime charge.

Thursday

David J. Bach, 19, of 13 Bach Lane South Hadley, Mass., was arrested at Dickinson Hall at 5:52 p.m. and charged with larceny of drugs stealing Adderall, a controlled substance, from the pharmacy at University Health Services where he worked. According to Deputy Chief Archbald, the initial report came into the department at 1:38 p.m. and "it took about five to six hours to get all the facts together to determine what he'd done and then arrest him."

Friday

Daniel J. Sincavage, 18, of 2676 Beacon Hill Dr West Linn, OR, was arrested in Melville dormitory as a result of a warrant served at 9:05 a.m. and charged with possession of a Class D drug, distribution of a Class D drug, possession to distribute a Class D drug, possession of a Class B drug and possession with intent to distribute a Class B drug.

Saturday

Christopher Whittier, 19, of 34 Sunrise Terrace Athol, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on University Drive at 2:29 a.m. and charged with OUI liquor, failure to stop/yield and failure to wear a seatbelt.

Drew David Massar, 18, of 98 South Lane. 307 Granville, Mass., was arrested at Leach dormitory at 4:11 a.m. and charged with indecent A&B on a person 14 or over and a warrant.

Andrea Spector, 19, of 28 Curwen Rd. Peabody, Mass., Marshal DP Keating, 21, of 75 Edgewater Pl 2A Edgewater, NJ, Alexander S. Costas, 19, of 126 Merrimack St. Apt. 2R Newburyport, Mass. and Christopher R. Lufkin, 18, of 30 Harrison Ave Gloucester, Mass., was arrested in Lot 22 of Alumni Stadium at 11:54 a.m. after officers noticed a group of people disrobing and swimming in a portable pool in the back of a truck. "It continued to escalate and Keating refused to cooperate with officers. He continued to dive into the pool from the top of the truck, he was completely naked and began to flash everyone," said Archbald. Keating was charged with disorderly conduct, A&B on a police officer, resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest and a warrant. "The four officers tried to arrest him but he was wet and slippery and he then kneed an officer two times in the groin, requiring the officer to go to [Cooley Dickenson Hospital] in an ambulance." According to Archbald, "The officer will be out for at least one to two weeks." Spector, Lufkin and Costas were all charged with being a person in possession of liquor while under 21.

Sunday

local law enforcement and the judicial system implement appropriate measures to address these offenders," Domenici said.

Christopher Overtree, director of Psychological Services Center at UMass, believes that this bill is an example of the growing awareness in communities and government that the needs of the mentally ill have often been ignored and that it is time to focus on providing more effective and comprehensive mental health services.

"There has long been a level of disconnect between the needs of the mentally ill, and the ability of the legal system to provide appropriate services," said Overtree. "This law enables police officers to receive the training they need to respond more appropriately to mentally ill offenders, referring them to appropriate services that may be more effective than the legal system in bringing about a positive change for the individual and justice in our society. Often, it is these first moments that can mark the difference in outcome for a mentally-ill offender. As first-responders, law enforcement officials are better equipped to protect public safety when they are well trained."

The next step is for the bill to be sent to the president. Pending his approval, it will be passed as a law.

The case for Sarah Palin

Brad DeFlumeri

Mitt Romney was my choice as John McCain's running mate. His economic expertise and executive administrative experience, it would appear, would have been quite useful at a time of such perilous economic uncertainty. In trying to reconcile McCain's passing over of Romney, it occurred to me that the person chosen as the GOP running mate was considerably more effective and a great deal more popular as governor of her state than Romney had been in Massachusetts.

Republican Vice Presidential nominee Sarah Palin's rise to the national ticket offers an inspirational choice for women voters and has reinvigorated a McCain team that once appeared lackluster to many conservatives. Her revolutionary reshaping of Alaska's deeply corrupt political culture as governor is proof positive of her excellence as an administrator and leader.

Equally noteworthy, however, is that Palin has undergone intensive character assassination at the hands of the liberal blogosphere and other media in recent weeks. The attacks have often gone above and beyond the politically acceptable level of questioning her judgment and stretched into the mean-spirited and nasty realm of labeling her a Christian extremist and a fool. She is neither of these things, just as Democratic nominee Barack Obama is neither a Muslim nor an anti-war extremist, as similarly polemic and needless forces on the right have charged.

Leading this charge into the cesspool of political filth on the left was the ever-inflammatory atheist Bill Maher, who, among other things, has labeled Palin a "moron," "bimbo," "Jesus freak," and likened her faith to believing in "witch doctors." This is the same Maher who has repeatedly denigrated President Bush's faith as religious fanaticism and equated his praying on important national matters to asking his imaginary friend for help. Indeed, the ad hominem animus directed from the left toward Palin has been sustained and increasingly vitriolic.

Her common-sense approach ...is something a nation starved for domestic-policy solutions ought to be hopeful for.

Democrats, long the self-anointed champions of the poor, underrepresented, and disenfranchised, have been quick to denigrate Palin's quietly middle-class background and experiences as inapplicable to national political leadership. Feminists, too, have been eager to venomously attack Palin on the grounds that she is not a true supporter of women's right because she is a conservative. Liberals, it would be appear, seem only willing to match their anti-rich, pro-minority rhetoric with action when a Democrat stands to benefit. Palin, as a strong defender of the institution of traditional marriage, faith and not murdering children once conceived, represents everything these liberal critics view as anathema to their permissively progressive agenda. Hence the barbarous invectives.

Nevertheless, a strong case remains for Palin's effective leadership and refreshingly reformist approach. At a time when most Americans cry out in unanimity for a change in national political leaders, with our economy floundering, and with Congressional and White House approval ratings at historically low levels, Palin offers a record of effective governance characterized by pragmatic tax cuts and benefits, streamlining of government and relentless rooting out of corruption.

A foreign policy authority she isn't – and which former governor running for national office besides Ronald Reagan has been? – but Palin has actually successfully run a governmental enterprise, as opposed to Joe Biden and her common-sense approach to reform and economic stewardship that has worked so well in Alaska is something a nation starved for domestic-policy solutions ought to be hopeful for. Palin's past championing of government support for disabled children and their families, which she has enthusiastically promised to continue in a McCain White House, offers an inspiringly uplifting message to every American. And when she speaks she sounds less like a polished world-traveling Ivy-league educated elite unable to grasp the plights of the middle class and more like an authentic and tough-minded leader whose words you can trust will be followed with measurable action, as she's proven to be true in Alaska.

With our nation needing to engage more with our growing domestic problems than ever, and with the efficient expenditure of our tax dollars of so much concern to Americans, a fresh approach to assessing what Washington doesn't do well, who is skimming off the top, and which pork-barrel pieces of legislation ought to be vetoed, is something that a career Washington outsider with a strong track record of courageous political reform could indeed offer.

And you will not hear the liberal media say this, but Palin's being pick as a woman for VP on the GOP ticket – a party not traditionally known for its championing of women's advancement – has the same historic and inspiring ramifications as Obama's pick to be president by his party.

Palin is a Sam's Club Republican: eager to use the levers of government to support economic opportunities for the middle class but mindful that a self-reliance often born of family and faith has served our nation well in the past and will do so in the future.

With McCain's chances to win in a month lessened by horrific volatility on Wall Street, Sarah Palin has emerged from Main Street with a traditional values-driven and reformist message quickly dismissed by elites on the left and in the media. The moderate American voter, however, should be listening.

Beneath the surface, issues unaddressed

Parisa Saranj

"A 3rd world Muslim country filled with nothing but hate and despair," someone called my country. I felt a piercing pain. Where is my home? Humans often immigrate in search of better opportunities – still fond of their beloved lands. But, once the destination is not welcoming, one feels so homeless and distressed.

I don't remember I have ever failed to emphasize that Iranian women do not hold the same rights as their male counterparts. Though I am extremely proud of what Iranian women have been able to achieve in the past decades, I do criticize the position of women in that society. I still grieve over the true fact which the West refuses to show: the positive images of living in Iran especially for women. So I try to fool myself by trying to believe that racism is long abolished in America, and I am not subject to any racism.

I do not write this to take revenge. I am just tired of living in an era when everyone seems to forget that there are more layers underneath the surface of a society or a nation. Only a few care to dig into those hidden layers in order to reveal the real face of how life really is for people or who really is responsible for politics discussed on the tables.

Today, I am not writing a political piece to campaign for Democrats or for Republicans. I am disturbed by the human cost of politics. Decades go by; and in each era, an issue like a trend, a fashion or a business is developed by the politicians of higher-powers to keep people busy and somewhat scared. Whether it is communism or fundamentalist Muslim terrorists, there will definitely be something that we should occupy our minds with and define our understanding of the world based upon it.

Now that the time has come, I am again disappointed. Why is there no end to taking advantage of women?

How many more people like me are suffering the injustice of being overlooked? Do we ever count how many are being forced into a category of labels and stereotypes? I am writing on being a woman, on being an Iranian woman in America and most importantly, on being a woman at these times of sensitive economy and politics.

As a woman, I have waited so long to see not only a hand full, but a significant number of females stand shoulder-to-shoulder with men on the fields of national and global politics and decision making. Now that the time has come, I am again disappointed. Why is there no end to taking advantage of women?

There is no time, no right place or even adequate authority to discuss the intelligence of the vice presidential nominee, Sarah Palin. I am sure there has been plenty argument about her lack of experience and knowledge. Also, I do not want to repeat her top 10 or 20 stupid quotes, from seeing Russia from her window to beating around the bush when not knowing an answer to questions.

Although some may argue that she is a good chance for uplifting women's status, I wish many could see that there are many versions of women in America. For some of us, the idea of a modern woman is not a mother or a wife who stands behind her man. For some of us, advancement of women's rights cannot be achieved by taking advantage of a woman to put her on the pedestal and try to define all women based on her standards. For some of us, marriage is defined differently or woman's right to her body is extremely personal and is a matter of choice.

"Why is everything a joke?" I repeatedly ask myself. The nomination of Mrs. Palin too has become a fashion: to joke about her catchphrases, winking at the American people or at what she wears. Maybe it is not fair to base her ability to operate as a political figure on how she runs a family. Her being a "hockey mom" does not mean that all she can provide women equal pay, equal work or a better health care system.

I just used this recent and obvious example to discuss how easily we get distracted from what lies behind the real politics. If Mrs. Palin is only chosen to divert attention from the certain politics of her party, if my race makes some to dislike me, we – as the young minds of today and hopes of future – must be really aware.

I hope this piece makes my reader to questions the stereotypes about women, their portrait in the media, race and the world's misinformation. Who is teaching us tolerant toward races, religions and genders? Is women's status in society really being promoted?

Uneasy being 'green' (all the time)

Matthew Broderick

Today, Kermit the Frog would be mugged for attempting to convey how much he loathes being green. Green is the new poster boy of an environmentally sound world and is being incorporated in to everything.

The concept has garnered such a passionate following that even our tumbling economy cannot stop people from shoveling out an extra buck for its image. Being "green" is a flower child in disguise. Its motivation for once in our lives to consume friendly, and it's more popular than The Beatles. Unfortunately, "green" will not always be in style, and like a stop light, will eventually turn to red.

Now it is great to be green, if you can afford it. Cars, clothing and even common household necessities are showing that some aspect of their product is environmentally friendly. Fear of global warming has put a hot flame under the butt of a significantly ignorant world. There is nothing wrong with taking part in this movement, but we need to evaluate what we are really contributing to and if we are passionate enough to live "green" lives forever.

Mother Nature is telling us that we are reaching a breaking point, and instead of listening to her, we are eating out of the hand of corporate America. Every person associated with marketing in this country is busting his chops to be able to show that his company is "green". At this point, most consumers are willing to support environmentally friendly products, but I believe there will be a point where this begins to rust over. Eventually, like always, a company will reach its hand into the cookie jar of corruption. Starting with one, we will learn that their "green" tactics were more of a brownish color. Others will be drawn in to the spotlight also. As unpleasant a circumstance as it may sound, it is way too likely to be overlooked. Instead of setting ourselves up to be disappointed, we should be "green" in our own ways, outside of the consuming ball and chain.

Another possibility that we may face is the over-saturation of "green" products. Environmental friendliness may be considered huge at this moment, simply because people never considered it thoroughly before. Change is something that seems to irk common folk, and unwillingness toward it is inevitable unless given a little shove. Today we are being given a push, which is working with all good intentions. Sometime in the future we will reach a point when mostly everything will in some way be "green." Due to this, ignorance will creep out of the darkness once again. Products will just be assumed as environmentally friendly without another thought. At this time we may just be missing the point and in reality have forgotten about the importance of being environmentally conscious.

Sometime in the future we will reach a point when mostly everything will in some way be 'green.'

Other factors in the world may also be affecting our obsession with being "green." The war is always on everyone's mind in some way or another. An interesting coincidence of this is that during the 60s and 70s when the Vietnam War was in full flight, the country was also going through somewhat of a "green" vibration. During the age of "real" hippies, peace and love, the connection to being one with the environment was on the minds of many. We may question why this ended, if not because of the war. Being "green" may simply come from our guilt of not standing up to a physical enemy, which forces us to fight a battle of our own. Somehow, if not blatantly, we know we should be fighting global warming and environmental threats. The truth is that the world around us has changed so violently in the past couple of years, that we have no other option but to try and personally do our part to improve it.

"Green" may live forever; Mother Nature could turn back to hibernating, and we may all someday live in a world in which the air is clean and water untainted. Yet to achieve this goal we have to do more than purchase environmentally friendly products. We have to start thinking about the small things we waste each day and what affect our actions will have on the long term to the environment. "It's not easy being green," as Kermit would say, but with a little effort it could be more realistic instead of a corporate produced fad with a short shelf life.

Tegan & Sara are back

Canadian pop-rock sister duo embarks on another U.S. tour

BY HEATHER WAXMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

O, Canada. Home to the Toronto Maple Leaves, a multitude of French-speaking natives and the edgy, pop-rock twin sister duo, Tegan and Sara.

The pair recently kicked off their final stateside tour in promotion of its latest record, "The Con," with supporting act City and Colour, an acoustic side project commanded by Alexisonfire's Dallas Green, and a trio of new chicks on the block – ethereal punk-rock band, Girl in a Coma.

Sara, one half of the duo, sat down with The Daily Collegian via telephone, in Baltimore to discuss a slew of topics including "The Con," their tour and the recent progression of the independent music scene.

Daily Collegian: So, you have done quite a few tours for your and Tegan's latest album, "The Con." How will this one be different from the last?

Sara: We've been touring since July for this record, so they all sort of bleed together. This is actually the fourth time we've been in the states on this record. We've only done one real show so far in a proper venue. We sort of intentionally spent some time trying to figure out what songs we could play that we don't generally gravitate towards. We wanted to make sure we were still going back to old material to keep the show interesting.

DC: You are touring with the incredible Dallas Green [of City and Colour]. How has that been?

S: He's a sweetheart. He's a really sweet guy. We're super stoked to have him out. It's nice to be able to bring a fellow Canadian on board with us. I like that we can relate to each other, and we have all toured around the world and had success in our own worlds.

DC: "The Con" was your fifth studio release. Did you have anything specific in mind when you sat down to write the record?

S: Not really. You know, we've taken a bunch of time off. Tegan and I don't live in the same city, so we were doing all of our writing on our own, independently.

We started talking with Chris Walla [producer/guitarist of Death Cab for Cutie], although we were writing from different perspectives. Tegan was having this unrequited love affair, and I was practically married and feeling middle-aged, thinking about life and money and love. I wasn't suffocating, but I was contemplating: what is this all about?

Tegan was in this explosive, volatile place so I wasn't sure if [the album] would be cohesive, but it actually gave it a sort of call and answer. We don't necessarily go in with a concept, but it's nice when it works together, probably because our voices are so dramatically similar.

DC: Did you have any intentions of making "The Con" different from "So Jealous," which was also a big success?

S: For "So Jealous," we worked with Jon and Dave out of Vancouver, who had worked with The New Pornographers, and they really have a style and preference for equipment. So, we've been working with people that can really give this album a sound. And we knew we were going to work with all different players. So just form a sound perspective, we knew it was going to sound different. You kind of grow out of certain things. "The Con" was the first time we did things ourselves.

DC: What is your favorite track off of "The Con?"

S: "Burn Your Life Down." It is such great middle of the road. I like that it's sort of subtle, and you don't get sick of it.

DC: I feel like it's that way for "Nineteen," too. I would sit on my bed with my friends last summer and just listen to it over and over on repeat for hours.

S: The thing about "Nineteen" is – God, well we were always a little bit weird. Our parents had us listening to stuff that most kids were not listening to. It was really in junior high and middle school when we started to make deep connections with our friends in music.

Tegan and I and all of our friends used to lay on our beds for weekends just listening to the same songs over and over again. We used to lay down and listen to Nirvana and Guns N' Roses and Smashing Pumpkins, and my parents probably thought we were so depressed. And that shared experience, all cheesiness aside, that's what our music is for. We're writing music for the teenage soul.

DC: At fifteen, you won a garage band competition. That was sort of your "big break" right?

S: You know, it was actually when we got out of high school. It was like the first kind of push in the right direction. At that point, we had been in punk bands and played in garage bands and this was in the late 1990s. And I know I'm dating myself but we just did not have the Internet. So, the idea of having a MySpace or iTunes – this stuff was not even in our vocabulary yet.

So, in order to have a band, you had to tour and have a record deal. I honestly didn't know the next step. My friend was in college, and she was like, "You guys are talented musicians. You should do this contest!" But we were the only band that was not from the university. So I think we really stood out because we were these super green precocious 17-year-olds playing acoustic punk songs, so we won. Which, all it meant was we got to play a bar, and we got $500 to record a demo.

It wasn't a break in the sense that we won the contest, and off we went. It was one of those things where the first real professional thing we did inspired us to start making packages and sending them to promoters in other cities. It took two years.

Everything is hard. Nothing is easy. It's like any job. The music industry is very much the same. Everyday, you work. You work because it fills your soul, but it's also how you support your family and your lifestyle. So much of the music industry is about working. It's not necessarily about how many people listen to your songs. Can you fund a tour and finance a trip to Europe? I think that people either manage to do it and make it work or branch out.

DC: A multitude of independent artists are starting to be featured in the mainstream media. How do you feel about the independent music scene inching its way to a more mainstream audience?

S: You know what? I think that the real shift into TV and like promo or placement type stuff is just from lack of exposure on radio, and that's partly to do with the fact that the radio stations' playlists are so narrow.

There's also been a huge influx in bands, and now you have the world market opening up. I think it's necessary, and also adds a lot of depth to these teenybopper shows that don't have that much depth to them.

If you don't watch that show, who fing cares?[1] I don't watch "Laguna Beach." But if it means that 500 people go look at our MySpace, then I really don't care.

That's the thing about "selling out." But I remember hearing that Iggy Pop sold his song to Microsoft. And people were mad, and he was like 'I wrote this song in the 70s! I'm just now using it for something different!'"

If you're deeply offended, go and support something different. You can have both. You don't necessarily have to point the finger and say "F you! You sold out!"

DC: If you could spend one day doing whatever you wanted to do, what would it be?

S: You know, I was lucky enough to take two months off, and I got to spend my time doing everything I wanted to do. I read. I went on a trip just to look for special books. And I like to draw. And I like to spend tons of time alone. I just hole away in my apartment being weird and being reclusive.

Milan is runway-ready

Italy's infamous fashion city meets grandeur expectations

BY REBECCA BABIN & EMMA LIVERGREEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

(Editor's note: This is the third article in a continuing series about fashion)

Milan, Italy's notorious fashion capital, is known for its luxury leather and designer duds.

The city is full of designers, old and new, as well as a rich and vibrant heritage.

Designer hopefuls travel to the city in hopes of becoming predecessors to their fashion idols.

Home to the third fashion week in this spectacular month-long preview comes a slew of killer spring-summer fashion.

Gucci

In notes from designer Frida Ginanni's spring 2009 show, she made reference to the success of the "trend-setting bohemian" fall collection.

Looks inspired by her fall collection have been popping up all over more trendy mainstream scenes and in such stores as the Spanish-originated Zara and Forever 21.

This spring, the looks have changed, but the idea remains the same: appeal to those who aren't looking to take risks with fashion, but want to look beautiful in trendy, colorful, patterned looks.

One of her collections' most brilliant additions was the slouchy pant suit, which comes in a broad range of colors.

Each suit, with a flood-length pant and a "boyfriend" style blazer, was paired with a spring-like, bold floral pattern.

Colors ranged from a moodier black set paired with bright teal, to a peppier sky blue paired with a deeper-hued sapphire.

Don't forget Gucci's heritage and what they were made famous for: accessories.

Pant suits, dresses, and shorts were all paired with leather belts, fedoras, silk scarves, long-strapped shoulder bags, oversized sunglasses and strappy, patent leather sandals.

Pant suits, however, were not the only option for Gucci-goers.

Ginanni also introduced breezy, chiffon dresses in bold patterns, some hanging loosely around the arms in long, flowing sleeves, while others remained one-shouldered and dusted the floor.

In terms of eveningwear, there wasn't much of anything special; it was obvious that Ginanni centered her collection around trendy daywear.

It was an emotional show for both longtime Gucci fans and Ginanni, as her partner at the fashion house of twelve years, Mark Lee, is set to retire as president in December.

Upon the show's commencement, Ginanni motioned Lee to the runway, from where he was sitting front row, to share in the applause.

BURBERRY PRORSUM

Burberry Prorsum has gone British with his spring 2009 collection.

Italy displayed designers' spring 2009 collections.

Ready-to-wear fashions graced the runways of Milan.

This garden-inspired motif was all about contemporary, easy-going elegance.

Girls are ready for the rain with khaki-colored bucket hats and various raincoats, ranging from short ponchos to long trench coats.

Inspired by an earthlike color pallet, shades of green, grey and brown were used throughout.

As for footwear, models sported brown socks with sexy school-teacher laced-up heels and sandals.

The staples of Burberry's collection were the long, slim cardigans.

Some had buttons askew, going diagonally across the sweater. They were paired with wide-leg trousers in grey, black, and copper as well as chiffon dresses, and high-waist skirts.

Flouncy dresses floated away from the body and remained a staple of the collection. Opt for an olive green knee length, infused with yellow and a shot of brown, or a white number in translucent chiffon, detailed

Let's talk about sex

Therapist to offer her expertise in series

BY ANDREW SHERIDAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sex is a tricky topic in America.

The media embraces it while the more-conservative groups try to keep it strictly beneath the sheets.

Video game regulations allow for dismemberment, arson and murder, yet sex between two consenting adults results in a game being pulled from shelves.

Why is it that this basic instinct – this driving force behind our very existence – is being so feverishly swept under the rug?

This is a question that bothers sexologist "Jameela" Joyce A. Joseph, and in the interest of education, she throws the doors wide open.

Joseph is a certified sex therapist and a diplomat of the American Board of Sexology.

Based here in western Massachusetts, she provides consultation to couples and individuals across the country and for the next seven weeks, will be hosting a series of lectures in Northampton titled, "Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex and More."

Joseph's specialty is mind-body sexuality and while this may seem like a far-out concept, it is fairly straightforward.

Mind-body sexuality stresses the importance of making an emotional, energetic connection in order to enhance the sexual experience.

Joseph believes that an emotional disconnect can be responsible for many intimacy problems.

The Collegian recently had the opportunity to talk with Joseph, and her zeal for the topic clearly shown through.

The Daily Collegian: What is the general purpose in holding these lectures?

Joyce Joseph: Just to educate people about their bodies and their sexual energies. In my practice, I combine western psychology and eastern technology, and teach people to achieve sexual well-being.

DC: How specialized is sex therapy versus, say, traditional psychology?

JJ: Anyone in clinical practice gets a course in human sexuality. If you decide to specialize in sex, you do an additional 1,000 clinical hours just in sex therapy along with 100 hours of classroom training. I specialize in mind-body sexual function, but I am trained in a wide variety of sexual issues.

DC: What is the most common sexual problem than you encounter in your patients?

JJ: It depends on the age group. In the past ten years, there has been a huge rise in cyber sex addiction, whether it be actual sex over the internet or pornography addiction.

Those in the middle age group often have libido issues in general or have lost sexual desire for just their long term partners.

Sometimes it is physical and sometimes it is emotional. A main problem in aging [illegible] menopause and their inability to be [illegible] while in aging men, it is sustaining [illegible] erection.

DC: What are some common problems that people in the college-age group experience?

JJ: For students, young men get nervous and anxious – have fears about not pleasing [illegible]. There is so much societal pressure on men to perform.

Doctors will sometimes prescribe Viagra to young men, but that's not what they want to be taking. They need to learn about the sexual energy in their body and gain confidence and increase their self-esteem.

Young women need to learn about their bodies and what turns them on and to teach their partners what pleases them.

The latest research shows that women begin their arousal pr-marily by emotions and by touch.

One area of great interest to Joseph was the cultural aspect of sex and how people relate to intimacy in our country.

"Americans are too goal-oriented," she said, noting that many Eastern philosophies put little or no emphasis on orgasm and instead focus on the experience itself.

"It's about riding the wave of sexual energy. It's part of our life force – a sacred journey," said Joseph.

Her opinions on the American mind-set also include the "mythology of performance."

She explains there is a prevailing myth that men and women should already know everything there is to know about sex, while in truth it is a complex aspect of our lives and takes quite a while to explore and master.

Another topic of appeal was the widespread misconceptions about the female stimulation and orgasm.

"Young couples come in, worried that they don't have a vaginal orgasm. There is a lot of controversy over this. The thinking now is that it's all clitoral-related. It's anatomical whether a woman can orgasm just through penetration," said Joseph.

She stresses that her services and philosophies are not just for heterosexual couples but for same sex couples as well.

The series begins tonight, and will be held every Wednesday evening at 7 p.m. at the Somatic Systems Institute in Northampton.

Tonight's lecture topic is "Female Sexual Desire & Orgasm," and future topics will include male sexual desire, sexual functions, painful intercourse disorders, and sexual addictions.

In the parting words of wisdom from Jameela Joseph, she encourages people of all ages to "Relax, and enjoy."

Okkervil to play NoHo

Indie folk-rock band to promote new album at Pearl Street show

Okkervil River will play tonight at Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club to promote their new album, "The Stand Ins."

BY BRIAN WOOD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Okkervil River is cautiously sailing through uncharted territory.

Tonight, the band makes a return to the Pearl Street Night Club – this time with significantly less cargo.

On the surface, the Austin-based indie-rockers are one of the genre's brightest up-and-comers and each of its past three releases has been met with great critical acclaim.

Record sales have also escalated, as the band's latest effort, "The Stand Ins," debuted at number 42 on the Billboard Top 200.

The album, a sequel to 2007's "The Stage Names," explores themes presented during the original with a sharper tact and greater depth.

"The Stage Names" and "The Stand Ins" were initially conceived as a single release and act as a staggered double album, complete with interlocking artwork.

Two songs into "The Stand Ins," it becomes apparent that in the wake of past success, the band's future is still very much in the air.

On the album's first single, "Lost Coastlines," frontman Will Sheff and former keyboardist Jonathan Meiburg accompany each other on a duet, crafting a somber lyrical tale of maritime exploration that laments the struggles of holding the band together in the face of impending stardom.

"And every night finds us rocking and rolling on waves wild and wide, well we have lost our way, nobody's gonna say it outright," confesses Sheff during the track's conclusion before breaking into an extended chorus of upbeat and uneasy "la-la-la's."

For a band that has had several members leave its ranks during the course of its 10 year history, transitional phases are nothing new.

However, 2008 saw some staggering shifts in the band's lineup.

Guitarist Brian Cassidy was the first to abandon ship, leaving the band's touring lineup in March of 2008.

Cassidy was quickly replaced by Wrens guitarist Charles Bissell on an interim basis, but Cassidy's departure signaled the first in a wave of significant changes to the bands core lineup.

The most profound of these changes came two months later.

Meiburg followed Cassidy's lead and officially left the band to focus his efforts on his band, Shearwater.

While Meiburg had struggled to find the time to tour and write music with both bands, his influence on Okkervil's 2005 album "Black Sheep Boy" and their 2007 release "The Stage Names" is undeniable, and his lively presence was one of the highlights of their past stage performances.

"We sail out on order of him, but we find that the maps he sent to us don't mention lost coastlines" croons Meiburg of his own departure.

Despite the lineup changes, the band is currently wrapping up a slew of east coast tour dates before embarking on a one month trek across Europe.

Their performance in Northampton marks one of the last three shows for the band in the United States.

While touring is currently absorbing the band, the future remains somewhat of a murky area.

Lyrically, however, Sheff remains hopeful when it comes to where the band is heading.

"And see how that light you love now just won't shine," sings Sheff during one of the more upbeat sections of "Lost Coastlines."

"There might just be another star, that's high and far in some other sky."

While Sheff is no prophet, for now, at least, it seems he is content treading water, waiting to see where the wind takes everyone next.

(Okkervil River plays tonight at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton with openers Crooked Fingers and What Cheer? Brigade. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. and tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.)

Milan displays fashion 'hits'

with barely-there color and a horde of stripes.

Classic high-waisted skirts beckoned Sherlock Holmes, embellished with antique-style buttons and belt loops.

A few patterns made their way in towards the end on silk dresses and jackets, in both geometric and painted florals.

Burberry's delicate, classic, and trendy collection stole gazes from all angles.

MARNI

During a toned-down and reserved Fashion Week in Milan, Consuelo Castiglioni, Marni's founder and chief designer, managed to inject an equal dose of fun and humor into her collection.

Per usual, layering was Marni's signature this season.

Cardigans were layered over blown-up polka dot printed skirts and tops, many encased in chiffon.

Dots mixed with plaids and stripes mixed with solids, came just shy of being overdone and unkempt.

For day, belted t-shirts and cardigans went with just-below-the-knee skirts and tunic dresses.

The color palette was refreshing and optimistic in sherbet colors such as watermelon and bright green, with the off-beat Marni specialties of more neutral, earthy colors to keep things in sync.

An orange and black pencil skirt was paired with a pink and purple striped tee, but somehow the contrast clashed less and pleased more.

Things were a bit more amped-up for eveningwear. Fabrics became shinier, punched up with a little more black.

The polka dots were still there, this time in the form of shimmering pallettes and exaggerated shoulders. With a few exceptions, looks for night were subdued in comparison to the slightly more rebellious dresser for day.

Accessories were fun as well.

Where there were chunky, crafty-looking necklaces on top, there were brightly colored platforms and knee socks on the bottom.

Castiglioni turned what could easily have been an exercise in lack-of-taste and overdone-layering into a fresh, wearable line for the experimenter aficionada.

GIANFRANCO FERRÉ

The house of Ferré has certainly encountered some recent bumps in the road.

After the sudden death of Italian designer Gianfranco Ferré in June 2007 and the abrupt departure of creative director Lars Nilsson earlier this year, the spring 2009 collection has, remarkably, brought the label back to life.

Tommaso Aquilano and Roberto Rimondi of fashion house 6267 took a more modern, futuristic spin on the collection, which proved to be a successful merge of two threads.

The pieces were structural in silhouette, with pod-like shapes, 3-D pockets and sharp hems.

Sticking to a neutral color palette of black, white, sand, and the occasional silver, scrolled skirts and space-age tops were architectural, sometimes too much so to be taken seriously. On one skirt and dress, strange fin-like adornments accented the seams.

The final two pieces were floor-length gowns.

The first was sand-colored and adorned with asymmetrical seaming, while the latter, a black dress with an upside-down triangle plastered on the chest, looked as if it had been poured onto model Mariacarla Boscono.

It perfectly captured the modern aesthetic of Aquilano and Rimondi, as well as the classic elegance of Ferré.

UM climbs back up to No. 13

FOOTBALL from page 10

Minutemen's true freshman defensive back Darren Thellen is the brother of Northeastern's star defensive back, sophomore Nate Thellen, who leads the CAA in interceptions with four.

CLIMBING THE LADDER

After starting out the season strong in the national polls, getting as high as No. 3 in the Sports Network Poll, the Minutemen fell sharply with their back-to-back losses to James Madison and Texas Tech.

James Madison is now No. 1 in the Football Championship Subdivision and Texas Tech is No. 7 in the Football Bowl Subdivision. After the massacre in Lubbock, the Minutemen fell to No. 18 in the polls. It was a drop of nine spots after being No. 9 following the loss to JMU.

With UMass' most recent win over Delaware, the Minutemen started their climb back to the top of the polls. The win helped the Maroon and White jump five spots to No. 13.

Despite the wide range of rankings the Minutemen have had over the season in the Sports Network Poll, the team's rankings have stayed pretty steady in the FCS Coaches Poll.

The Minutemen fell to No. 9 with the loss to JMU and only to No. 10 after the loss to the Red Raiders. Even though they did not play during the bye week, UMass dropped two spots to No. 12 before rising to No. 11 with the win over Delaware.

WATCHING TAPE

Saturday's game against Delaware may have been a coming out party for the Minutemen's defense, but the offense did struggle at times. Coen and the rest of the offense did move the ball down the field on many of their drives, but many of them ended abruptly.

Coen had three interceptions in the game, the same amount he had through the first four games of the season combined, Tony Nelson fumbled after a 37-yard reception and the offense had another turnover on downs.

To improve the offense for the game against the Huskies, Coen and his wide receivers are doing something they usually don't have time to do.

"A lot of times you don't have too much time to watch tape with your receivers because most of the time you're watching film with your position coach," Coen said. "We're going to get the tape rolling and watch the film together and just try and be on the same page a little bit more."

DOUBLE YOUR PLEASURE

Linebacker Josh Jennings has been a staple for the Minutemen defense so far this year. With his 16 tackles (three and a half for a loss) against the Blue Hens, Jennings earned the Colonial Athletic Association Defensive Player of the Week. The award is the junior's second of the season.

Jennings is the leading tackler in the CAA with 53 tackles (10.6 per game) and also has five tackles for losses, a sack and an interception through five games this season.

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

After starting the season at No. 5 in the Sports Network Poll, the Minutemen have moved around the rankings from as low as No. 3 to as high as No. 18. After UMass' win over Delaware, the team is currently No. 13.

Williams filling in for absent Widdall

Williams started 17 games, splitting starts with Letourneau for most of her career. During her freshman year, Williams received most of the starts with 12 but only started five games the following season.

With Williams taking over for the next few games, the Minutewomen do not expect to be losing much in terms of defense. In her two starts, Williams has allowed only three goals, despite only having four saves. The low amount of saves can be attributed to her aggressive play style that stops the offense before they can get off a shot.

UMASS GETS FIRST BLOWOUT

When the Minutewomen went up against Siena (0-10) on Saturday, they went in as overwhelming favorites and were expected to blow out their opponent. With their 5-1 win, they did just that.

The blowout, however, was the first of the season for the Minutewomen, who had faced inferior opponents several times this season. When UMass faced Harvard (which was 1-3 at the time) on Sept. 14, it failed to put away its opponent, who took the game into double overtime. Though they won the game, UMass coach Justine Sowry felt that her team did not play to their potential.

Against Brown, which was 1-5 at the time, the Minutewomen were dangerously close to losing the game when the Bears took a 1-0 lead with less than 10 minutes left in regulation. A quick goal in response and the game winner minutes into overtime gave the Maroon and White the victory. Sowry, though, was disappointed that, once again, a less talented team took her squad to overtime.

With the big win over Siena, the Minutewomen appear ready to put away teams they are expected to blow out.

Sophomore Jamie Bourazeris has followed up her impressive freshman year with a strong output this season with three goals and three assists.

avoid contact with it.

"You don't want to smack someone with it in fear of a card or a foul or it hurts," Rudy said.

She recently had it removed in time for this weekend's matches against GW and Richmond. In the game against Richmond, she took two shots on goal.

DEFENSE IN GOOD COMPANY

Even with the offensive woes, the defense has remained a strong spot for the Minutewomen. They are currently second in the A-10 for goals against average (.910).

That average is better than last year (1.13), when the Minutewomen had alumna Kristen Walker in goal and focused on being a more aggressive team on offense. Although it's still early and much can change with their conference schedule, they should be in good position to make the A-10 Championships if the defense can keep the average under one.

Three teams from last year (Charlotte, Fordham and Dayton) finished with less than one goal. The 49ers and Rams advanced to the championship game.

Part of that has to do with the defense turning into offense. Meghan Collins and Melissa Toulouse both have recorded two assists this season by playing towards midfield for much of the game.

That strategy sometimes backfires as it leaves the Minutewomen with an open backfield allowing opponents to get quality shots from inside the box. But for now, the defense's gambles have paid off well for UMass.

MLB playoffs reach next level

And two words: Joe Torre.

My pick: Dodgers in six.

NICK O'MALLEY:

The Los Angeles Dodgers, coming off a sweep of the Chicago Cubs, have been riding the white-hot Manny Ramirez since he was run of Boston. So far this season, Ramirez is toting a .500 average with a 1.743 OPS and two home runs.

The Philadelphia Phillies, meanwhile, are riding strong performances by pitchers Cole Hamels and Joe Blanton. The Dodgers, however, will not have starts similar to the disastrous performances of Milwaukee Brewers starters C.C. Sabathia and Jeff Suppan.

My Pick: Dodgers in six.

JEFFREY R. LARNARD:

After watching the divisional series and looking at the two teams, I have to go with the team with the experience the Dodgers.

They dismantled the Cubs – nothing the Cubs aren't use to, and they did it with pitching and hitting. The Phillies hit some long balls against the Brewers, but C.C. Sabathia was the only hope the Brew Crew had. He was burnt out after getting them to the playoffs.

The Dodgers also have players who have been there before. Joe Torre has coached in October every year since 1996. Derek Lowe won a ring with the Red Sox, and Manny Ramirez won two with them.

My pick: It will be tough, but Dodgers win in six.

WORLD SERIES

ELI ROSENSWAKE:

So, Dodgers and Rays in the World Series. I can't decide if Manny Ramirez will single-handedly win the World Series to stick it to Boston, or single-handedly lose the World Series to stick it to Boston by letting the Rays win.

He doesn't know either.

My pick: Rays in six, but I still won't fully believe in them if it happens (Carl Crawford MVP).

NICK O'MALLEY:

The Red Sox have the upper hand against the Dodgers with three top flight starters and one of the game's premier closers. Offensively, the Dodgers hold the upper hand with the newly-motivated Manny Ramirez and the revitalized Rafael Furcal.

The American League has produced the World Series champion in seven out of the last 10 seasons, and, once again, the Red Sox have home-field advantage thanks to the American League's victory in the All-Star game.

The Dodgers, meanwhile, are one of a series of teams that has reached the World Series after a breakout season. However, the last four teams to enter in similar fashion, the Colorado Rockies, Detroit Tigers, Houston Astros and St. Louis Cardinals all lost.

An underdog team has not won the championship since the Florida Marlins in 2003, but no team has repeated as World Series champion since the New York Yankees in 2000. Something's got to give.

My Pick: Red Sox in five (Jason Bay MVP).

JEFFREY R. LARNARD:

Manny Ramirez vs. the Red Sox. The fans want it, MLB wants it. It's going to happen.

Manny may not even play – because regardless, he gets a ring and a winner and loser's share of the prize money. But he's still going for that big contract and will have a big series, but it won't be enough.

Pitching wins championships and the Red Sox have the better staff. Lowe and Billingsley have been impressive but they are no Jon Lester or Josh Beckett. Plus the Red Sox bullpen has been lights out.

My pick: Red Sox in six, finally win one at Fenway and that way all those people don't get free furniture from Jordan's (Jon Lester MVP).

Since Vanessa Lima went out with a hamstring injury before the Sept. 21 game against Providence, captain Vanessa Patry has seen more double teams from opposing defenses.

St. Louis holds tough

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

Playing 220 minutes of Top 10 soccer in only three days, the No. 11 Saint Louis men's soccer team (4-0-5) secured 0-0 results against both No. 3 Northwestern and No. 5 Creighton. The two ties extended SLU's shutout streak to five.

Offensively, however, coach Dan Donigan's Billikens squad was outshot in overtime against the Wildcats and the Bluejays by a combined total of 5-1. The back-to-back double-overtime matches continued a frustrating trend of scoreless SLU action against its nationally ranked counterparts. On Sept. 13, versus No. 7 Connecticut, the Billikens were also unable to find the back of the net despite out-shooting the Huskies 13-3.

Although the lingering zero occupying the Billiken loss column may look impressive, all of SLU's victories this season have come against unranked opponents with four wins or less. Meanwhile, only two Billiken-defeated opponents (4-4-2 Portland and 3-3-1 UC Riverside) have a record reaching .500.

The key to pulling the plug on this stalling SLU offense may be limiting senior forward Kyle Patterson. The incumbent Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Year has scored 33 percent of SLU's overtime goals and 35 percent of his team's total goals this season. In contrast, Dayton (6-2-1) has seen scores from seven different players thus far.

Also notable for the Billikens is the fact that the team's litany of 2008 ties have all come in double-overtime, when each of the five draws has been preserved by senior goalkeeper Pat Disbennett. The hometown Missouri native made a clutch dive to his right on a hard-struck Northwestern chance in the final minutes of play to preserve a heated rematch against the program that eliminated SLU from the 2006 NCAA tournament.

Disbenpett, the A-10's current goals-against average (0.66) and shutouts (six) leader, has remained outstanding in extra periods this season, allowing only one goal overall.

Donigan's squad faced two of the country's most prolific offenses last week, but Disbennett and A-10 Player of the Week honoree Tim Ream were equal to the task on defense. What earned the oft unheralded defense national recognition, however, was arguably Ream's surge of offensive support.

After feeding Patterson a near-miss opportunity in the second half of regulation, Ream nearly won the game himself in the second overtime with a towering shot from 35-yards out, but missed high. The All-Region defender is the second Billiken Player of the Week selection this season.

Having faced three of the top 10 ranked teams in the NCAA, the Billikens will look to remain unbeaten in upcoming conference road games with Fordham and Xavier.

A-10 showing parity

While No. 11 SLU remains unbeaten heading into conference play this week, only two A-10 teams have accumulated more than four wins. With Charlotte (8-1-0), Dayton (6-2-1) and the Billikens continually looking dominant, the dogfight for slots three through six in the conference tournament could get interesting.

Five of the conference's remaining 11 teams (4-3-3 Duquesne, 4-4-1 Fordham, 4-3-1 George Washington, 4-4-1 Rhode Island and 4-3-2 Temple) sit at or near .500.

In the aforementioned top-tier featuring the 49ers, Flyers and Billikens, the weekend of Oct. 25 could prove a key battlefield for the regular season first-place crown.

SLU, which has averaged over 2,000 home fans at Hermann Stadium this season, opens up its on-campus conference schedule with back-to-back matches against Charlotte and Dayton two weeks from now.

Charlotte slowly climbing

Outscoring opponents 24-8 thus far with only one non-conference match to go, Charlotte has gained steam in multiple national polls, appearing for the first time in Soccer America's rankings at No. 20 while moving up to No. 21 in the College Soccer News edition.

The 49ers plan to crack the coveted NSCAA Top 20 could come to fruition this week if Coach Jeremy Gunn's team can upset No. 12 Maryland (7-3-0) on the road in College Park.

After receiving a No. 23 ranking from the organization a week prior, the 49ers slipped from the Top 25 as the calendar page turned despite receiving over 30 votes in October's initial poll. Recent 49er action has included a 4-0 thrashing of Central Florida.

A-10 teams dominating

Three of the current top-four ranked NSCAA Mid Atlantic Region teams hail from the A-10. Charlotte is still ranked second in the region to SLU despite doubling the Billikens in wins and leading in various major offensive stat categories.

That is likely due to the schedule strength discrepancies, as No. 12 Maryland will be the first ranked opponent for Charlotte this year compared to SLU's pre-existing 0-0-3 record against top teams.

Dayton rounds out the Mid Atlantic's A-10 representatives at No. 4. The fiery Flyers, who racked up three ejections in September, look to extend a 16-game home unbeaten streak when they take on last-place Richmond (1-8-0) at Baujan Field this week.

DON'T MISS OUT ON THIS EXCELLENT OPPORTUNITY!

Senior Mike DeSantis and the Minutemen did well to slow down the potent Wake Forest offense. The Demon Deacons were averaging 3.6 goals per game but came away with only two against UMass.

Defense plays well in loss

and we are fighting for spots on the national team," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It's a whole different caliber of player, but I thought we matched up well and matched their strengths with our strengths pretty easily."

The Minutemen had a solid chance early in the game when forward Mark DeSantis dribbled past three defenders for the shot, only to have the ball stopped by Wake Forest goalkeeper Akira Fitzgerald.

The first goal of the game was scored by Demon Deacon's midfielder Sam Cronin off a scrum after a corner kick 35 minutes into the game. The ball managed to slip past goalkeeper Zack Simmons even though he got a hand on it.

"The first goal was kind of unlucky, it was kind of a scramble in front of the net and they were able to put it home," Simmons said.

Wake Forest was excellent at dribbling the ball and maintaining possession throughout most of the game and out shot UMass 19-7. However, the Minutemen played very well on defense, forcing the Demon Deacons to take the vast majority of their shots from 25-yards out and beyond, resulting in four shots on goal.

The two goals Wake Forest did score were below their average of 3.6 goals per game entering the contest.

"All 10 guys in front of me are defenders in a game like this and I thought that all of them played very well," Simmons said.

Wake Forest managed to extend their lead, six minutes into the second half when Cody Arnoux took advantage of a crossing pass from Lyle Adams. The junior and knocked the ball in, out of the reach of Simmons.

Wake Forest stifled UMass on offense for the majority of the game, particularly on set pieces when they crowded the Minutemen and prevented them from getting many clean shots.

"We didn't play simple, and we didn't play the way we were facing. They stripped us of the ball every time, we just didn't play quickly. [We had] one or two touches and then they would intercept our passes or take it off our feet," Koch said.

"Those are the things we talked about [in practice], when we didn't do it they exposed it, and when we did do it we were able to move the ball on them."

The Minutemen had a huge opportunity with eight minutes left in the game when Ben Arikian was fouled by Wake Forest in the box during a corner kick, resulting a in penalty kick.

The penalty kick got past the goalie, but bounced off the post as the Minutemen could not capitalize on a great chance to put pressure on Wake Forest, late in the game.

"We missed a penalty and if we put it in, the game is 2-1 and suddenly it's a whole different story," Koch said.

It was a tough loss for the Maroon and White to come close to major upset and not come away with a win. Still, the team feels confident as they head into Atlantic 10 conference play this Sunday against Rhode Island.

"I think we could have gotten away with letting up one goal tonight, and obviously that penalty kick is a goal we felt we should have had. So we definitely feel like we could have gotten a result tonight, which, would have been awesome," Simmons said.

"At the same time we are still sad that we lost, so it's a mixture of emotions, but now we are just looking forward and trying to get ready for Sunday's game."

UMass, NU linked by past

Coach Brown to face Huskies, 4-0 against his former team

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There are some connections between the football teams from Massachusetts and Northeastern.

Some may have come through controversy, but regardless, UMass may have got the best of them: Don Brown.

Brown was the head coach at Northeastern after spending the 1998 and 1999 seasons as the defensive coordinator for UMass – helping the Minutemen win the 1998 National Championship. After four successful seasons coaching the Huskies from 2000-03, Brown left Northeastern, in controversy, to return to UMass and take over the reins as head coach.

In Brown's time at Northeastern he led the team to a 27-20 mark, including two winning seasons of 8-4 in 2003 and 10-3 in 2002. The Huskies' 2002 record was their most wins in a single season and earned Northeastern a share of the Atlantic 10 title for the first time.

Since Brown has taken over the Minutemen, he has posted a 4-0 record against his former team. UMass has won 21 of its last 22 games against Northeastern. The streak extends back to 1985 and the one loss the Maroon and White have to Northeastern came in 2002 when Brown was coaching the Huskies.

Because of the history between the teams, a rivalry has clearly grown.

"Obviously there is some history there and we just got to keep our emotions in check and just go out and play another game," senior quarterback Liam Coen said.

Coen also added that the bitterness between the teams has died down in the past few years, and that to him it's just another game.

"It's another business trip, and we've got to go out and try to take care of business and play a good football team," Coen said.

When Brown came to UMass from Northeastern, he also brought members of his coaching staff with him: offensive coordinator Kevin Morris, defensive coordinator Keith Dudzinski and offensive line coach-run-game coordinator Brian Picucci.

A final connection between the two teams comes between two players. The Vanessa Lima has been out for more than two weeks, and the Minutewomen have felt her absence. Cristina Adams and Natalie Muka have seen more minutes since Lima's injury.

Lima hard to replace

Patry, offense feel the absence of forward

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After redshirt senior Vanessa Lima suffered a pulled hamstring prior to the Sept. 21 game against Providence, the Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy wondered how the Minutewomen were going to replace her presence. That question may no longer be relevant.

Rudy played Lima for 60 minutes on Friday against George Washington. She started in Sunday's game against Richmond but was taken out 26 minutes, 51 seconds into the game for freshman Natalie Muka.

Lima came back in after halftime and played the duration of the second half.

She has played a crucial role in the Minutewomen's success this season, as they are 3-1-2 during her starts. While she doesn't necessarily show up in the stat category, her veteran experience allows the offense to run smoothly.

Lima's veteran leadership was so important that Rudy tried putting her in at the end of the game after saying she felt fine during the practice on Sept. 25. He was forced to take her out after playing seven minutes in discomfort and she sat out the following game on Sunday against Temple.

As a result of her absence, Cristina Adams and Muka have had to make up for the injured Lima. However, neither has performed at a level high enough to keep pressure off of UMass' leading scorer Vanessa Patry.

The forward is now getting doubled because of how much the offense is running through her. If Lima comes back at full strength this weekend against Xavier and Dayton, she should take considerable pressure off of Patry and end a three-game scoreless streak for the Minutewomen (4-4-3, 1-2-1 Atlantic 10).

RUGGLES FEELING MORE COMFORTABLE

Midfielder Katie Ruggles – who injured her wrist in practice after the Sept. 4 game against New Hampshire – is starting to play a bigger role for UMass in each game she plays.

The junior missed four games and came back with a big cast. She was very aggressive in her return against St. Bonaventure on Sept. 26, making slide tackles and several steals.

Ruggles also took two shots against SBU but was primarily used on the defensive end and was a little off-balance due to the cast. The size of the cast affected her game because she was forced to

ALCS, NLCS set to start Thursday

Considering I hate the Boston Red Sox more than the entire Steinbrenner family, I promised my sports staff that if they were to win the World Series again this year, I would spend the next six months hibernating – because I simply can't deal with it.

Well, if some of these upcoming predictions hold true, I should sleep tight.

I'm a journalist, so the last thing I'm going to do is let any bias affect what I write.

But this is a column, so bring on the Red Sox bashing.

Since I can't pick my beloved Chicago White Sox, I'll go with the team who broke my heart – the Tampa Bay Rays.

Everyone has doubted them all season long. People will continue to do so and pick Boston. I still have my doubts, and I think Boston will win. But if you think I'm making that pick official and on record for all eternity in this newspaper – think again.

My pick: Rays in six.

NICK O'MALLEY:

Going into the ALCS the Boston Red Sox have the better top three starters, including Josh Beckett who has a 2.09 ERA in 11 career postseason starts. Meanwhile, the Tampa Bay Rays have little in terms of postseason experience on their side. This may not mean much, however, as youngsters Evan Longoria and B.J. Upton erupted this postseason.

My heart is telling me to go with the Red Sox, while my head is telling me to pick the Rays. The postseason rarely makes sense.

My pick: Red Sox in seven.

JEFFREY R. LARNARD:

The Rays had an exorcism, got rid of the devil in their name, and then became Godly. Everyone waited for them to collapse all season. They didn't. Others expect them to here, but they won't. They also went 10-8 against the Red Sox this year.

The Rays won three of the September games against the Red Sox off of Jonathan Papelbon, who was pitching in his third straight game and two games without Jason Bay. He's filled in so nicely for Manny Ramirez, I couldn't even notice the absence of "Manny wood."

But again, I have to go with experience, and the Red Sox take that one. They also have that Jon Lester guy (1-0, 16 IP, 0 ER, 3 BB, 11 K in ALDS).

My pick: Boston takes it in seven.

NLCS – PHILADELPHIA VS. LOS ANGELES
ELI ROSENSWAIKE

This series is a complete toss-up; it's just so even. One thing I know for sure, the Phillies are taking the series lead in game one. Cole Hamels is not losing at home. The rest of the series is up in the air.

My gut tells me go with the Phillies – despite the fact that the Dodgers are baseball's latest bandwagon team – because of Hamels and the home-field advantage, but I think Chad Billingsley and Jonathan Broxton will be the difference and win this series for L.A.

Since joining on Aug. 31, Manny Ramirez has given a spark to the Dodgers that has catapulted them to the National League Championship Series and a spot four wins away from the World Series.

Minutewomen look to continue success

Begin A-10 schedule with match against Richmond

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After starting the season an impressive 8-3, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team begins its conference schedule this weekend with games at Richmond and at home against Saint Louis.

UMass, which is having its best start to the season since 2000, will face the Spiders (3-8) on Friday. Though they have struggled thus far this season, Richmond was the class of the Atlantic 10 until the Minutewomen won the crown last season.

With their last conference title coming in 2006, the Spiders went on a run of five consecutive A-10 titles. During that time, the Spiders did not lose a game in the conference.

The Minutewomen, who possess the conference's best record and are the sole representative in the national Top 20 rankings, look to be in position to win the A-10 once again.

Before Richmond's streak, UMass was the last school to win the A-10 crown.

DEFENSE, THE BEST OFFENSE

With junior forward Cher King unavailable due to her participation in the Pan American games, the forward line was crippled when senior forward Katelyn Orlando left the second half of Saturday's game against Siena.

With the two offensive leaders out, the Minutewomen received contributions from their defenders. Sophomore Jaime Bourazeris put up two goals for the game, upping her total for the season to three. Meanwhile, fellow sophomore Jackie Tait tallied her first goal of the season off of a penalty shot in the second half.

Despite only having a handful of goals this season, the two defenders have hardly shied away from the goal. Tait is currently fourth on the team with 17 shots while Bourazeris has recorded 12.

Though the two play fullback on defense, Tait and Bourazeris play vital roles on the UMass corner setup. Both defenders have impressed with their abilities to put a laser of a shot on goal.

WILLIAMS TO TAKE OVER

Coming into the season, after the graduation of Becky Letourneau, the role of starting goalkeeper appeared to belong to Sarah Williams. However, with the emergence of freshman Alesha Widdall, Williams has only seen two starts this season.

Now that Widdall, like teammate King, is participating in the Pan American games in Mexico, Williams will be the team's starter as they enter conference play.

Under normal circumstances, the switch at goal would result in a weaker Minutewomen defense. However, Williams is not your ordinary backup.

Over her first two years at UMass,

Gibson film in Northampton

BY COLIN MCDONALD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The director motions for the crane swing downward as lawyers, businessmen and police file down the front stairs of the Northampton County Courthouse. There was no case held in the courthouse today, but in the film "Edge of Darkness," Mel Gibson has just stepped out into downtown Northampton.

The big-budget film has found a home in Northampton as cast and crew continue to film throughout the rest of the week. Despite the throngs of onlookers and temporarily restricted parking areas, no one seems to mind.

"I don't find it disruptive. I think it's good, financially," said John Hogan, a resident of Ware who works in Northampton.

The thriller, set to be released late next year, stars Mel Gibson as Thomas Craven, a Boston police officer who investigates the murder of his own daughter and uncovers a corporate cover-up and government conspiracy.

"Edge of Darkness" is based upon a miniseries released in the United Kingdom under the same name. The 1985 production was a big hit, widely hailed as an excellent work of film.

Robert De Niro was originally cast to support Gibson, but recently dropped the role due to "creative differences." His role has been given to Ray Winstone, famous for his character in the recent blockbuster hit, "The Departed."

Winstone will rejoin producer Graham King and writer William Monohan, a UMass alumnus, who both won Academy Awards for "The Departed" last year. "Edge of Darkness" is directed by Martin Campbell, known for his work on the James Bond films "GoldenEye" and "Casino Royale."

Hopes are high for the films release, but at present the crowds gathered on Main Street are content to watch the lengthy art of filming and to try to catch a glimpse of Gibson.

Observing on a very representative New England autumn day, Patrick Roche, a former University of Massachusetts student living in Hadley, said it is about time.

"Northampton is a charming community and I think it's great that the film industry has taken notice of its

"You hear about the casualties in the war, but you don't really think that this can happen to anyone you know," said University of Massachusetts senior Jenny Scott. "When I heard about my brother's injury, I was completely speechless."

Scott's older brother, Sgt. Brian Scott is a veteran of the Iraq war and a recent recipient of the Purple Heart Award, a medal given to members of the U.S. armed forces who have been wounded by the enemy.

Scott, who was stationed in East Baghdad in Iraq, was in charge of supervising and helping the Iraqi police force in East Baghdad. "We were trying to transfer our authority to theirs, to help them become more self-sufficient," he said.

Scott's humvee was attacked by enemy fire while waiting outside the Iraqi police station where an attack had occurred only minutes before.

"I was with the interpreter, trying to clear people from the area where the attacks had been, and that was when we were attacked," said Scott. During the attack, a piece of shrapnel was lodged into Scott's head and he was pinned between the seat of the humvee and the dashboard.

After he managed to free himself of the wreckage Scott immediately tried to resuscitate his gunner, Michael "Gonzo" Gonzalez, and pull him out from under the rubble while being fired at from surrounding rooftops. Scott was unable to revitalize Gonzalez.

Preceding the incident, Brian Scott was flown to the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., where he was treated for his injury. Although

Tough graduation

BY NETHA GILL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

A new study finds students in community college may face serious obstacles when it comes to pursuing an education in a four-year college.

This is cause for concern considering it is estimated that half of students attending public colleges were previously enrolled in a community college.

A working paper circulated in September by the National Bureau of Economic Research compares the successes of students who attended community college and those who started at a four-year college over a nine-year period. The study determined that there is a "decreased likelihood" of students who started at community college obtaining a bachelor's degree.

Another study, conducted by Terry Long of the Harvard School of Education and Michal Kurlaendar, professor at the University of California, Davis, determined the amount of the decrease was around 14.5 percent.

Students, however, are difficult to compare because the student demographic between two- and four-year colleges differ. On average, students attending community college are older, come from "disadvantaged backgrounds," and are more likely to be a minority.

Marching band needs to raise millions for new indoor practice facilities on campus

BY SADIE TRIMBERTA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Saturday's home football game kicked off a campus-wide fundraiser for the Minuteman Marching Band, which is trying to raise $10 million for a new band building.

Sections of the band walked around the outside of the stadium before the game performing for tailgating students and alumni handing out fliers and asking for donations.

The University has already agreed to spend $4.5 million on the new, state-of-the-art rehearsal and storage facility.

"We are thrilled the University is making the move; the current conditions are horrible," said director George Parks.

Since 1997, when structural problems at the Old Chapel forced it to close, the band has been essentially homeless. Grimmell Arena, an old basketball arena was renovated for the bands use. Grimmell, however, is too small for the almost 400 band members to practice in all at once, and lacks the necessary of storage space for uniforms and instruments.

Other improvised spaces are scattered across campus, acting as the band's music library and director's office, but some of those buildings are slated for destruction.

"I see these kids get home at 1 a.m. and it's raining," said Parks. "I see these kids with no place to get off this bus and put their stuff in a dry space. I see these kids carrying their stuff all over campus, the percussion lifting and hauling with no loading dock. We really need a place to sit and play together."

For these reasons the band is hoping to get enough funding to facilitate the construction of the new

Boost for speech pathologists

New grant to train teachers

BY CAMERON FORD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Two University of Massachusetts faculty members have received an $800,000 federal grant to enable them to train speech-language pathologists for public schools.

Communications disorders associate professor Mary Andrianopoulos and special education professor Mary Lynn Boscardin were awarded the grant under the Preparation of Leadership Personnel (PLP) program at the U.S. Department of Education.

The grant provides funding more than four years for postsecondary educational institutions to teach the skills necessary to providing special services for public school students with speech and language difficulties. The grant will fund the training of five UMass doctoral students who, as a part of their training, will also minor in special education.

Andrianopoulos says that speech-language pathologists play a critical role in the assessment, intervention, and management of students with a range of communicative disabilities in public schools.

The Department of Labor predicted in 2004 that there will be 49,000 new jobs for speech-language pathologists through 2012, amounting to a 27 percent increase in employment. This makes speech-language pathology the 12th fastest-growing career in the United States. Due to such a rapid increase in jobs, many are predicting a shortage of qualified individuals to train prospective speech-language pathologists to assist public school students.

Speech-language pathology is so vital to the education of students with speech impairments that the American Speech Language Hearing Association has dubbed the impending shortage a national crisis. Andrianopoulos and Boscardin both say that the grant will help to fill that void.

According to the PLP's official description in the Federal Register, the grant is only available to programs of study in special education or special education administration at the master's degree level or above. A three-part application process is required for someone to be considered for the grant, including a 50-page narrative describing the aspects of the program that the funding will be used for.

Andrianopoulos and Boscardin said the success of the proposal was owed to a joint collaboration by officials at the local, state, and federal levels. Senatorial support came from U.S. Sens. Edward Kennedy and John Kerry as well as Massachusetts State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst).

Charlena Seymore, UMass provost and senior vice chancellor for academic affairs, also provided assistance, as did public school officials in Agawam, Amherst, Chicopee, Holyoke, and Springfield. Further support came from the UMass Medical School in Worcester and the Eunice Kennedy Shriver Center.

Obama and McCain square off again

By Seema Mehta
Los Angeles Times

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — Voters leaning toward John McCain found themselves drawn to Barack Obama. Obama leaners found themselves entranced by words from McCain. And several voters who were undecided at the start of Tuesday's presidential debate found themselves in exactly the same place afterward.

In the den and kitchen at the home of Margaret Aragon de Chavez, about two dozen waffling voters who gathered to watch the debate proved an eerie echo of New Mexico's razor-thin presidential elections: There was no consensus who won among a group ranging in age from high school students to adults nearing retirement.

Joseph Morgan, 26, said he hopes to soon buy a house, and he found McCain's economic policy reassuring.

"What's the economy going to be like when I decide to make investments for my children's future?" he asked.

Valerie Quintana, a 33-year-old who works in behavioral health, sharply disagreed.

"I heard something completely different," she said. "I thought McCain was pointing the finger a lot, and I heard more solid answers from Obama than McCain. ... His priorities align more with mine on energy, health care and social security."

Some, like Katherine Anzures, a 54-year-old manager, yearned for more information. She is leaning toward Obama, but has a nagging fear that his lack of military experience could be risky for the country. She was one of several at the party who found the candidates' finger-pointing annoying.

"I'm still very, very undecided," she said. "It's like they're blaming each other and not giving us the true facts."

The gathering was spawned by Aragon de Chavez, the ex-wife of the city's three-term mayor, Martin Chavez. During their 17-year marriage, Aragon de Chavez grew accustomed to running in political circles and meeting candidates at fancy fundraisers. After their divorce in 2003, she said she felt disenfranchised.

In her former life, Aragon de Chavez on Tuesday would have attended an up-to-$12,300-per-person fundraiser/debate-watching party across town that featured Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and her ex-husband.

"It's humbling not to be the wife of the mayor," said the 49-year-old single mother of two, who said politicians pay little attention to ordinary voters.

"A lot of people in my situation, just average working Americans, don't really feel the process has included us," she said. So Aragon de Chavez came up with the idea of "Smart Parties," gatherings where undecided voters watch the debates and then have civil discussions about the candidates.

"I'm trying to empower people," she said. "The information needs to come from themselves, not from rumors and innuendos about the candidates ... or 30-second sound bites."

The ground rules are simple: The gatherings should be small, about a dozen or so people of varying political leanings. Post-debate discussions must be respectful.

"THERE SHOULD BE FOOD, OF COURSE!!!" she wrote in a document detailing the "Smart Party" concept.

Aragon de Chavez held her first party the night of the first presidential debate, inviting friends, neighbors and co-workers. Tuesday night, a half dozen similar gatherings took place around New Mexico.

Her motivation is not solely to increase political discourse -- she, too, needs to decide how to vote. A Democrat and a staunch fillllary Rodham Clinton supporter in the primaries, Aragon de Chavez remains undecided between Democrat Obama and Republican McCain.

I am "part of that class of people who seemed to be demonized consistently by Obama. We're the bad guys," he said. "This candidate who is supposed to be uniting is dividing."

Hostess Aragon de Chavez's daughter, Martinique, a political science student at the nearby University of New Mexico, disagreed, to a point. The 18-year-old came to the party heavily leaning toward McCain in this, her first presidential election. Obama, she said, "was all talk and didn't have any experience."

But during the debate, Obama "connected more to the issues that I am worried about," particularly the economy. "It's scary," she said.

"I'm more confused than ever," she added.

McNair is new SGA chancellor of elections

The Student Government Association Senate confirmed last night University of Massachusetts senior Sean McNair as its new chancellor of elections.

McNair, was nominated by Central Area Governor Dave Robertson. "Sean has provided insight and assistance to me in re-establishing the Central Area Government," said Robertson. "I am confident that his wealth of knowledge and previous experience as an SGA senator will make him a valuable asset to the campus."

McNair said one of his main goals is to increase voter turnout for campus elections. Some of his ideas include organizing a SPIRE-driven online voting system with the help of the Office of Information Technology (OIT) and publicizing future elections extensively on campus.

McNair's nomination received approval from the senate. However, several senators voted in abstention. They all declined to comment.

When asked what he thought of the abstentions, McNair said, "I think there might have been some confusion over the idea of an electronic ballot. I would like to find out who abstained and speak to them about their concerns so I could help change policy to reflect what they believe in."

"I think that certain senators abstained because they might not know enough about Sean yet," said Robertson. "However, I assure everyone that he is willing to do the job to the fullest extent and will help everyone's voice be heard."

Robertson also announced the appointment of Alan Stevenson as the Central area senator-at-large. Stevenson said he hopes to increase campus unity and "to expand people past their communities or living areas on campus. This is the best way to keep students involved on their campus and to get them to continue working together."

Economy makes travel tough

By Sheta Rebhapragada
Independent Florida Alligator (U. Florida)

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — As a result of the poor economy, the study abroad industry has slowed, and the number of students in some organizations has decreased, said Chris Schiffhauer, the executive director of operations for Abroadco, a study abroad company.

The study abroad industry has experienced a trend of students choosing the shorter and less expensive summer programs, said Kelly Corrigan, the marketing and university relations director for University Studies Abroad Consortium.

Corrigan said her organization and others are having difficulties making study abroad trips accessible to all students.

Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae aren't stopping. UF students from going overseas, but the high price of studying abroad has forced students to alter their plans to make the trip more affordable.

As a result of the current economic turmoil, the study abroad industry has slowed, and the number of students in some organizations has decreased, said Chris Schiffhauer, the executive director of operations for Abroadco, an Arizona-based independent study abroad company.

Schiffhauer said he thinks many employers value studying abroad.

He said studying abroad is a vital part of a college education, so families will find a way to send their sons or daughters overseas.

"We have noticed that the number of students who are using financial aid to study abroad has increased," he said.

Because the currency exchange rates are unfavorable to the U.S. dollar, Schiffhauer said, his company was required to raise its prices.

UF study abroad advisers couldn't be reached for comment.

Kelly Corrigan, the marketing and university relations director for University Studies Abroad Consortium, a Nevada-based independent study abroad company, said despite the downward-spiraling U.S. economy, the number of students interested in studying abroad has remained the same.

However, the study abroad industry has experienced a trend of students choosing the shorter and less expensive summer programs, Corrigan said.

She said she believes her organization and others are having difficulties making study abroad trips accessible to all students.

"I think what we're challenged with is finding scholarship opportunities for the students and making sure there are tons of options for them," she said.

Kristel Gomez, a UF freshman, said the first question she asks study abroad advisers is if they offer scholarships and financial aid.

Suzanne Rommelfanger, a program development consultant for CAPA International Education, another study abroad center, said she doesn't believe the bad exchange rates will stop students from studying abroad in Europe.

"I think London and Florence will always be hot spots," she said. "They are traditional destinations, and they are never really going to go out of favor just because of what they are and what they can offer to students."

Students shouldn't let the current economic situation stand in the way of a study abroad experience, Rommelfanger said.

"I'd say you can't put a price on it," she said. "It only happens once or maybe twice in a lifetime, and where there is a will, there is a way."

Financial stresses

Jason Cunningham, a junior at the University of Massachusetts who formerly attended Quincy Community College, is of the same opinion, saying the majority of students "did whatever they had to do ... then they transferred."

So if the possibility of transferring and attaining a degree does exist, where do the problems occur exactly?

"A lot of policy is putting a lot of pressure on the community colleges," said Long. "And they are not supported financially."

Cunningham agrees.

He said he had to pay $2,000-to-$3,000 at Quincy College, while his financial situation at the UMass is much more stable as he is a resident advisor.

Another factor under discussion is the motives of students, which varies widely regardless of the type of institution that they attend.

As David S. Baime, vice president for government relations at the American Association, said, "... what students say they plan to do, what they want to do, what they really want to do often changes ... in the course of their college education."

URI looks to harness offshore wind power

By Mark Scialla
The College Hill Court Courier, (U. Rhode Island)

KINGSTON, R.I. — The University of Rhode Island Graduate School of Oceanography is working with the state in its historic attempts to harness the power of offshore winds for renewable energy.

According to David Farmer, dean of the GSO, the project will give Rhode Islanders access to new and clean methods of energy consumption and will make the latest career and research opportunities available to students. The project will also set new precedents and make Rhode Island a leader in the search for alternative energies.

"It is fantastic," said Associate Dean of the GSO Kate Moran. "Everyone is excited because we think that we'll be the first in the country. We need to get off fossil fuel."

The proposed offshore wind energy project could provide for 15 percent of Rhode Island's electricity usage. The proposal is expected to cost more than $1 billion.

Rhode Island Office of Energy selected the GSO to work in partnership with the Rhode Island Coastal Resource Management Council. The GSO and CRMC form the Special Area Management Plan, which is gathering important data about marine ecosystems and wildlife, migratory birds and tourism. The SAMP will decide the exact location of the country's first offshore wind farm in Rhode Island.

The Endeavor, the GSO's research vessel, is now prowling local waters conducting sea floor surveys.

The GSO research team, made up of URI graduate students, professors and scientists, will pass its findings on to the CRMC. As part of SAMP, the URMI ultimately has the final say over the use of state waters, the approval of the project and where it would be built.

Farmer explained that it is the CRMC's responsibility to find land to use for the project. "All state waters can be considered, but the current area of focus is where Block Island is," Farmer said. SAMP is working to ensure the project would not affect wildlife, tourism and shipping lanes.

Moran serves as the senior adviser to the CRMC leadership. Through research and engineering studies, Moran will determine the location and types of facilities that will be constructed in state waters.

"We do not want to cite areas with strong currents or waves," Moran said. "We will do an assessment of sea turtles and mammals and how they could be affected."

Farmer also worked on the Wind Energy Proposal Evaluation Team, which reviewed the various developers bidding for the wind farm contract. The team collectively decided to choose Deepwater Wind as the contractor. The decision was based on what would be the best economic and environmental interests for the state. Farmer and Moran concurred that the project is going to generate new jobs in the emerging green industry.

"It will be an area of growth," Moran said. "It's one of the first green jobs, it has the potential to be a long-term career."

Northampton Mayor Mary Clare Higgins feels the production is very beneficial to the community.

Other areas of filming include Mount Sugarloaf State Park, which will be closed until Oct. 10 for filming. building. The new facility will include a large rehearsal area where all the members of the band can sit and practice together, as well as locker rooms and changing rooms, storage rooms for uniforms and instruments, and a place for the band members to sit and eat lunch or relax on their break during practice.

For all of this to become a reality, the band will need between $8 and $10 million.

"We are very excited with the initial allocation from the University, but the cost of building has gone up, so we need to raise funds to keep moving forward," said Parks.

Both students and alumni have been making donations, with the current number of pledges equaling $1.5 million. Along with money from the school, the band needs $2 million to $4 million more for the project to be realized.

Band members are taking money out with their credit cards to donate to the band, and alumni are getting involved by making one-time donations. They can also donate $20 a month for about five years, which will get their name on the wall of the new rehearsal room.

The band is still actively looking for donations, as the Oct. 31st deadline to raise the rest of the money is quickly approaching.

Parks and band members alike are worried that if they don't hit their goal, important parts of the building will have to be cut out.

Parks said he thinks the band has brought a certain prestige to the University at large, and an air of class and healthy competition.

"[The Minuteman Marching Band is a] positive image for the university, doing positive things", said Parks. "These kids love the band, and are loyal to UMass. It's like a family to anyone who has ever been in the band."

Transport caution

Amherst is not a normal town, even when it comes to traffic. Thousands of students cross the streets on their way to and from the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College campuses.

Bicycles are a constant presence on the road, and, to round our picture out, many of the cars in Amherst are driven by out-of-town (or out-of-state) students, unaccustomed to driving in a pedestrian-dense area.

For all parties involved, the roads in Amherst are not safe. At the least, they are not as safe as they can be. Last Thursday, a UMass graduate student crossing Massachusetts Avenue in front of the Haigis Mall was struck by a car and thrown 20 feet, suffering serious injury. This could have happened to anyone.

Near-accidents occur every day in Amherst during the Academic year. Students cross the streets without taking traffic into account. Cyclists move freely from sidewalks to breakdown lanes, and blow through stop lights and stop signs.

Drivers express their frustration by asserting their presence on the road – by honking, yelling, shaking fists, and – when right-of-way is unclear – cutting off pedestrians and cyclists.

During the summer, things are different. The student population is largely diminished, and the atmosphere on the roads is one of cooperation. Cyclists move with the flow of traffic. Pedestrians look both ways. Cars stop before crosswalks without putting up a fight. The roads are safe as they can be.

Once the academic year begins, things change. The roads in Amherst are clogged with pedestrians and vehicles. Bicycles are everywhere, and helmets are few and far between. Nothing goes smoothly, and the atmosphere turns sour.

When it comes to traffic, lives are at stake. Serious injury can mean the end of a semester, or of a college career. Safety is a community responsibility. It is up to every member of the UMass and Amherst communities to make sure that the roads are a safe place for pedestrians, bicycles, and cars.

For all parties involved, safety requires consideration. For pedestrians, this means looking both ways, crossing in the crosswalk, and having an awareness of dangerous times and places. The early evening is the worst time, when the glare of the sunset can temporarily blind drivers. Higher speed limits, sharper corners and smaller roads mean more danger.

For drivers, consideration means stopping for pedestrians in crosswalks and driving at appropriate speeds through pedestrian-dense areas. Drivers must also be considerate of cyclists.

By law, a bicycle is a vehicle, and has every right to occupy the road. If a cyclist waits in an intersection and follows a traffic-light, it is the responsibility of drivers to treat that cyclist as a fellow vehicle. If a cyclist is riding in the road on a narrow street, drivers should slow until they are able to pass that cyclist safely.

For cyclists, consideration means obeying the rules. Cyclists do not have free reign to act as vehicles and as pedestrians, choosing one over the other at their convenience. When a cyclist takes the liberty of blowing through an intersection, other cyclists are put at risk. If cyclists do not obey the rules of the road, neither will drivers.

If every member of the community takes their responsibility for the safety of others, the roads at UMass will be safe. Look out for cars, look out for bicycles, and look out for pedestrians. It's the best way to look out for each other.

Consume wisely

Solmaaz Yazdiha

In a recent ad campaign, good ol' Kentucky Fried Chicken announced that if anyone mentions the words "world hunger," during this past Tuesday's presidential debate, the popular fast food joint will donate $20,000 to World Hunger Relief. The silent ad went something like this.

"We're hearing a lot of rhetoric. But the silence on world hunger is deafening. Every six seconds a child dies from starvation. It's time to do something about it. If anyone mentions world hunger during Tuesday's debate, KFC will donate $20,000 to World Hunger Relief. End the silence on hunger."

It's quite a nice ad, with tragic shots of starving children every couple of seconds. It's an ad that in fact probably cost more than $20,000 to air. Furthermore, $20,000 doesn't seem very generous from a multi-billion dollar corporation.

Turns out, KFC is owned by the Yum! Brands, Inc., a company which also owns Pizza Hut, Taco Bell, A&W and Long John Silvers. The company recently announced a worldwide commitment to raise $80 million over the next five years to donate to the World Food Programme, making 200 million meals available to hungry children in developing countries.

The announcement was made at the Clinton Global Initiative by Bill Clinton himself during a session where he explained that Yum! Brands' commitment will make it possible for one million children to receive a meal at school every day for a year.

The company also promises 20 million volunteer hours to hunger relief, $200 million worth of prepared food for hunger agencies and to spread global awareness of widespread hunger issues. Mmm, fried chicken for all.

Though this is a pleasing stray from the usual selfish tactics of big business, how about instead of the candidates playing along with this offer, world-hungering this and that, they make some actual policies that take some of the money away from bombers and put it towards growling bellies?

Overall it's obvious that food needs to be treated less like an unlimited resource and more like a privilege.

NPR reported that 38 million people in America alone are considered "food insecure," meaning they have difficulty finding the means to keep food on the table.

According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA), more than 13 million families could not buy the food they needed in 2004. It's frightening to think of how much that number has increased to today amidst the economic crisis. NPR explained that one or more members in 5 million of those families go hungry because finances are so tight.

Many of us at this university have meal plans. We use our meal card swipes like tickets to an all-you-can-eat buffet. We sample just about anything that looks appetizing and throw away food that fails to tickle our taste buds without a backwards glance.

According to the USDA, if only 5 percent of Americans recovered the food scraps they toss away, it would amount to one day's worth of food for 4 million people. How's that for cutting off the crust?

About 25.9 million tons of perfectly edible food is thrown away a year. And, according to the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA), it costs the U.S. government $1 billion a year to dispose of food waste.

So, instead of spending tax dollars on schools or roads, you spend it on last night's meatloaf, which was so bad you threw it out and ordered Chinese.

It's not just about wasting food, it's about setting yourself up to waste. It's having the mentality that your resources won't run out. This problem lies in the bigger-is-better attitude we find in American society.

With people super-sizing this and adding sides to that, they're finishing less of their meal, spending more of our money, and leaving empty bellies overseas unfed.

Besides all these issues, CNN has said that much of landfills are composed of food scraps. When food rots, it releases methane, which is a greenhouse gas. The EPA says that methane is 20 times more hazardous to the environment than carbon dioxide.

Overall, it's obvious that food needs to be treated less like an unlimited resource and more like a privilege. Many of us have no idea what it's like to go to bed hungry at night. It's about time we took a second to imagine.

Go on, eat Dolly

Nathan Gelson

The Food and Drug Administration's recent announcement that the consumption of cloned meat and the products of cloned animals, such as milk, is safe, has led some to fear that this could lead to the mass production and consumption of cloned animals.

This, however, is extremely unlikely. Before the ramifications of this ruling is discussed, it is necessary to brush briefly over its conclusions. Announcing the FDA's findings at a press conference, Stephen F. Sundlof, director of the FDA's Center for Veterinary Medicine said, "The [report] concludes that meat is currently too expensive to be practical for food production, but farmers could clone top-quality animals for breeding ... there are currently estimated to be several hundred cloned cows in the United States, out of a total U.S. cattle population of about 100 million."

The expense and value of cloned animals further decrease the likelihood of someone coming across cloned meat while eating, although not entirely impossible.

Despite the FDA's ruling on the safety of cloned food, many do not and will never eat anything from a cloned animal. Some probably because they don't fully trust the FDA's decision, others for a variety of reasons, from personal and milk from cattle, swine, and goat clones are as safe to eat as meat and milk from non-cloned animals."

Personally, I see nothing wrong with the consumption or creation of cloned animals

Despite the widespread public discomfort with the idea of eating cloned animals, I have little doubt that the FDA is correct on the nutritional value and lack of dangers posed by the consumption of cloned meat.

According to NPR, "After six years of intensive research on whether meat, muscle tissue and milk from cloned animals are fit for human consumption, the FDA says they 'are as safe as food we eat every day.'"

For those still worried about the consequences of this decision, and who have envisioned a massive increase in the use of cloning, there is little to be worried about with the immediate impact of the bill and more to be concerned about with its potentially far-reaching consequences as well as what it could allow for the future.

First of all, the public is too wary of the issue of cloning to allow anyone to attempt to take advantage of the decision and begin creating massive amounts of cloned animals.

Ever careful, according to NPR, "the FDA is asking cloning companies like ViaGen Inc. and Trans Ova Genetics to continue the moratorium on cloning animals for food until consumers can adjust to the idea of eating meat that started in a Petri dish. The U.S. Department of Agriculture also called for a hold on the distribution of cloned animal foods for the time being, pending consultations on how they will be introduced into the market."

The entire situation is being handled very carefully, due to the publics' fear of cloning, spawned undoubtedly by the modern media and many peoples' overactive imaginations.

More importantly, the process of cloning itself is extremely expensive. According to the BBC, "Cloning animals religious beliefs that discourage cloning to those who refuse to eat meat in any form. However, there is a large difference between whether someone can safely eat food from cloned animals, and whether one should eat food from cloned animals.

While I will attempt to remain in discussion of the former, I may briefly brush on the latter. However, the reason that I will not attempt to tackle what one should do is that it is largely dependant on one's own personal values and beliefs.

Nevertheless, it is important to recognize the fact that those who oppose the use and or consumption of cloned animals because of their values greatly affect the decisions of those facing the choice to either market or not market products from cloned animals.

While logically the FDA's endorsement that cloned animals and their progeny are safe to eat has brought the cause in support of cloning a long way, negative public perceptions of cloning as dangerous persist. The strength of the religious and moral beliefs of those who oppose cloning make many hesitant and reticent about introducing food made from cloned animals to the general public.

This fear of outcry has led most to tread carefully on the issue. Personally, I see nothing wrong with the consumption or creation of cloned animals.

If there are no negative affects on those that consume the animals, and those caring for the animals are willing to pay for cloned animals to benefit their herd, it seems like there is nothing to lose.

There is no need to be afraid of new technology and new ways of doing things, provided they are carefully studied and researched beforehand, as the use of cloned animals seems to have been by the FDA.

Three's no crowd

S.P. Sullivan

I didn't know Ralph Nader was running for president again until about an hour before the interview.

Nader, who spoke at the Bowker Auditorium in Stockbridge Hall Sunday, was available for a phone interview last Thursday. I took the hour beforehand to bring myself up to speed on his campaign, which he said has been given the cold shoulder by the mainstream media.

I agree.

Nader said that he's found himself "in a Catch-22," in which he doesn't have enough numbers in the polls, which are run by the mainstream media, to take part in the debates, which are run by the mainstream media. But he asked how, exactly, he was supposed to pull those kinds of numbers when the mainstream media has ignored him.

Nader made a splash in the blogosphere recently when he met with Washington Post editors. He reportedly asked them why they weren't covering his campaign. They told him it was because he had no chance of winning.

"Then why are you covering the Nationals?" he asked.

Most people are vaguely aware that Nader is running without giving any thought to it. He is seen out of their political peripheral vision, scowling slack-shoulderd off to the side grumbling something about seatbelts.

But this year is a little different.

Nader is on the ballot in 45 out of 50 states, plus Washington, D.C., The states in which he isn't on the ballot – Texas, North Carolina, Georgia, Oklahoma and Indiana – probably aren't going to vote for Obama, let alone Nader.

He told me that in 2004, Democrats sued "24 times in 18 states in 12 days" to keep him off ballots in several states, including Massachusetts. He said his campaign in Massachusetts has faired well in the past because, in a state so overwhelmingly blue, people "feel freer to vote their consciences."

Just not in 2004.

"Our campaign suffered a precipitous decline in 2004 as the result of running as a write-in," he said.

Nader is on the ballot in Mass. this year, and he said he's the only candidate likely to step foot in the Pioneer Valley.

"Obama's got it in the bag and McCain's writing it off," he told me.

Nader's campaign is a throwback to a time before Gallup polls and focus groups told candidates who was voting for them three months before the election. In fact, Nader blamed polling for the disconnect between voters and candidates at his speech Sunday.

Most people are vaguely aware that Nader is running without giving any thought to it.

"I believe you should make your vote hard to get," he said. "Why flag your vote so early when the pollster calls? Make them work for it."

Nader, however, is campaigning across the country, even in the states he's not on the ballot. John McCain won't even campaign in states that have vegan restaurants. Barack Obama won't go anywhere that can't pronounce his name.

I don't think Ralph Nader is going to be president. I don't really think he should be, either. Neither do a lot of the people working for him. Nader himself runs a campaign based more on reforming the two-party system than anything else.

But I respect his right to exist as a candidate.

I don't even want to address the "spoiler question" – what Nader called "that politically bigoted word." Ralph Nader doesn't take votes from anybody. Ralph Nader earns votes that somebody else could've earned if they tried hard enough.

It is cynicism with the political system, "tactical voting," as Nader calls it, that makes people think a third-party candidate "spoils" anything.

Nader and his running mate Matt Gonzalez, a civil rights attorney and Democrat-turned-Green-turned-Independent San Francisco politician, are running two campaigns.

The first is their presidential campaign, ill-fated but not in vain. The second is a campaign to open the debates to third party candidates. They're not advocating a free-for-all between every Democrat, Republican, Independent, Green, Socialist, Constitution and Boston Tea party candidate who throws their hat in.

They're asking to open the debates to any ticket on the ballot in enough states to win. Like 45, for instance.

Ralph Nader isn't the answer to our problems. But one day the answer might come along, and – given the current state of American politics – they might not be a member of what Nader calls "the Democrat-Republican party." In fact, after watching the debates, I would hope they aren't.

If we do find that answer, though, I would hope they'd have access to debates, and won't be ignored by our political process.

When Nader was asked what he would tell supporters who wanted to vote for him, but feared that doing so would spoil the chances of a "lesser evil," and an Obama/Biden presidency, he quoted another ill-fated politician.

He quoted former socialist candidate and union leader Eugene V. Debs:

"It is better to vote for what you want and not get it than to vote for what you don't want and get it," he said.

Nader's campaign will probably go the way of the Debs' campaign. But I think historically, it'll prove just as important to the democratic process.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

A taxing issue

No more taxation

Brad DeFlumeri

Winston Churchill said, "I contend that for a nation to try to tax itself into prosperity is like a man standing in a bucket and trying to lift himself up by the handle."

Massachusetts voters will have an important choice before them when they consider Question 1 – the state income tax repeal – on the ballot Nov. 4.

Voters can choose to affirm the excessive fiscal mismanagement that has been so pervasive on Beacon Hill the past few decades, or we can choose to declare our discontent and – finally – hold our state legislature accountable for its inability to spend our money wisely.

Beyond the General Court, Gov. Deval Patrick has proven unable to stand up to the police, toll-taker unions, and various other public sector deadbeats. They have for so long wantonly disregarded the taxpayers who fund their salaries.

Instead they negotiated obscenely unnecessary compensation packages wholly out of proportion with the private sector, with the help, of course, of influence-peddling legislators.

Patrick rode into the governor's mansion in part on the promise that he would rid the state of needless and confiscatory police details for utility and construction work.

Across the state, anti-tax repeal forces have already outspent backers of the question by a 10-to-1margin.

When he took office we were the only state in the country with such details, and today we remain the only state in which you will find a 25-year police veteran gobbling up taxpayer money to serve as a traffic signal.

In fact, according to the Boston Globe, "The state currently spends about $20 million to $25 million annually on police details."

What about our friends, the toll-takers? As Boston talk show icon Howie Carr recently observed, "If the administration was really interested in putting an end to this nonsense, they would tear down the toll booths and propose an increase in the gasoline tax. It costs less than a penny to collect a dollar in tax at the pump. At the tollbooth it costs maybe 30 cents to collect a dollar. But what do you expect when your toll-takers are making $70,000 plus with overtime and health benefits and a person for the exact same unskilled job that a 16-year-old at the supermarket is paid minimum wage to perform?"

The above examples illustrate just two instances of taxpayer rape in a state whose political culture inverts the historic notion that government is justly of the people and for the people.

On the contrary, here in Massachusetts we all work for the politicians who are running the state billions of dollars into debt and the public sector unions who leverage legislation in their favor with the promise of delivering votes.

Across the state, anti-tax repeal forces have already outspent backers of the question by a 10-to-1margin. They have spared no measure of faux outrage in their verbal attacks on the intelligence of the average Massachusetts voter.

They referred to the tax repeal initiative as everything from "reckless," to "urban lynching by statute," as Worcester City Councilor Frederick Rushton did recently.

Here, too, in the union-supporting taxpayer-averse cesspool of socialism known as UMass, this battle over Question 1 has been front and center."

With the reliably anti-taxpayer Student Government Association (SGA) and Graduate Employment Organization (GEO) fear-mongering their way into classes all over campus with nonsensical pleas to "Vote No on One" or else "UMass may be closed down."

But the earth wouldn't stop spinning on its axis if Massachusetts followed Alaska, Florida, Nevada, South Dakota, Texas, Washington, and Wyoming by abolishing its state income tax.

To the contrary, taxpayers, having affirmed their liberty and check on excessive government would refuse to be the engine driving the runaway gravy train of Massachusetts political corruption.

The corruption is characterized by catastrophically expensive public projects like the Big Dig and bloated public agencies like the MBTA and MassPort.

Needed cuts would surely have to be made. But rather than coming from your paycheck, they would come from the plaster of excess on Beacon Hill, long gorged on by public "servants" and public unions alike.

Reduced tax burdens would be a boon to the state's economy in terms of an influx of new businesses and young educated workers. Innovation and entrepreneurship would increase with this infusion of intellectual capital while government-dependence inducing programs and a nationally-mocked culture of government ineptitude would be thankfully stripped away.

As Jeff Jacoby of the Globe declared Sunday:

"Yes, Question 1 is a 'blunt budget ax.'

As a last resort, that is sometimes the only tool that can get a job done. For years Massachusetts taxpayers have been seeking tax relief by more temperate means.

And what have patience and moderation gotten us?

Time and again, the voters' restraint has been repaid with disdain by a political class that seems to believe there is no higher or better use for our money than government expenditure. Nothing has penetrated the politicians' indifference to the frustration and anxiety of so many Massachusetts residents. Maybe a blunt budget ax will get their attention."

Let's use that ax and Churchill's bucket to hit Beacon Hill over the head. End Massachusetts' tyranny over your wallet. Demand liberty. Vote Yes on One.

Just cut pork spending

Nicholas O'Malley

With the current economic crisis plaguing our nation and recent attempts to counteract it, any change in financial policy on any level is a risk. Such is the case with Question 1 on the ballot, the elimination of the income tax in Massachusetts.

At first glance, you would think that with the elimination of the income tax, there would be some sort of compensation for the loss of tax money, some way to counteract the revenue that is generated by the taxpayers.

Question 1, however, provides no such clause. The plan is to simply cut out the income tax.

With the supposed cut, the state of Massachusetts would lose $12 billion in revenue. The town of Amherst alone would lose $7,281,492 in state aid, a 65 percent cut. My hometown of Bellingham will be losing an almost identical cut, percentage-wise.

All of these numbers are according to one of the most obscure and subtle resources on the topic that took me hours of painstaking research to find – votenoquestion1.com.

The focal point in the argument against Question 1 is the notion that the tax cuts will result in setbacks in most state-run areas. Education, health care, public works and public safety would all suffer due to the policy.

In response to the loss of revenue, proponents of Question 1 cite the benefits for individuals and inefficiencies on the part of the Commonwealth. In May, a survey by Citizens for Limited Taxation showed that there is a "41 percent waste in Massachusetts state government."

According to www.smallgovernmentact.com, the repeal of the income tax would result in direct benefits to Massachusetts workers. With no income tax, 3,400,000 Massachusetts taxpayers would see their wallets an average of $3,700 heavier.

In total, the tax cut that would reduce state spending from $47 billion to $35 billion, the mark at which Massachusetts spending was in 1999.

This, of course, poses the question of where exactly the state will be cutting this spending.

It would be wonderful to believe that the Commonwealth, upon losing so much revenue, would deeply investigate where the supposed 41 percent waste in spending is and make cuts there.

This, however, is based upon the assumption of two points. Everyone agrees on what is a waste of spending and that government officials will actually make the cuts there.

When people talk about wasted government money, it's usually spent on things that politicians like, things that make them look good and things they get for free. Neither of these things, though, includes the school you go to, your health care or your town's public works department.

We would all like to see the elimination of cushy perks for politicians and worthless government projects, but we all know those won't be the first things to go.

We would all like to see the elimination of cushy perks for politicians and worthless government projects, but we all know those won't be the first things to go.

What will be going are school programs, hospital benefits and road and bridge maintenances. Except, of course, for the millions upon millions of dollars the Big Dig and other projects take away from Massachusetts taxpayers.

You might have seen the posters strewn across campus shunning Question 1. This makes sense since, as a state school, UMass would receive massive cuts from the state as a result of the cut of the income tax. Even apathetic students should realize that, as opposed to the presidency, Question 1 directly affects college students.

While all of the cuts would be happening, it is assumed that we'd all be quite content with or $3,700 in tax cuts. However, the state would still be free to raise fees in other areas. So in the long run, we may not be able to get that money.

More importantly, however, is the timing of the question. We are in the middle of one of the worst economic crises this nation has ever seen and we just recently came up with a plan to attempt to crawl out of this financial debacle.

The time at which this question is coming up is horrendous. It doesn't even matter whether or not Question 1 is a good idea under normal financial circumstances, it simply wouldn't work this year.

The question is not whether or not Question 1 is a good idea, it's whether or not to vote Yes in the 2008 election, and the answer is no.

So, the notion that taking billions out of state's revenue would be a good idea at this time is ridiculous. These are hard times for everyone and we could use the tax breaks. But so could the government.

ABORTED REASONING

Dear Editor:

(In response to the "1/4th of our generation has been aborted" chalked signs around campus)

This is nonsense. You can't say that 'our generation' includes any number – and especially not some hideous percentage – of people that never lived. Typical of anti-abortion rhetoric, this stance ignores the rights of women.

If you claim that "1/4th of our generation has been aborted," you have to acknowledge the millions of pregnant yet unprepared women who have been having these abortions.

Whether they were too young, too unstable, too poor, or emotionally or physically unprepared for motherhood, these women elected to terminate their pregnancies. Once you peel back the shrieking layers of religious and moral objection, there is a woman in a difficult situation who is exercising a civil right.

The horrid and sensationalist (and inaccurate) graffiti covering campus shamelessly implies that legalized abortion has been tantamount to mass murder.

This is the most common deflection used by the pro-lifers. If your mind is full of images of blood, you're playing on their terms. Since they're 'pro-life,' the people arguing with them must be 'pro-death.' And if death has clouded your vision, you'll forgive or ignore the fact that they want to destroy a progressive and essential part of women's rights.

A BIGGER THREAT

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Acknowledging Iran and our Future." Ted Rogers, Editorial, Sept. 30)

It seems that every two weeks Ted Rogers writes a column, and every two weeks I have to write a letter to correct his misstatements. This time it's Israel, Iran, and as Rogers' puts it, "mean-spirited" Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

I don't dispute Rogers' belief that Iran is a problem far more complex than is generally understood by the majority of Americans. This unfortunately includes all too many politicians on both sides of the aisle, but as I have repeatedly said before, I refuse to remain silent as Rogers' disseminates information that is patently false. The only way to convince the world to treat the Iranian threat with the proper gravity is to be brutally honest in assessing it.

Rogers claims that we "shouldn't try to exaggerate the threat." Does he mean the threat to the United States? That is perhaps true until they achieve the ability to launch a satellite into orbit, which would demonstrate their ability to deliver a warhead to almost anywhere on the planet.

But as for Israel, the threat is real, and cannot be exaggerated. The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) estimates are now that Iran could have enough uranium for a bomb as soon as 2010 if they continue to accelerate their enrichment program at the current rate.

Let's be clear, most people understand that Iran is a threat to the interests of the United States, but not to our very existence. Even if Iran were to somehow get a nuke into the hands of terrorists to be used in the United States it would not spell the end of our nation.

Israel, on the other hand, does not have the luxury of vast territory to absorb the kind of damage even a single thermonuclear device would cause. One bomb would literally destroy Israel's ability to exist as a nation-state.

Speaking as a member of the Jewish faith, I am offended by Rogers' simplistic view of the threat that Iran poses. The way he separates Ahmadinejad's threats against Israel from the threat of a nuclear Iran minimizes the existential nature of the danger to Israel should those threats be backed by even a single nuclear weapon. Iran's president has called Israel a "filthy bacteria" and threatened that "Anybody who recognizes Israel will burn in the fire of the Islamic nation's fury."

Furthermore, Rogers mistakenly conflates the fact that Israel has managed to defend itself from several conventional attacks by Arab states with the ability to defend itself from a nuclear attack.

To be sure, Iran is not going to march its armies across Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and Jordan to invade Israel as Syria, Egypt, and others have done in the past. But there is a vast difference between stopping tanks and stopping ballistic missiles, and Iran has already deployed a missile capable of delivering a nuclear warhead to Israel.

Again, I encourage Rogers to do some research. His contention that dealing with Iran is "complicated" would hold much greater weight if it were based on reality as opposed to fantasy.

For example, he could have mentioned that Ahmadinejad appears to be largely a figurehead in a government primarily controlled by the supreme leader of Iran, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But arguments based on dishonesty will not persuade others to treat Iran with "tact and a certain amount of prodding" as Rogers suggests.

Keep trying, Ted.

SWIFTBOAT WHO?

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Obama and Censorship," Alana Goodman, Editorial, Oct. 3)

I initially misread your article on the Obama campaign's suppression of facts entering the media. However, I was a bit soured when you referenced me in your own words, "infamous SBVT campaign."

For those of you who are not familiar with the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth campaign, which apparently includes Ms. Goodman, it was (and infamous smear campaign launched against John Kerry during his 2004 bid for the presidency.

The SBVT as it turns out was an improperly registered 527 group whose "facts" were conflicting of previous testimony, and were regarded by some to be nothing more that politically motivated (and funded) lies.

As a matter of fact, one of the first individuals to speak out against the SBVT in 2004 was John McCain, who called them "dishonest and dishonorable."

So please, next time you choose to publish an inflammatory and factually incorrect article please consider what you are doing, giving Obama Nation more ammo.

Dr. Dog to play NoHo

Psychadelic rock group brings unique sound to Iron Horse

BY BRIAN WOOD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Comparisons have long been the benchmark of lazy music journalism. Using the convenient crutch of easily-applied labels, critics often look to the past to describe their modern counterparts in favor of defining them in their present state. Philadelphia natives Dr. Dog have long been victimized by this practice.

Since its first release the band has been tirelessly compared to impossible-to-replicate acts ranging from The Beach Boys to The Beatles. Publications ranging from the major ("Rolling Stone," "People," "NPR" and "Entertainment Weekly") to the more indie-oriented ("Relix," "Filter" and "Details") have all lumped the band within the same narrow set of hackneyed associations.

While some bands would love to be held in such exclusive company, Dr. Dog is finding it impossible to escape it.

Bassist and singer Toby Leaman openly admits that the band delivers a sound deeply rooted in nostalgia. He isn't sold on the idea that the band is duplicating its idols however.

"I hear the comparisons a lot, I can understand them, and it's nice because those are some incredible bands to be compared to," said Leaman in an interview with the Daily Collegian. "But, a lot of people hold those comparisons against us, as if it's a fault of ours. I don't think that's accurate at all.

"We do a lot of things rhythmically and sonically that those bands weren't doing," said Leaman. "Our sound is a product of whatever we have, and what sounds good to our ears. We're passionate about making music that sounds good to us, and albums that we can be proud of."

The band's latest album, "Fate," posses the warmth and even tone associated with preeminent recordings 40 years its senior. "Fate's" modern-day revival of golden-era pop music is certainly not the first of its kind, but it is a testament toward the band's progression, both as musicians and producers.

"We have a unique advantage over a lot of other bands because we have our own studio, we always have, and our albums are always a do-it-yourself process," Leaman said.

"None of us have any formal training, so there has certainly been a bit of a learning curve and natural progression ... we work entirely to tape which creates a spectrum that is even and just a much warmer sounding recording. Our sound is a reflection of those limitations," he said.

Convenience isn't the only thing keeping the band from branching away from its do-it-yourself attitudes. Leaman has no intentions of abandoning their personal recording studio, even with the overwhelming wealth of new recording technologies available. Limitations are what Dr. Dog records are all about.

"Just because you have new technology at your disposal doesn't mean you have to be a slave to them," Leaman said. "The reality is that old albums just sound better than new ones. Everyone's favorite albums were from the 60s and 70s whether they be rock, pop or jazz. They didn't have the technology they have today and if they did, they wouldn't be the same."

"Fate" is no exception. Crafting songs in the tradition of his favorites, the 11-song album is what Leaman considers the most defining work the band has produced to date.

"The album means a lot to all of us. We worked our asses off on the thing," Leaman said. "I'm happiest about this album because I can listen to it through and find the least amount I dislike about it. I really love all of our work, but there's always been that bit of wishing that we could of tightened up the rhythm section on a track or improved on the harmonies on another, with 'Fate' we're as close to where we want to be as we've been so far."

The band is currently wrapping up a cross-country tour in support of the album Tonight's performance at the Iron Horse in Northampton is one of its final three before embarking on a month-long European tour that will bring Dr. Dog all around the continent.

The thing they'll miss the most about the Northeast? It would have to be the hoagies.

"I love a real-deal, classic, old-fashion hoagie," professed Leaman, a self-proclaimed sandwich enthusiast. "One with big chunks of provolone, really amazing bread and some killer pig meats ... maybe some oil and roasted red peppers in there too."

The over-used comparisons for Dr. Dog are sure to continue, but Leaman and company are comfortable with that.

By creating music they conceive and record through the group's collective definition of what sounds "good," the band members themselves are effectively the only critics that matter.

Besides, they have better taste in food than any of those other hands ever did.

(Dr. Dog plays tonight at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton with openers Delta Spirit and Hacienda. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance and $18 at the door.)

'Religulous' lacks wow factor

Bill Maher (left) films a scene from his latest film, "Religulous," in which he offers his comedic insight on the current state of various religions.

BY MORGAN MEAGHER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Comedian Bill Maher takes his brand of intellectual derision to the big screen with his first documentary, "Religulous."

The film is just what it sounds like: an attempt to expose the ridiculousness within organized religion.

The interviews are somewhat reminiscent of some of the segments in "Borat," which is hardly surprising, as Larry Charles directed both films.

Charles has a gift for getting people to make themselves look absolutely foolish on film, and he brings that talent to "Religulous," teaming up with Maher to poke fun at several of the more-common religions.

Bill Maher may be known for the relatively balanced atmosphere of his HBO show, "Real Time", on which he features both conservatives and liberals. "Religulous," however, is anything but balanced.

From the beginning, the pundit declares his anti-religious bias.

According to Maher, the danger of organized religion is twofold. On the one hand, it makes people "think they have all the answers" to the great mysteries of life. On the other hand, more prominent religions, such as Christianity and Islam, preach about a powerful end to the world.

As Maher puts it, before people learned to be rational or peaceful, they learned to destroy each other, and religion gives some people the desire to make that happen. He scrutinizes several of the major Western religions, touching briefly on Judaism and Mormonism, and taking the ever-praised jab at Scientology.

Maher interviews a wide range of people, from a liberal Vatican astronomer, to pop culture religious figures, to a slew of Average Joe churchgoers. He even talks to his own mother and sister about his Catholic upbringing.

In choosing who to interview for his documentary, it is clear that Maher made sure to seek out the most outrageous and ignorant people possible in order to illustrate his point.

For instance, the first Jewish person he speaks to is an outspoken anti-zionist, one who met with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad during his recent Holocaust denial conference. Clearly not your typical Jew.

Early on in the film, Maher visits a chapel for truckers located in Raleigh, N.C. The churchgoers are true to the stereotype: stubborn and conservative and Maher easily runs circles round these men, and nothing could be faker than when he assures them that he believes they are "smart people."

Despite his criticisms of people of faith, however, his goal is not to smash the idea of God – he's not an atheist. His qualm is with the certainty that people hold their religious beliefs. As he proclaims throughout the film, he simply doesn't know what the truth is, and he thinks that attitude is the only intelligent one to take.

Maher is also on a crusade of sorts against hypocrisy in religion. Time and again, he points out Christians whose behavior is less than Christ-like.

He clearly delights in drawing attention to the way some Christian preachers solicit money from their flocks so they can live high on the hog.

Later, he visits a mosque and speaks to a Muslim cleric who assures him that Islam is tolerant enough to allow non-believers into its houses of worship to explore. As the discussion takes place, another Muslim visiting the mosque starts to complain about "that Jew" (Maher is half Catholic and half Jewish) being there.

Moments later, the cleric goes on to say that, contrary to popular belief, Islam treats women as equals – then points out the "special corner" of the mosque where women are allowed to worship.

Another particular point of contention is the question of evolution.

The Vatican astronomer reminds Maher of Pope John Paul II's talk of how there is no question of truth to Darwin's theory, that the Bible is not about science, and therefore need not conflict with scientific theories. However, Maher manages to find multitudes of Christians – Catholics and Protestants alike – who seem to have missed this memo.

The film uses clever editing and sarcastic subtitles to mock everyone who appears in it.

Though not particularly controversial, it is sure to cause some outrage, specifically amongst the people who are shown in an unfavorable light.

Devout Christian Senator Mark Pryor (R-AK) awkwardly proclaims that "you don't have to pass an IQ test to be in the Senate" and "ex-gay" minister John Westcott still comes across as pretty gay, but neither are likely to create a ruckus.

Still, there's nothing new or shocking to be seen here, and it's clear that Maher isn't hoping to change anyone's mind.

"Religulous" is more just a soapbox from which to shout his own opinions, including his warning about the fairly tangible approach of an entirely man-made Armageddon, than an attempt to change the world.

Overall, it's good for a laugh if you're willing to get on board with the film's snarky attitude.

'Desperate' new future

BY NEAL JUSTIN
STAFF WRITER

The Wisteria Lane neighborhood has spent the past four years battling cancer, tornadoes, blindness, infidelity and attempted murder. Now the residents face the most daunting challenge of their suburban lives: aging.

"Desperate Housewives" opens its new season tonight by fast-forwarding the action five years, as bold and risky a move as adding Keith Olbermann as an "American Idol" judge or turning "Law & Order" into a campy musical.

After a preview of the first two episodes, it appears the gamble has paid off.

Creator Marc Cherry has used the leap into the future to turn back the clock and recapture the tone of the prime-time soap opera's Emmy-nominated inaugural season, where sniping and sarcasm were more powerful and destructive than any windstorm.

"It was a chance for us to reset," said Cherry, whose show has largely been overlooked at awards ceremonies since that heralded rookie year. "Soaps tend to build up, and I wanted to get back to where we were that first season when it was just the small and relatable problems of some ordinary women."

Cherry said he was partly inspired by the time-travel twist employed by another ABC series, "Lost."

"I was initially going to do an eight-year jump, but then when someone explained to me how the actresses would react to the idea that they were eight years older, I thought, 'Maybe five. Maybe I can get away with five.'"

The results are fresh and funny. Lynette's (Felicity Huffman) rambunctious kids are now borderline delinquents. Bree (Marcia Cross) has become a wildly successful, wildly insecure TV personality. Edie (Nicollette Sheridan) has married a motivational speaker Susan (Teri Hatcher) has been transformed into a love-'em-and-leave-'em free spirit. Gabby (Eva Longoria Parker) now has two children, forcing her to trade in window-shopping for window-washing.

"Teri and I were saying that we've kind of switched roles because she's glamorous now and I'm frumpy," said Parker, whose use of stomach and buttock pads on set have triggered rumors that she's either pregnant or addicted to creme-filled doughnuts. "I love it, because I come into hair and makeup now and it's like 10 minutes instead of two hours."

In serving up new story lines, Cherry also has given his cast new challenges – something rarely provided to actors on network TV, which is always wary of messing with a successful formula.

"It's given all of us an opportunity to be something we haven't been," said Hatcher, whose character was dangerously close to running out of ways to whine. "For Susan, it's been years of 'Please love me, please love me, please love me,' and now, for reasons that will be revealed this season, she's more closed off to love and not so needy of it. It's empowering and exciting to play different levels and different parts of your personality and have legitimate reasons why each character is in a new place."

What hasn't changed are the witty zingers, which were always the series' strength, but too often buried under heavy-handed story lines and dramatic twists that had more in common with "The Twilight Zone" than a frothy comedy.

The season kicks off with one perfect punch line after another, whether it's an icy saleswoman suggesting that Gabby's overweight daughter might want to shop in the costume department where they sell a Mrs. Shrek outfit, or the response to Edie's news that she now has a husband.

"Really?" Susan quips. "Whose?"

There's also a series of delightful vignettes, including Lynette's accidental "e-mail affair" with one of her sons (don't worry, it's more touching than icky); Bree being forced to produce a tricky dessert that she boasted of creating, and Gabby's attempt to sneak into a high-end party out of fear that her social life is disintegrating into a future of "flip-flops and keggers."

"What I love about my gals is that, for all the glamour, they're all actresses first," Cherry said. "I have friends who work on other TV shows who constantly marvel at what my gals allow me to do and how ridiculously silly I make them and how wickedly driven I can make the characters. They really go with me."

The ride can't go on forever. Cherry openly admits that he plans to end the series at the conclusion of the seventh season – and don't expect him to hand the reins to anyone else.

"I love working with these gals, but the idea of letting anyone else take the show from me makes me sick to my stomach," he said. "I would rather just end it as my thing. We're going to get out while people still like us."

ABC's hit comedy series, "Desperate Housewives," starts its fifth season five years into the future in order to give its characters a fresher direction.

High notes for Paris

City of 'amour' gains major points from fashion industry

John Galliano's collection was inspired by Britain.

BY REBECCA BABIN AND EMMA LIEVERGREN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

(Editor's note: This is the final article of the continuing series on fashion)

It has arrived – what fashion-lovers have been waiting for all month.

Three Words: Paris. Fashion. Week.

Parisians are known for being edgy, fashionable and possessing an intriguing mystique.

Like the city's residents, its fashion week is no different. People travel around the world to see some of the most artistic and innovative collections designers have to offer.

Style gurus everywhere go into Paris Fashion Week with high expectations, and this year, they came out all smiles as Paris' designers set the bar high for next season.

LOUIS VUITTON

Marc Jacobs has outdone himself with his Louis Vuitton Spring 2009 collection. Louis Vuitton is the final of three collections he designed for the upcoming season, the first two of which, Marc by Marc Jacobs, were presented during New York Fashion Week.

The age-old concept of saving the best for last was dead-on in Jacobs' case. He outperformed his New York collections by a landslide, both of which were critiqued for their lack of innovation and mediocrity.

Be it a transition to a new city or the extreme versatility of combining a trendy, experimental Americana with a brand of Parisian heritage, the end result was astonishing.

The response to his collection was overwhelming, restoring the fashion-weary patron's confidence in what could be presented at the Cour Carrée du Louvre tents.

The collection was all about Jacobs' perception of Parisian style and culture, with sassy French music playing as the soundtrack, and a refreshing, American spin on French classics.

Models were styled with slick, sexy up-dos and poodle-esque pony tails that fit perfectly with the "leggy," loud designs. Each look was about getting as close to edge of overboard as possible, without actually going there.

Like many of Paris' designers, he channeled the 1980s with a modern twist. There was volume at the shoulders, structured blazers, blaring patterns and vibrant colors.

Each piece was expertly crafted with contrasting fabrics, combining velvet and leather into a sexy military dress and silk, flowing polka-dotted pants with a classic, structured blazer.

As artistic as it was, the collection was fashion-forward yet fun, proving to be a shopper's dream.

JOHN GALLIANO

John Galliano took a change of pace with his collection this time around.

After the last three seasons of uncanny clothing, he brought his designs back down to Earth, or at least back into the stratosphere.

His version of reality is still remarkably fantastic, which became immediately apparent when his models marched down the runway strapped in tall, black marabou hats, military jackets and laced-up Mary Janes, reminiscent of the British Royal Guard.

Red and black separates were the focal point of his collection, ranging from heavy jackets in various shapes to sheer skirts that left little to the imagination.

There were flouncy, red dresses with pear- and oval-shaped cut-outs at the neckline that flowed like water around the body.

An interesting turn in the collection was the addition of bubblegum-pink, a necessary, softening touch.

Usually a fashion faux pas, Galliano combined his pink pieces with some of his red separates in a way that managed to work.

Not one piece caused a snore, with new shapes and styles to flatter all figures.

Ruffles, gathering and pleating were of order at the waist, neck and arms. Galliano had an affinity of women's shoulders, as many of his designs hung loosely about the frame slightly exposing the limb. Underneath the outrageous poodle hair-dos and crazy hats, Galliano presented garments that would be fantastic to wear for any occasion.

Fabric choices were transcendent. Designs were flattering. Colors were invigorating. All made for a collection nothing short of extraordinary.

CHANEL

Leave it to Karl Lagerfeld to carry Chanel's legacy wit and egotism.

A Louis Vuitton look strolls down the runways.

A Lanvin frock makes its way down the catwalk.

Lagerfeld is known for his larger-than-life sets, and this one was no exception.

A life-sized version of the 31 Rue Cambon store was the backdrop, and models sauntered down the runway, a replica of a street.

The whopping 71-piece collection stayed true to Chanel's roots, as well as to the aesthetic of Mr. Lagerfeld himself.

Sticking to a relatively strict palette of gray, black, white and some pink, modern takes on the traditional Chanel skirt suit opened the show.

From there it was boucle pencil skirts, pink sweater sets and bows.

Sexier details like sheer tops or pumps with marabou trim offset hip-slung chains and a quilted guitar case.

There was fringe, there were ruffles, there was lace, and there were bows, but Lagerfeld just can't help himself when it comes to sexing up his collections.

Models donned stark black and white, complete with a black bowtie and brooch, and the masculine silhouettes contrasted sharply with the feminine skirts and frills.

The last women's looks concluded the show on a beautiful note, with gossamer sheers, ruffles and flowers.

There was a duo of bathing suits and the occasional pant, but the most part, Chanel was feminine and glamorous.

STELLA MCCARTNEY

If every designer had a slogan, Stella McCartney's would be "sexy without trying."

Sans moving beyond a limited color scheme of white, tan, gray, black and shades of blue, McCartney used silhouette and fabric to create sensual clothing.

Starting with altering her signature jumpsuit, McCartney created long and dangerously-short styles, the majority with plunging necklines and large lapels.

The trend of the oversized blazer worn over smart, cocktail-length dresses was not lost in her collection, and neither were signature, slouchy trousers.

Devoré pieces lent an air of mystery because of their see-through quality, while tiny, nude handeau dresses and one-pieces left little to the imagination.

Shimmering, sheer bodysuits were paired beneath chiffon or a heavier knit.

Some plainer sweaters weren't as beautiful, yet managed to maintain their "wearability" factor.

The collection alternated between sexy and demure while remaining cohesive. Even the more reserved pieces came with a deeply-plunging back. Toward the end of the show, the prints came out in graphic black and white.

Stella McCartney certainly has a knack for crafting clothes that are sexy, tasteful, fashion-forward and wearable.

LANVIN

For the final day of Paris Fashion Week, and ultimately the end of fashion month, Lanvin's head designer, Alber Elbaz, created an immaculate collection that left its audience gasping for air.

After a dark fall show, Lanvin gave his spring collection a lighter and softer note.

A blouse chartreuse top gathered at one shoulder and a voluminous black skirt composed the first look, and the collection propelled from there.

One-shouldered tops and dresses that were pleated, tucked and rolled bloomed away from the body, while darts and seams along the torso seized shape and feminine ity.

One tangerine shift dress flowered spectacularly at the shoulder and embossed chique a raised pattern with a puckered look, which blended harmoniously with the frock's gleaming silks.

While black was dominant, there were refreshing shots and accents of tangerine, magenta, navy, pink, powder blue and bright green.

Slim silhouettes complemented more structural ones, especially when a futuristic, round-shouldered pod dress preceded the classic pencil skirt and tucked-in blouse.

On the other side of Elbaz's brain were prints, beading and embellishments.

There was a blue leopard-print creation and a couple of dresses adorned with beaded flowers.

A draped, pink shift dress was encrusted with orange beading around the neck, and the final look, a short-sleeved blouse and thigh-grazing skirt gleamed from head-to-toe with powder blue and royal purple tube beads and sequins.

Overall, Lanvin was a stunning and optimistic way to end one of fashion's most exhilarating months.

Avoid packing pounds

Latest college study says go easy on booze, exercise more

By Ashley Kindergan
The Record

HACKENSACK, N.J. — It's difficult to think of a way to add pounds faster than living the stereotypical college lifestyle.

Juggling coursework, jobs and a social life leaves little time for exercising or even regular meals. Late-night study sessions are often fueled by the nearest 24-hour greasy spoon. Getting too little sleep can also trick the body into craving more food.

On top of all that, many freshmen are taking in many more calories from alcohol than they have in the past.

That's the bad news. The good news is that not every entering freshman puts on weight, and there are some easy things students can do to avoid packing on pounds.

The first thing to do is to forget the phrase "Freshman 15." A 2006 study by Rutgers University nutritionists tracked the weight of 67 students in their first year. Most students did gain weight, but more than one-fourth of students actually lost weight. Those who did gain weight put on an average of seven pounds, not 15.

But gaining seven pounds doesn't require all that much extra food. The Rutgers study said that taking in just 112 extra calories each day – roughly equivalent to a cup of Cheerios – would do it.

Jackie Ehlert-Mercer, a registered dietitian who runs nutrition programs for students at the University of British Columbia and teaches a course in nutrition at Ramapo College, said that freshmen who gain weight their first semester and don't lose it in the second semester are more likely to keep gaining weight throughout college. If the pattern continues, adulthood obesity and related health problems such as heart disease and diabetes may follow.

"An overweight adolescent ... is probably going to become an obese adult if they don't mediate their weight during college," Ehlert-Mercer said. "The stresses they face such as getting married or getting a full-time job tend to increase. They don't tend to diminish."

Scott Fisher, director of the Fairleigh Dickinson University Health and Fitness Center, recommends that students plan their days to ensure that they eat regularly and healthfully. Skipping meals to lose weight usually backfires, he said.

"You should really go no longer than four or five hours without eating something," Fisher said. "If you go for too long a period of time without eating, your blood sugar level drops. When your blood sugar level drops, your body essentially sends you signals that it wants a very quick source of energy, which are the typical sugary foods, and some concentrated calories, which are fatty foods."

Eating frequently has worked for Mike Sciscione, 22, a senior at William Paterson University. The Rockaway native eats six small meals a day. Something as simple as a fruit smoothie counts, he said. Sciscione buys bulk packages of 100-calorie snack packs and keeps a bottle of water with him to stave off hunger pangs. "It keeps your metabolism going and keeps you from gaining weight," he said.

Some students who gained weight said they were able to lose it again by reassessing their food and exercise choices.

Ramya Pallavajhala, 22, a senior at Fairleigh Dickinson University, lost most of the weight she gained the first semester of freshman year by cutting out cheese and cooking healthy, vegetable-rich Indian dishes. She also walks between her Hackensack home and the Teaneck campus and squeezes in the occasional gym workout when her schedule permits.

"Once you gain the weight, it's very tough to regain your shape," Pallavajhala said. "But it's easy to prevent it."

Going easy on the alcohol can also make a big difference.

Daniel Hoffman, a co-author of the Rutgers study, said that the body metabolizes alcohol before either carbohydrates or fat. That means the body has less opportunity to burn off carbohydrates and fats from food.

The sheer number of calories in alcoholic drinks is enough to make most people gain weight, especially if they are consuming the same amount of food and non-alcoholic beverages. A single shot of 80-proof vodka contains 97 calories, and a typical light beer contains about 99, according to thecaloriecounter.com. Combine hard liquor with mixers (110 calories for an 8-ounce glass of orange juice) or down a few beers during a drinking game, and the calories add up quickly.

"A lot of students don't realize that the number of calories per gram in alcohol is closer to fat than to carbohydrates," Hoffman said. "If you look at binge drinking ... you're looking at a lot of calories."

Eating is only one side of the weight-gain equation. Working out can help burn off the occasional late-night pizza or homesickness-induced pint of ice cream.

Fisher recommended at least half an hour of cardiovascular exercise most days a week, and augmenting that with strength training a few times a week.

Relaxing a little isn't a bad idea, either. Researchers at the University of Chicago found that college students who slept for four hours a night produced more of a hormone called ghrelin, which causes feelings of hunger, and less of leptin, which makes people feel full, than peers who had been allowed to sleep for as much as 10 hours.

Though most freshmen will err on the side of eating too much and exercising too little, some students respond to stress by becoming too restrictive with their diets. Students who have experienced disordered eating patterns before college face the highest risk of developing serious eating disorders in college, Ehlert-Mercer said.

Students who find themselves thinking obsessively about food, purging after eating or exercising compulsively in order to lose weight should see a counselor or doctor.

Most college health centers either employ or can refer students to a nutritionist or psychologist to treat eating disorders.

A recent study revealed that college students should maintain portion control, exercise more, and lay off the alcohol in order to avoid heavy weight gain.

Dancers dismiss their disability

By Eric Adler
McClatchy Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — For JoAnne Fluke, it is all about the freedom ... the movement ... the feeling.

Oh, the feeling of ballroom dancing in a wheelchair.

The cha-cha. The salsa. The "downright sexy rumba," she said. Then there is the Viennese waltz.

"It makes me feel beautiful, elegant, like a lady," Fluke said.

Ebullient and auburn-haired, the Ottawa, Kan., resident was born with a condition called caudal regression. Her legs, with no feeling, are tiny, the size of baby legs, webbed at the knees and all but nothing. They lie tucked beneath her so that when seated, her body looks like half a body, a torso in a chair.

But on the dance floor, when she hears the swell of the waltz, she's transported – lifted into the air by her teacher and able-bodied partner, Chris Pruitt, and swept into his arms.

They dance face to face, body to body. Fluke's right arm extends straight. Her back arches in elegant repose. Her head tilts regally.

"I don't see my disability when I'm dancing," Fluke said. "I see me."

At 32, Fluke is spirited, bold, a former Miss Wheelchair Kansas, who from middle school through college at Baker University never shied away from the spotlight or had a single qualm about lowering herself from her chair to dance on her hands.

Louth to allow her disability to limit her, she tried out for the ABC program "The Bachelor" in 2002 when its producers rolled through Kansas City, Mo.

"You're talking to a girl who, when she was 4 or 5 years old, wanted to be the first disabled 'Little Orphan Annie' on Broadway," she said.

Still, the idea that she would help create what, in the last 17 months, has become a small yet growing group of wheelchair ballroom dancers in Kansas City never occurred to her.

But it's happened nonetheless.

In the last year, Pruitt, Fluke and others formed a non-profit alternative dance organization called Groovability (as opposed to "disability").

"I didn't want to be the only one to have this opportunity," Fluke said. "It's too wonderful."

Now, each Saturday, Fluke and maybe three or four friends roll their chairs out on the wood floor at Bella Studio in Westport's Manor Square to practice in front of the wall-size mirror.

Tiny white Christmas lights hang from a low ceiling.

"We're going to do some cha-cha today," Pruitt, 31, said to the class on a recent Saturday.

To the dancers, it already seems like so much has happened since the whole thing began last year with a phone call and a lie.

"Do you teach wheelchair ballroom dancing?" Fluke asked Pruitt on the telephone back in March 2007.

Fluke and her 28-year-old friend, Tiffany Simpson, a speech pathologist from Kansas City who has spina bifida, had been researching wheelchair ballroom dancing on the Internet. They work together as summer camp counselors in Excelsior Springs, Mo., teaching children with spina bifida to dance.

On YouTube, they found dozens of videos of elegant women and men in wheelchairs: precise ballroom dancers in tuxedos and sparkling gowns, their hands clasped – one moving in the chair, the other standing – as crowds roared with applause during an international competition.

"Both of us were like, 'I want to do this!'" Simpson said.

But when Fluke called several local dance studios last year to find a program, she came up empty.

Then she called Pruitt, whose Bella Studio had just opened in June 2006 and had been struggling.

So when Fluke asked Pruitt about whether he held classes, he lied.

"Yes," Pruitt told her, even though he had barely heard of wheelchair ballroom dancing.

"I had no clue," he said.

He educated himself about how wheelchair ballroom dancing started in Sweden in the 1970s and has been huge in Europe ever since.

Next month, on Oct. 24, dancers from scores of nations are expected to gather in Belarus' capital, Minsk, for the International Paralympic Committee Dance Sport World Championships.

In the United States, the sport is still growing, promoted by organizations such as the Wheelchair Dancesport USA Association and the American DanceWheels Foundation.

Early this year, the University of Delaware recognized the sport by starting what is thought to be the first class in wheelchair ballroom dancing at a major university.

Fluke arrived for her first class with Pruitt on April 1, 2007. Other women soon followed.

"I decided I was going to teach people the way I teach everybody," said Pruitt, rangy and lean as a dance bar.

Except there was a difference.

To understand what was possible, to figure out what the body and chair could do together, Pruitt acquired a chair of his own. For four days, he lived as if he had a disability.

"I went to the bathroom from the wheelchair. I showered. I tied my legs together," he said.

"I'll tell you, these women have taught me more about life than anyone, about how nothing can stop you. They have challenged me beyond my abilities, forcing me to come up with creative choreography, how to do this, how to do that."

In the last year, the Groovability dancers have given exhibitions at local studios and at able-bodied competitions from Nebraska to the St. Louis Star Ball. In early August, they joined some 600 able-bodied ballroom dancers at the Heart of America DanceSport Championships in Tiffany Springs.

In exhibitions, Fluke can leave her chair. But she knows that in real competition it's not allowed. Wheelchair ballroom dancers must remain seated. The chair, although it can be spun or snapped or even tilted, must remain on at least one wheel at all times.

Back in class, Pruitt hopped in his chair and rolled to the front of the class.

"And we're going to do crisscrosses and breaks with swivels today," Pruitt told the group.

The five Groovability women lined up in a row behind him.

Along with Fluke and Simpson, there was Donna Janes, 57, of Lee's Summit, Mo., who had polio as a child, then later took up wheelchair tennis and bowling.

"I truly believe that if you can move an eyelash, you can dance," she said.

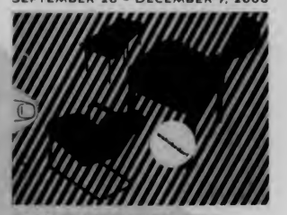
There was Jennifer Simmons, 49, of Independence, a paraplegic from childhood, a dog trainer and horsewoman who found that wheelchair dancing brought her back out of a winter slump. And Lorraine Cannistra, 39, of Lawrence, Kan., who cried when she first saw Fluke and Janes dancing with Pruitt at an exhibition during the 2007 Miss Wheelchair Kansas pageant.

"It made me cry because it was beautiful," she said. "It was graceful. Those are two words not often put together with wheelchairs. I knew in that moment I wanted to do it."

Pruitt peppered the dancers with instructions, practicing, quarter turns, half turns, full turns. You want to make sure the arms are down. Rotate at the waist, hips and shoulders. Engage the back. Don't flail about. Keep the neck straight, keep the frame.

Cha-cha music, then samba, filled the studio. On this day, teenagers from Fluke's church had come as stand-ins for able-bodied partners.

"You have to put emotion into it," Pruitt told the group. "You have to feel it."



The class continued for close to 90 minutes. At the end, the women were breathless. Each would later say that they knew, in some ways, that people who see them dance often find them inspirational, breakers of stereotypes and the like.

Although it's not a role any of the dancers disavows every one of them also said it's not why they do it.

"I get the opportunity to really express how I feel," Fluke said. "It feels like it doesn't matter that I have wheels instead of feet. It's in the heart. It's in the soul."

Brett Watson was named a team captain in only his junior year. UMass coach Cahoon considers the defensive-minded forward to be one of his best penalty killers on the team.

Goalie not to be determined by last year's performances

newcomers on UMass' frontline. The 2007 draft pick of the New York Rangers brings some size – 6-feet, 200 pounds – and the potential to become a regular scoring threat. Adding to an already speedy core of forwards, David Boehm will see time on the wings.

In 2007-08, Cahoon struggled to find time for all his athletes and it looks to be the case again this season. At the moment, the Minutemen aren't as healthy as they'd like with sophomore winger Chase Langeraap still recovering from knee surgery last season. Junior Will Ortiz and senior Chris Davis provide depth and the capability to pile up goals in bunches. Davis thrives on the defensive end, as does senior Scott Crowder.

Ortiz is something of an enigma for Cahoon and his staff. At certain times, he looks like the most gifted player in the program, and at other times he completely disappears. He scored seven goals last season, six of them in the first half. Though he experienced ups and downs as a freshman, he still managed 21 points. But the total dipped to 15 last season. Injuries were a problem for the upstart winger, but he was also a healthy scratch at times late in the season.

Since junior Brett Watson arrived on campus in 2006-07, Cahoon has raved about his impeccable positioning and ability to kill penalties. Maturity is also one of the pivot's trademarks, as a result he will serve as co-captain along with Quirk this season.

Blueliners

The Minutemen return a strong core of defenders, which includes Justin Braun, Martin Nolet, John Wessbecker and Topher Bevis. However, Wessbecker and Bevis are currently battling injuries. Wessbecker could be out of the lineup for as long as a month while Bevis is day to day, according to Cahoon.

Braun and Nolet, both NHL Draft picks, are among the best defensemen in Hockey East and should continue their ascent this season. Nolet, a sturdy, physical presence on the UMass blue line, also contributes on both the power play and penalty kill. He displayed something of a mean streak in 2007-08, readily coming to the defense of his teammates whenever he believed it to be necessary.

Similarly for Braun. 2008-09 should be a season to remember. Cahoon believes he is capable of becoming an All-American for the Minutemen and fingered him as the quarterback on UMass' primary power-play unit.

Freshman Matt Irwin was impressive in UMass' 6-0 exhibition win over New Brunswick. Another big-bodied defenseman, Irwin played alongside redshirt sophomore Kevin Kessler in the win over the Varsity Reds. Kessler saw some time last season in the UMass lineup, playing in 10 games after sitting out his first year on campus.

Sophomore Doug Kublin and freshman Michael Marcou will also figure into the fineup, especially while Wessbecker and Bevis heal.

Between the pipes

After a strong freshman season, Paul Dainton seemed like the presumptive starter, but Cahoon made it perfectly clear that playing time will come based on this year's performance, not last year's.

Both he and junior Dan Meyers struggled with groin injuries and neither is at 100 percent right now. Dainton's worst game of the season just happened to be the one that eliminated UMass from the Hockey East tournament. Cahoon pulled him in favor of Meyers in the second period. Dainton also had some brilliant performances that made him the starter even when Meyers came back.

Cahoon isn't sure of the status of sophomore Matt Gedman at the moment. He also plays baseball for UMass, and the Minutemen are in the midst of their fall schedule. Not having a third goaltender in the program could prove costly should Meyers or Dainton suffer any serious injury.

Veterans key to team

By Joe Meloni and Melissa Turtinen
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon named senior Cory Quirk and junior Brett Watson captains for the 2008-09 season. Both play pivotal roles for the Minutemen as centers on lines and key cogs on different special teams units.

Cahoon, however, believes that the leadership of his team is too great a responsibility to rely only on captains. There are several veterans on the UMass roster, but several underclassmen project to see serious ice time for the Minutemen. Senior winger Chris Davis played with freshmen Danny Hobbs and Casey Wellman in last Saturday's 6-0 exhibition win over New Brunswick.

UMass Hockey

Davis's hard-nosed approach to every shift should set a good enough example for his young teammates to learn from.

"He is playing with two freshmen going into this weekend," Cahoon said. "As talented as they might be, he is taking on or assuming a larger roll in that he is going to manage those guys and get those guys started on the right foot in their college careers against two Top 5 teams in North Dakota and Michigan State."

Taking on teams like UND and MSU isn't an easy task for a freshman on any team, but the leadership from the upperclassmen on the UMass roster is certainly something in which Cahoon takes solace.

Additional referee

New to collegiate hockey for the 2008-09 season is the addition of a second referee. Now there will be two linesmen and two referees on the ice.

"At first I wasn't in favor of it, I thought it would be too clustered out there. I thought there would be too many situations where the referees were getting in the way," Cahoon said.

But, that isn't the case because of the way the referees execute their movements well and make it a point not to crowd the rink.

Now, there will be fewer missed penalties and less undisciplined penalties, because there is a referee watching in front of and behind the play. The addition of another set of eyes will decrease what coaches may consider bad calls.

Less face-off spots

This season there will be only nine face-off spots used on the ice, as opposed to previous seasons when a faceoff would be done wherever the call was made. Now, the nine spots will be in the typical faceoff circles – two in each end and five in the neutral zone.

If a puck is deflected out of play by a defenseman, but in the defensive zone, the faceoff is done at the closest circle – instead of in the location where the play happened. That means the puck is much closer to the defending team's goal and the advantage is handed to the offensive team.

The same thing is happening with penalties. Wherever a penalty is called, the puck goes to the zone of the team that was assessed with the penalty. This allows the power-play units to start in the zone.

"It puts greater responsibility on centers and more responsibility on the team to be disciplined," Cahoon said.

The change in rules is creating more offensive opportunity. Cahoon believes this is because the skill of goaltenders has increased at a higher rate than the average player and made it more difficult to score goals.

Aside from the competition issue, college hockey, like the National Hockey League, believes that goals can attract more fans to the sport. While ratings aren't quite the issue that they are in the NHL, it makes sense that athletic directors want to draw as many people to games as possible.

Not a fan of the shootout

The Central Collegiate Hockey Association decided to alter its overtime format, opting to decide ties with shootouts rather than ending games in deadlocks. An extra point will be awarded to the victor of the shootout and a single point to the loser of the shootout. The format is exactly the same as the NHL's.

Although a win will be awarded to whoever wins the shootout within the conference standings, the game will not be counted as a tie as far as the PairWise Rankings go. The PWR is the formula used by the selection committee to decide at-large bids and seeding for the NCAA tournament.

Cahoon voted against the decision within Hockey East, but does believe that an amendment to the current rules regarding overtime is acceptable.

"I voted against it in our own league," he said. "The game isn't about shootouts. It's for the fans. Do I think it's exciting for the fans? Absolutely. But, I think it's a terrible way for a team to lose a point – it's not the game of hockey. It's like playing home run derby to decide a baseball game."

UM ranked No. 6 in HEA preseason polls

that sense of unity that you need, a sense of conviction, that says we can do this and we can play at this level," said UMass coach Don Cahoon.

"In January we just found ourselves losing one-goal games, and it wasn't that the other team beat us, it was that we beat ourselves," he said.

With 16 returning players the Minutemen will hope to avoid the January plunge, as Cahoon refers to it, that they had last season. The veterans will help keep the newcomers focused and introduce them to everything the University of Massachusetts has to offer.

January is a difficult month for any team from a university that has an intersession. For the Minutemen, they return to school after a short holiday break and for the month of January they are practically the only students on campus – it's as quiet as UMass gets all year.

With all of the free time during intersession last year, the Minutemen went their own way and when they began to struggle they didn't come together. They disbanded into their own groups. So this year, Cahoon is working with the older players to help them recognize how important it is to stay together. Doing this, he hopes the struggles they faced last season won't be as significant this year.

"We're going to orchestrate the January schedule different than it has been in the past," Cahoon said.

This year, Cahoon is planning to have practices in the mornings so that the team isn't waiting around for practice to begin. This gives players time to study if they are taking a class, deal with their personal lives and work on being a good teammate to prepare themselves for future games.

"We're making some serious adjustments to what our protocol is going to be [in January]. We've taken everything into consideration," Cahoon said.

Going into this year Cahoon is optimistic about his team's abilities. First off, the experience of returning players is the team's biggest strength. The majority of the Minutemen have seen success in the past with a NCAA tournament berth, tournament wins and a high national ranking.

"[There is] a real strong conviction among those returning players that we can be a formidable team in a great league," Cahoon said.

The ability of the goaltenders is no longer a mystery, as it was at the start of last season after losing Jon Quick two years ago. Sophomore Paul Dainton and junior Dan Meyers proved to be dependable goaltenders. Dainton and Meyers continue to develop and provide the type of performance the Minutemen need to succeed this season.

Cahoon is confident in all 16 of his forwards – the ideal situation is 15 forwards, for a total of 26 players, the Minutemen have 28 in the lineup. The forward line will be the fastest in UMass history with a great dimension of speed, and Cahoon challenges anyone to question that.

"It's nice to have the depth to deal with any uncertainties that may come about. We're in real good shape up front. I like our defensive core; but as is the case with our whole team right now, we're a little bit dinged up at different positions," Cahoon said.

One important player who could be out for another month is senior defenseman John Wessbecker. His injury in December of last year was another cause of the Minutemen's struggle in the second half last season.

"Wessbecker's injury was a major cause in our demise last season because we just missed all the minutes he played," Cahoon said.

The team's depth from offense to its goaltenders will continue to benefit the Minutemen as they go through the season. They will always have people to replace those who may be injured. Each game there will be four or five people that won't be in the lineup, but that doesn't mean Cahoon doesn't have confidence in all of his players as they take the ice.

"I like all three positions; the goaltending, the defense and the forwards. Now it's a question of pulling this together as a team," Cahoon said. "We should be able to compete on a regular basis in our league."

With new players added to the lineup – four forwards and two defensemen – the leadership on the team is very important. The co-captains fit the mold of Cahoon's ideal captain.

Quirk is known as someone who overachieves in every way, both offensively and physically. His energy and consistency makes him a good representative from the senior class. The other captain, Watson, was chosen over the large senior class. The junior is one of UMass' most steady presences.

"He is where he is supposed to be when he is supposed to be. Not sometimes, but all the time," Cahoon said. "He is a great watch for the younger players. You pay attention to him and admire his ability to screw himself into the situation and be able to execute it."

To be successful this season, UMass must excel in special teams and be better at it than its opponents. With the speed of the Minutemen's forwards they are expected to play an aggressive power-play and penalty kill.

In previous years, the Minutemen didn't have the speed that they do this season and would give up ice on the penalty kill. But this year the forwards will create more offense off of special teams.

The Minutemen exhibited their strengths in special teams during their exhibition game against New Brunswick on Oct. 4. They scored five of their six goals using special teams – four coming from the power-play units, even though it was the first day of formal practice.

TOUGH COMPETITION

With a Hockey East preseason ranking of sixth, UMass will play 36 games – 18 home and 18 on the road – with its first two games this weekend at the Ice Breaker Tournament.

The Minutemen's opponents include teams from five of the six NCAA Division I conferences. Four of those teams made the NCAA tournament in 2007 and two participated in the Frozen Four.

Included in the list of teams UMass will face is defending NCAA Champion Boston College. The first-of-three conference games will be Nov. 21 in Chestnut Hill. The Minutemen begin conference play on Oct. 24 at New Hampshire, followed by their first home game on Halloween against Providence.

ICE BREAKER TOURNAMENT

The leadership and depth of the Minutemen will be important as they go into this weekend. On Friday, UMass will play Michigan State and will challenge North Dakota in the Ice Breaker Tournament on Saturday.

Michigan State plays similar systems to UMass. MSU is a younger team that uses the trap in the neutral zone and plays a similar forecheck to the Minutemen. The Spartan's goaltender, senior Jeff Lerg, is small but aggressive. At 5-foot-6, his size benefits the Minutemen, and if they can screen him and find open spaces in the net they will be able to score goals.

North Dakota plays a different game than UMass. The Fighting Sioux have made 18 Frozen Four appearances, including 2007, with their last national championship in 2000. They rank in the top collegiate hockey programs in the country and are a very physical team, with large defensemen that play the body.

To be successful this weekend, UMass must have clean breakouts, get the puck out of its zone, screen the opponents' goaltender, be first to loose pucks and sustain its offense. The Minutemen must be thorough and sound in their positioning in all three zones so they can develop plays and capitalize on chances.

Melissa Turtinen can be reached at mturtinen@dailycollegian.com

Sophomore Paul Dainton is expected by many to be the starting goalie for UMass after his strong performances last year, but coach Cahoon has insisted that the position will be given based on this year's performance, not last years.

James Marcou had a strong season in 2007–08 as a freshman. In 36 games, Marcou had 32 points off eight goals and 24 assists, and had a hat trick on Jan. 25, 2008 against Vermont.

Nolet expected to provide leadership, guidance to youth

developed a great shot, both slap and wrist. He is going to become a greater offensive threat."

It's this confidence in his offensive ability paired with his poise that made Braun Cahoon's choice to man the point on UMass' primary power-play unit. Always calm on the puck, careful but never too cautious, Braun knows how to find seams within defenses; when to take risks and when to slow things down.

Nolet and Braun share the defensive instinct, but approach their job a little differently. Neither is at all hesitant to play physically when necessary, Nolet just seems to take a little more pleasure in it. Any opposing player who gets at all rough with any of UMass' undersized forwards can expect a visit from the 6-foot-3, 200-pound Nolet – and they don't usually forget it for a few days after.

"Marty is much more physical than Justin. He has a bigger, stronger body," Cahoon said. "When he thumps you, you feel it. He has a thickness to his body and a sturdiness on his skates that is really difficult to play against."

Despite his size and reputation for relentlessly physical play, Nolet is among the smoothest skaters on the team. He moves effortlessly from zone-to-zone, and transitions the puck up ice very well.

"What I think will evolve subtly will be the offensive instincts. He has the ability to go for sure, but now he has the confidence to shoot the puck and deliver the puck consistently and be able to fill the holes offensively and when to stay back. I think that's soon to come," Cahoon said.

Like Braun, Nolet will operate at the helm of one of UMass' power-play units. Aside from the offense expected of him in this role, managing a power play also means becoming more vocal on the ice. Senior Cory Quirk and junior Brett Watson may be the official captains, but Cahoon expects Nolet to provide guidance to the unit and the younger UMass defensemen.

Perhaps Cahoon is asking too much of the pair; playing solid defense while contributing on offense and managing key special teams units.

But he asked these same things of a few players before, and look where it got them.

UConn men's basketball coach Jim Calhoun has recruited some players with known character issues. Most recently, freshman Nate Miles, who was expelled after allegedly sexually abusing a freshman girl.

UConn given 'black eye' by athletes with shaky transcripts

Miles recruited despite questionable character

BY KEVIN MEACHAM
DAILY CAMPUS (UNIVERSITY OF CONNECTICUT)

STORRS, Conn. — Nate Miles allegedly made some poor decisions and he has been expelled from UConn as a result. And rightly so.

The university, not to mention its basketball program, (or its head coach), has been given a black eye. People have begun to question whether the program is becoming decadent, accepting players of questionable character.

Miles infamously attended five high schools in four years before graduating earlier this year. Just about every newspaper or online story on Miles seems required to mention the words "baggage" or "troubles."

Coach Jim Calhoun fought for about a year to push Miles through UConn's admissions process.

Did he do it because Miles had a shot to be the best wing player at UConn since Rip Hamilton? Calhoun only has a certain number of years remaining in his coaching career and Miles would have fit perfectly in a stacked UConn lineup that should be ranked in the top five of the polls this year.

Did he do it as a sort of reclamation project, a Caron Butler for this era? Butler had a troubled youth – including more than a dozen arrests. But Calhoun took a chance on him, and Butler responded by turning his life around and becoming a wildly successful, model citizen.

Was it a combination of the two? In the end, it doesn't matter – even if you give Calhoun the benefit of the doubt, as I do.

What matters is that Miles, given another chance by a coach who fought through all kinds of red tape for him, blew it in 16 minutes.

I don't know Nate Miles. I've never met him, and it appears I never will. I'm not willing to label the young man a "thug" – like some others have – based on gossip and stories of past transgressions.

The alleged incident which led to a restraining order on Miles is not necessarily the behavior of a thug. What it says to me, instead, is that this is the behavior of an immature 20-year-old freshman. The affidavit tells a graphic and disturbing story, alleging sexual abuse of a female freshman student.

On a campus which experienced a pair of sexual assaults last month – and a university given an embarrassing black eye by a first-hand account of sexual assault in this very newspaper last spring – this is unacceptable.

The university cannot allow any student to feel explicitly threatened by another student. Even ignoring Miles' history, his expulsion was clearly the right call.

But is Nate Miles a trend? That, I'm not so sure about.

Since my freshman year in 2005, there have been three major incidents with the men's basketball team: A.J. Price and Marcus Williams' infamous laptop thievery, Doug Wiggins and Jerome Dyson's alcohol-related bust and now the Miles flap.

In each case, the individuals involved made poor choices and were punished for it. Besides Miles, every player was suspended for a significant chunk of time.

But do these five individuals represent a "win-at-all-costs" mentality?

I think you could make a case that basketball factories embraced this mentality the moment they relaxed admissions standards to allow in supremely-talented-but-lax students. For every Emeka Okafor (3.8 GPA, finance major), there's a half-dozen guys (like Miles) with shaky transcripts who can shoot the "J".

However, it is not a crime to be a below-average student. I won't argue that the university (and others like it) is selling its soul for the glory that comes with national championship trophies. But this is beside the point.

We're talking about the players who supposedly put the "con" in UConn.

Williams is in the NBA and appears to be doing well for himself, both on the court and off.

Price enters his senior season recovering from a torn ACL. I would find it hard for anyone not to root for him as he perseveres through his second career-threatening injury in four years. Price appears to have matured and responded positively to his past mistakes.

As for Wiggins and Dyson, well, it was stupid for two under-21 kids to get caught in a car with alcohol. As unpaid spokesmen of the university, they should have known better.

But in the end, they are two college kids. And college kids drink. They always have, they always will. If you're the parent of a freshman or sophomore, try calling up your kids on a random Friday night at about midnight.

Incidentally, Dyson reportedly failed two random drug tests last season. Face-of-the-university caveat aside, I wonder how well any random dormitory floor would do under a random drug test.

So I reject the notion that these two young men have questionable character because they act like 19- and 20-year-olds do everywhere.

So that leaves us where we started, with Nate Miles. Of the above three situations, Miles' is the most severe. Already on a short leash, Miles blew it in spectacular fashion. But his alleged choices should not indict the other players and coaches on the team.

At some point, college kids – whether they play basketball or not – need to grow up. Most of us do. Some don't. Everyone should get a second chance. And then, most of the rest of us figure it out.

Nate Miles, for whom I wish nothing but luck in growing up, is a sad exception, not the latest in the trend.

Mustain ready to start

BY JOE TURNER
DAILY TROJAN (UNIVERSITY OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA)

LOS ANGELES, Calif. — Leading up to the USC Trojans' third game of the season against Oregon State, quarterback Mitch Mustain found himself in an unthinkable position.

Having already been passed by redshirt freshman Aaron Corp as the Trojans' No. 2 signal caller, Mustain was demoted to No. 4 on the team's depth chart, a position usually reserved for a player resembling an equipment manager more than a quarterback.

Junior Garrett Green was named the backup while Corp was widely assumed to be the third option, leaving Mustain to ponder what a highly-touted Arkansas transfer's role would be for the rest of the season.

The former Gatorade High School Player of the Year once expected to challenge Sanchez for the starting quarterback position during spring practice, but a couple weeks of disappointing practices landed him at the bottom of the depth chart.

My how things have changed.

Fast forward two weeks and Mustain is preparing to be the Trojans' starting quarterback as they head into the game against Arizona State on Saturday. With Sanchez's status in limbo due to a bone bruise to his left knee, Mustain finds himself at the forefront of the Trojans' offensive attack, whether Sanchez returns in time for Saturday or not.

"We have to prepare Mitch to play," USC coach Pete Carroll said after practice Monday. "We don't have any choice, so we'll have a full gameplan."

If Sanchez is out, it will be up to Mustain to start his first game since facing South Carolina on Nov. 4, 2006 as a member of the Razorbacks.

If Sanchez returns, Mustain will be the team's backup, ready to go, knowing that he's one play away from entering the game.

Regardless of the scenario, Mustain knows that he's better prepared now than he has been at any time since arriving at USC, in part because of his demotion to fourth-string quarterback.

"[The coaches] were trying to give me and Aaron [Corp] the opportunity to step back and clear our heads a little bit," Mustain said. "It helped me, just to get away from that, to be able to watch and focus in a little more this week."

Leading up to the game against Oregon, Mustain responded to his chance to compete in the ongoing competition for backup quarterback, earning him the job against the Ducks.

A solid week of practice boosted Mustain's confidence, convincing him that he was prepared if something were to happen. When Sanchez's knee buckled awkwardly in the third quarter, it was time for Mustain to prove it to everyone else.

"It was kind of ironic that something did happen," Mustain said. "I didn't know if he was going to get back up and be OK or what was happening, but I was ready to go."

Mustain rebounded from an early interception to finish 5-for-8, passing for 111 yards and a touchdown to go along with a pick.

The touchdown pass came late in the fourth quarter on a perfectly lobbed ball down the sideline that found the hands of wide receiver David Ausberry. Ausberry found separation from the cornerback on his way to the 59-yard touchdown pass.

After struggling early in the season because of unfamiliarity with the offense, Mustain had the presence of mind to read the defense, make the proper adjustment and change Ausberry's route from a slant to a go route before the snap.

"It's something we go over from the first day but a year ago, I wouldn't have felt comfortable to do it, take a shot at it," Mustain said. "A year later, it's a bit different."

The hot route epitomized Mustain's newfound understanding of the offense, something that Carroll and the rest of the coaches had been waiting for.

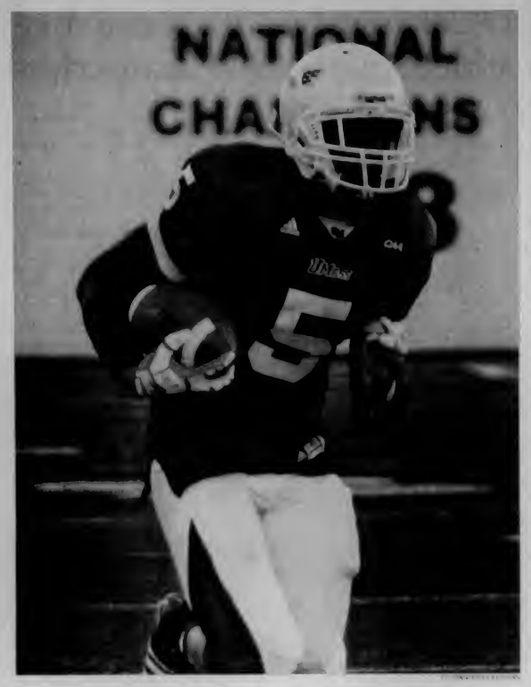
"He's gotten comfortable, finally," Carroll said. "I don't know exactly why or how to tell you how that came about but it did. It's really great to get him in the game."

Talking to Mustain after practice, he seems relieved to be back in his familiar role, as if he had doubted himself as to whether he could return to the level of play he knew he was capable of.

For Mustain, the concern was real, but was removed by succeeding under meaningful game situations.

"That was one of the reasons I was happy that it wasn't just mop-up duty," Mustain said of playing meaningful minutes. "Those are the kinds of times when you start doubting yourself, when it's not really for anything.

"You're not playing for keeps."



Just a couple weeks ago, Mustain was far from even playing not-for-keeps. As the then-No. 4 quarterback, Mustain's extent of playing was throwing a couple half-speed slant routes during warm-ups.

Yet, somehow, the demotion-turned-wake-up call might prove to be a reminder Mustain needed to show just how good of a player he is.

And whether his next meaningful action comes this week, this season or the next, Mustain will be ready to enter the game on a moment's notice, comfortably and capably.

Jeromy Miles sealed last week's game against Delaware with a 52-yard interception return for a touchdown in the fourth quarter. UMass' defense will look to have another big game this weekend against Northeastern.

Huskies riding two-game winning streak

The No. 13 Massachusetts football team (3-2, 1-1 Colonial Athletic Association) is coming off its best and most impressive defensive outing of the season in its 17-7 win against Delaware.

Robby Schoenhoft, Delaware's starting quarterback, was unable to get in a rhythm all game, throwing for only 40 yards and one touchdown. UMass had pressure on Schoenhoft all game, forcing him to scramble out of the pocket and disrupting his throws.

The Minutemen used numerous blitzing schemes to throw off Schoenhoft's reads, which in return forced him to hold onto the ball longer, giving UMass defenders time to get in his face.

The defense's dominance this weekend did more that just shut down the opposition. It has brought the team closer and at the perfect time; UMass is heading toward the thick of its conference schedule.

"For them to hit their stride now and to come together as a defense it really brings us together as a team," said senior quarterback Liam Coen. "Earlier in the season we scored points and now we were struggling to score points and they shut them down. If the offense were to score 40 [points] and the defense was to give up 30 [points], I wouldn't have been as happy as to see what they did in a dominating fashion on Saturday."

The Minutemen will look to use their momentum in this weekend's contest against Northeastern (2-3, 1-0 CAA). Last weekend the Huskies defeated Towson 35-17. Northeastern used 28 unanswered points and a sturdy defense to get past the Tigers. Despite the Huskies' record, UMass coach Don Brown knows they are much better than their record indicates.

"[Northeastern] is an excellent football team and are improving on a week to week basis," Brown said. "We have our hands full."

Before their win against Delaware last Saturday, the Minutemen played poor defensively in the previous three weeks, managing to win only one of those three. UMass allowed 45, 52 and 56 points to Holy Cross, James Madison and Texas Tech, respectively.

"We just had to keep our focus," said Brown. "You get your guys to play as a unit, that's what you're looking to do," said Brown reflecting on his team's defensive effort against Delaware.

UMass linebacker Josh Jennings was awarded the CAA Football Defensive Player of the Week honor after his career-high 16 tackles in the win against Delaware.

"Josh [Jennings] is a great player, and he's [got a] really quick twitch. You have to coach him at linebacker like you don't coach the other guys; he has a tremendous instinct for the game," Brown said during his weekly CAA teleconference. "He just played a complete football game and led our defense all day long."

The award was the juniors second of the season. He got the other in the Minutemen's first game of the season when Jennings recorded, what was then a career high in tackles (13), until he broke it this weekend. Jennings now leads the CAA with 53 tackles (10.6 per game) and also has an interception and a sack on the season.

Despite the success the defense had against Delaware, they still struggled bringing the quarterback down behind the line of scrimmage, a problem they have had all year.

So far this season the Maroon and White have five sacks in five games. Compare that to 44 sacks the team had over the entire season last year and 15 through the first five games last year, and you know there is room for improvement.

Against Delaware, the Minutemen had numerous opportunities to sack Schoenhoft, but the quarterback remained elusive, slipping away from UMass defenders.

The Minutemen will need to capitalize on such opportunities against Northeastern and their quarterback, Anthony Orio. Orio has thrown for 1,032 yards and six touchdowns this season. Huskies' running back Alex Broomfield is another threat on the offensive side. Broomfield has rushed for 509 yards and five touchdowns.

"Alex Broomfield is having a tremendous year at tailback," Brown said.

If the Minutemen want to establish themselves again as a strong defensive team and be able to recognize last week's game as a statement, and not just a fluke, then they'll have to limit the production of both Orio and Broomfield.

Juniors Michael Hanson (46) and Eric Dickson (21) struggled to bring Delaware's Robby Schoenhoft down behind the line of scrimmage in Saturday's game. UMass' defense has five sacks through five games this year compared to the 15 it had last season through as many games.

Brown returns to Brookline

Remainder of schedule, must win for UMass in tough CAA

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The resurgence of the Massachusetts football team's defense and subsequent big win over Delaware will all be for nothing if UMass can't beat Northeastern this weekend.

If history is any indication, that shouldn't be a problem.

The No. 13 Minutemen (3-2, 1-1 Colonial Athletic Association) have won 21 of their last 22 meeting against the Huskies. The last time Northeastern beat the Maroon and White was in 2002 – when current UMass coach Don Brown was roaming the sidelines in Brookline.

That will be the site of this Saturday's meeting between the schools, which have formed a unique rivalry since Brown's controversial departure from Northeastern following the 2003 season.

But these teams have met four times since then (Brown is 4-0 against his former team) and the stigma from this yearly meeting has worn off some.

"Obviously there is some history there and we just got to keep our emotions in check and just go out and play another game," senior quarterback Liam Coen said. "Maybe a couple years ago it probably would have been a little more bitter and guys would have been a little bit more ticked off but not so much now.

"It's another business trip and we've got to go out and try to take care of business and play a good football team," he said.

The Huskies (2-3, 1-0 CAA) endured a tough 2007 season, finishing up at 3-8 overall and 2-6 in the conference. But coach Rocky Hager's team is stronger this season, led by senior quarterback Anthony Orio and senior running back Alex Broomfield.

The Huskies' signal-caller spent much of last season handing the ball off to running back Maurice Murray – passing for just eight touchdowns in 11 games. But Orio leads a more balanced attack now, averaging over 206 yards passing per game (up from 141.6 in 2007). Broomfield has filled in nicely for the graduated Murray, rushing for 509 yards (4.2 yard average) and five touchdowns.

Orio does a good job of limiting turnovers (nine interceptions in the last two seasons) and can move around well in the pocket – rushing for over 400 yards during that span. He keeps the chains moving (NU is 40 percent on third downs) and the offensive line keeps him on his feet, allowing just six sacks this season.

"Anthony Orio is playing really solid, making great decisions in the throw game," Brown said. "We have our hands full as they use a lot of formations. They're trying to get on the perimeter on you, and we're going to have to be ready for a great attack there."

Orio struggled last year against the Minutemen, though, completing just half of his 24 passes for 162 yards in a 24-7 loss in Amherst.

But the key to Saturday's game will likely be how lethal UMass' offensive attack will be against the defense of Northeastern – which has struggled this season. The Minutemen failed to capitalize on many of their chances against the Blue Hens last weekend, but the defense played well enough to ensure the 17 points UMass scored was enough for a win.

Running back Tony Nelson could be in for a big day once again for the Minutemen. Northeastern has allowed 870 rushing yards in five games, giving up 11 touchdowns and a 4.3-yard average per rush. That bodes well for Nelson, who has emerged this season with four 100-plus yard rushing games, 575 yards (5.8 yards per carry) and five touchdowns.

The passing defense for the Huskies – other than star corner Nate Thellen and his four interceptions – hasn't been great either. Opponents have averaged 283.6 yards per game through the air, but Thellen's play-making and a strong blitzing defense have helped cause turnovers and held teams to field goals.

"They're a physical defense and they don't give up a lot of big plays," Coen said of the NU defense, which held the UMass signal-caller to 191 yards and no touchdowns last season. "They have some veteran guys and are good up front and in the secondary."

Northeastern has played much better lately, having won two straight games after allowing 30 or more points in three straight losses to enter the season. The Minutemen appear to be back on track, as well, defeating then-No. 16 Delaware last weekend after they re-grouped during their bye week from consecutive blowout losses to James Madison and Texas Tech.

This weekend the Huskies have the perfect opportunity to get back at Brown for leaving Brookline for Amherst – as a loss for the Minutemen would put them in serious trouble at 3-3 overall and 1-2 in the CAA. More than that, a Northeastern win could put them in the Top 25 for the first time in a long while.

Moving forward

Minutemen aim for consistency in 2008

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a roller-coaster 2007-08 season, the Massachusetts hockey team looks to avoid making the same mistakes as it starts fresh with experienced players and new talent.

Entering this season, UMass has similar goals as past seasons. The Minutemen hope to be a consistent team, making sure they can secure home ice for the Hockey East tournament and then work towards an NCAA tournament berth. Last year, they fell short of both goals after they both seemed like certainties.

UMass began the 2007-08 season on top, earning a program best No. 5 national ranking at the end of December after going 5-1-1 against ranked opponents, including consecutive wins over New Hampshire, Notre Dame and Colorado College.

But, as the season progressed the Minutemen didn't. The Minutemen were 10-3-5 entering the new year, but once January hit UMass' record dropped – going 0-5-1 in the month. By the end of February they were 2-10-1 for the 2008 portion of the season. With critical wins in March against Merrimack, the Minutemen made it to the Hockey East quarterfinals, where they lost two games to New Hampshire – ending their season. UMass finished the season with an overall record of 14-16-6 and were 9-13-5 in Hockey East.

"It was never about effort [in the 2007-08 season]. These guys came here and worked really hard. But it wasn't about losing focus because they lost a bit of confidence. They retreated a little bit, kind of went off on their own and lost

Senior Cory Quirk was named 1-of-2 captains for the Minutemen's 2008-09 season. The center plays a key role on UMass's top line and special teams units.

Key pieces return to lineup, freshmen hope for impact

BY RYAN FLEMING AND JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the 2008-09 season underway tomorrow, the Massachusetts hockey team will look to enjoy the same success it had early on last season. In its first 15 games UMass posted a record of 7-4-4, beating such formidable teams as New Hampshire, reigning national champion Boston College and Boston University.

At one point in the season the Minutemen were ranked as high as No. 5. UMass began to slip, though, once the second half of the season started.

After its victory in the Lightning College Hockey Classic UMass defeated eventual national finalist Notre Dame and perennial Top 10 team Colorado College. UMass promptly fell apart. Some point to the two-week break after the victory and, yet, others cite the complete inconsistency the Minutemen experienced for most of February.

UMass coach Don Cahoon hoped 2007-08 Minutemen would build upon the success of the team from the season before. But it wasn't to be. UMass still ranks among college hockey's rising programs, and Cahoon believes this is the team that will finally push the program from rising to risen.

FORWARDS

The Minutemen return seven of their top 10 scorers from last year, led by sophomore James Marcou.

Marcou led the Minutemen with 32 points, scoring eight goals and 24 assists. The sophomore played in all 36 games during his freshman campaign. His playmaking ability not only dazzled UMass fans, but baffled opposing defenses. No matter who Cahoon put next to the shifty winger, offense was the result. However, when he paired the slight Marcou with pivot Cory Quirk and the 6-foot-2 Alex Berry, UMass found some semblance of consistency when they so desperately needed it.

For now, Cahoon plans to keep the trio together. But as he has shown in the past, no line is set in stone. Current production outweighs that of the past, and with the influx of five new freshman forwards, there are countless combinations that could result in consistent production at different times.

Braun, Nolet fill holes

Gifted defensemen flow through UMass

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

First there was Thomas Pöck. He was just better than everyone. Then there was Marvin Degon, he shot harder than everyone. Mark Matheson and Mike Kostka followed, they worked harder than everyone.

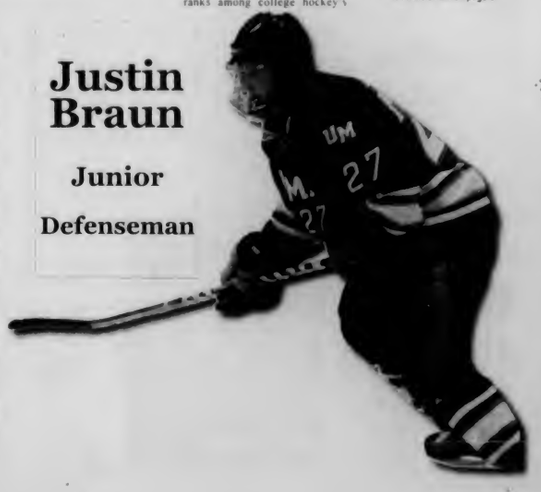
Now there's Justin Braun and Martin Nolet; and Massachusetts hockey coach Don Cahoon is excited about the next two years with this pair as the elder statesmen towing the Mullins Center blue lines.

Cahoon came to Amherst from Princeton in 2000 with plans of a Hockey East powerhouse. The stream of gifted, well-round defensemen just kind of happened.

"That's a credit to the guys I have working with me," Cahoon said. "They're able to sort out who these players are. And it's a credit to the system we play, and the way we go about our practice. We keep everyone grounded and work toward the same end. It's not an entitlement; it's not a rite of passage. It's something that's developed through hard work.

"We've had those type of guys in our program and they deserve a lot of credit for having the stick-to-itiveness an d the belief that if they put the time, that this, in fact, will occur," he said.

Both players came to Amherst with certain skills, which blossomed further under the tutelage of Cahoon and his staff. The difference between Braun and Nolet and the other UMass defensemen lies in their potential to become complete players.



Braun's size and hockey intellect made the defensive transition from high school and prep hockey to the NCAA a cinch. Even against the best players in Hockey East, Braun can calmly position himself and nullify the efforts of the strongest, fastest players on the ice. Rather than rely solely on physicality, he, like Kostka and the others before him, anticipates plays and gets where he needs to be.

"He is relentless in getting body position in being able to possess the puck," Cahoon said. "He sometimes simplifies the game to such a point that he makes the very obvious play repeatedly and it becomes a fundamentally sound play."

The offensive element initially missing from Braun's game seemed to develop on his own. As he became more comfortable with UMass' system and his varying roles within it, it was only natural for him to creep into the offensive end.

"He doesn't try to play outside himself too often. He is very dependable, very trustworthy," Cahoon said. "Now he has developed into an offensively-gifted player as well. He is jumping into the offense and has

Cyclops comes to University

BY CHRIS SHORES
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The College of Engineering at the University of Massachusetts unveiled the purchase of Cyclops, a new supercomputer system, this Monday. Its claim to fame is the ability to perform five billion math operations in one second.

The supercomputer was purchased from Plymouth-based Microway Corporations. It gets the name Cyclops because it's made up of 608 linked processors but has only one computer screen, much like the one-eyed beast.

To grasp the enormous potential of such a machine, consider the following: each processor has at least an equal, if not greater, computational capability to that of every human in the world combined. It can be used to find solutions to questions one may never have thought answerable.

Cyclops can determine how much air will move through a jet engine or examine a crack in a bridge and determine the precise moment the bridge will fail.

The $120,000 HPC Linux cluster supercomputer was sought after and eventually purchased by engineering Dean Michael Malone.

"Forward-thinking investments by Dean Malone keep UMass at the leading edge of engineering research and education," said Blair Perot, director of the theoretical and computational fluid dynamics laboratory in the department of mechanical and industrial engineering.

Perot was on hand during the introductory ceremony Monday. Also in attendance were several of Perot's graduate students, who have access to the Department of Defense and National Science Foundation's supercomputers across the country. The students presented posters of the work they've been doing with the computers and what they plan to do now that they have access to Cyclops.

Some of the planned projects include simulations of turbulence in fluids and simulations of flow over a wind turbine. One student plans to use the computer to take a closer look at algorithms for DNA sequencing.

Because of their knowledge and access to supercomputers, the graduate students will have no problem using Cyclops, said Perot.

Two of Perot's undergraduate students will also have access to the supercomputer as part of independent study research projects.

Police face civilian replacement

BY ADAM P. COULTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts state legislature has just passed a law replacing police officers with civilian flaggers on many state-financed road construction projects.

The bill that became law on Oct. 3 was conceived several months ago by Deval Patrick's administration as a way to cut the state deficit. Governor Patrick said the practice of replacing the lucrative police details with civilian flaggers at roadwork sites would not reduce public safety and would ultimately save the Commonwealth between $5.7 million and $7.2 million annually.

The new policy will require police details at the most hazardous sites and civilian flaggers at sites where the speed limit is below 45 miles per hour. Civilians would also be used at sites where barriers are used to block off crews working on high-speed, high-traffic roads. But the University of Massachusetts Police Department (UMPD) and state law enforcement agencies think this could be asking for trouble.

President of the State Police Association, Richard R. Brown told the Boston Globe in August that "Any time you take police officers, who are highly trained, with the equipment that they bring, and put civilians out there who have minimal training, you are taking a risk in public safety."

UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archibald agreed with Brown's assertion that police officers are better suited to keep watch on the roads, especially at UMass.

"It's our position that officers have the necessary training and experience to manage that which can sometimes be complex traffic patterns – in particular here with the high traffic of pedestrians, it's more of a concern to us," said Archibald.

Every road at UMass is a primary road which heightens the chances of an accident, whereas other municipalities have secondary roads. Archibald also said officials have asked the student body to walk more instead of driving, which would lower the chances of injuries occurring.

Besides the usual safety precautions around a road site, such as directing traffic and crossing pedestrians, Archibald believes there are other advantages to having a well-trained, uniformed officer present.

"There are times when a construction company wants to do more than is reasonably safe. Instead of taking up half a lane they want a full lane, or they don't have the necessary safety devices," said Archibald. "As an outside entity from the construc-

Making new candidates

BY BRENDAN DOYLE

ITHACA, N.Y. — WikiCandidate hopes to bring people from across party lines to create "the perfect candidate," a presidential hopeful who, ideologically and personably, all of America could support.

Josh Braun first thought of the concept for WikiCandidate after the 2004 elections, when he noticed the complaints of his friends and colleague's about single policy issues or personality traits of a candidate. After beating the idea around with Gillespie and Epstein, Braun's vision began to develop in the nascent stages of the presidential primaries.

"The context of the site reflects what's going on in the real election," said Braun. "We wanted to see people hash out those [political] issues."

As planning for the site expanded, undergraduates, including Julie Bai '09, were recruited to help design and develop WikiCandidate.

"I think it's a really cool site," said Bai, a web developer involved with the usability tests in the preliminary stages. "Through this social interactivity, I hope people see the importance of voting."

A short registration form is necessary to edit WikiCandidate. After that, users are free to

Pacemakers secured

BY SARA CODY

Future recipients of the newest line of implanted medical devices may share a common enemy with the computer in front of them: Internet hackers.

In the United States alone, there are more than 2.5 million Implanted Medical Devices (IMDs), including pacemakers, defibrillators, and insulin pumps.

Doctors soon will be able to receive patient data through the Internet and other wireless sources, and also manipulate these devices the same way, according to the information they receive. While this would provide a whole new world of convenience to the recipients of IMDs, it would also make an immense number of people vulnerable to hackers and cyber terrorists.

Thankfully, Kevin E. Fu, an assistant computer science professor at the University of Massachusetts, is working on a solution to this frightening problem. Fu was recently awarded a three-year grant of $449,000 by the National Science Foundation to improve the security measures of these life-saving devices.

"The main goal of the study is to understand the patients' expectations of security and privacy," explained Fu.

Fu will be conducting a two-part research project. He will work on developing a working prototype of a secure IMD as well as conducting interviews with patients who are receiving new cardiac IMDs at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston. The patients will be asked about their expectations for security and privacy with their medical information, and the amount of trust they have in their IMDs.

Fu said if his team is successful, "all sorts of new therapies can be employed much more easily."

Fu assured that patients who receive an IMD today are at very minimal risk for being attacked by ill-meaning hackers.

"What we mainly care about is that in the future, we know that these devices are going to become more connected to the Internet and to wireless and we want to catch these problems before they result in something bad," he said.

Dr. Craig Smith, MD, an interventional cardiologist and the Director of Cardiac Care at UMass Memorial Hospital in Worcester, agreed that this is a very concerning problem for the future.

"There would absolutely be ramifications because you could easily send someone into [cardiac] arrest if you were Machiavellian enough to control these devices," said Smith.

While the idea of online hackers attacking medical equipment may seem far-fetched now, according to Smith, it's not tion company, and also the authority as a police officer, to correct these oversights and safety issues is important."

The battle between police unions and administrations in the state has long been a bone of contention. There are some people who don't see the need for expensive police details, especially since Massachusetts is the only state in the country that relies so heavily on the practice.

"They might have a captain, a lieutenant, a sergeant and a couple of patrolmen working on one construction job," said Boston Municipal Research Bureau President Samuel Tyler in the Boston Globe. The officers are paid extra for this work and it can translate into as much as $15,000 to $40,000 a year plus their salaries.

State police earn $40 an hour and Springfield police earn $39.82 an hour, while the civilian flaggers would make $32 hourly, according to Massilve cum.

The issue of money on both sides of the debate is undeniably a factor, but Archibald and the UMPD have stated they are more concerned with making the campus as safe as possible. "It's not a matter of where the money goes as much as it's an issue of making a safe community," he said.

"beam-me-up-Scotty far-fetched."

Smith recalled that during the development of automated external defibrillators, or AEDs, there were similar concerns of people using these machines for malicious intent.

"One of the concerns was that it would not only be causing unnecessary harm to a patient, but you could use it as a security breach weapon by just slapping the pads on someone and shocking them, knocking them out or killing them," Smith said.

During the 1990s, scientists worked to develop a computer algorithm that would make the machine smarter. They discovered a way to program the machine to deliver a shock only after the patient has been analyzed by the computer within the machine and all of the appropriate bodily conditions have been met.

Today, AEDs are found in many places such as airports and train stations, and have remained tamper-proof since their introduction to the general public.

While many students are looking at a meager job market, University of Massachusetts alumnus Marc Williams went out and created his own.

Since receiving his masters degree from the UMass sports management program in 1999, Williams has received a position tailor made for him at George Mason University in Virginia.

He's the Chief Marketing Officer for both the College of Education and Human Development and the Center for Sports Management, which is responsible for the visibility of the University and its programs.

Also part of the faculty at the school, Williams is changing the game in the sports management program as he infuses his courses with real-life experiences and a more hands-on approach.

"Coming to the university from the industry [will allow] executives to educate young people properly [about the industry]," said Williams.

Before going back to academia, Williams became an entrepreneur in setting the trend between sports marketing to the music industry. "I started this [connection]," he said.

Williams also worked as brand director of Champ Sports, where he was the only African-American working for the development of the Champ national brand.

Williams was successful in getting Champ Sports its first partnership with the Universal/Motown record label. This partnership led to the premiere of rapper Nelly's first national commercial.

Williams worked for Footaction U.S.A. as the national manager of partnership marketing, and launched female rapper Eve's promotional tour for her 2001 "Scorpion" album.

His first internship in the sports management field was a three-month program at the Reebok headquarters in Boston where he coordinated community events including one featuring Allen Iverson.

Williams, a member of the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity Incorporated, praised UMass for the education and the opportunity created for him.

Williams recalled former UMass basketball coach James Bruiser, who allowed him to do a tribute about the history of UMass basketball. "He believed in me and gave me the opportunity to do the special project, because of his belief I'm totally indebted to him," said Williams.

Williams said he hopes to develop a stronger relationship that will allow him to share his experience and expertise in the industry with the UMass community by giving lectures and presentations.

Though the Web site has a modest number of users at this point, the popularity is liable to increase as Election Day nears.

Tenn. bomb scare

BY TIFFANY GIBSON
[illegible]

MURFREESBORO, Tenn. — Middle Tennessee State U. received e-mails Wednesday afternoon from an unknown sender that shut down campus because of details about doing damage and killing people on campus.

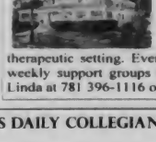
"When e-mails like this come out, we don't just ignore these things," said Chief of Campus Police Buddy Peaster. Peaster said a fire occurred in Miss Mary Resident Hall Wednesday night. President Sidney McPhee decided to cancel classes because there might be a connection with the fires and e-mails.

"Following our regularly scheduled fall break, classes will resume on Wednesday, October 15," he said. "Employees and students are encouraged to report any unusual or suspicious activity to Campus Police."

Security officials flooded campus with representatives from Homeland Security, the FBI, swat teams, Rutherford County Emergency Management and Special Operatives Tennessee Highway Patrol on standby at the university.

Tim Hooker, with emergency management of Rutherford County, said that they are still "running an investigation." Residential Halls are not allowing access to anyone unless they swipe their card to get into the building.

Peaster said that the e-mails either came from a Yahoo or Hotmail account. They did not come from an MTSU account.



Peaster said that he doesn't know if the suspect is still on campus, but a student has given a description of someone seen near the fire pile in the stairwell of Miss Mary Hall.

"We haven't received a bomb threat, but the e-mails and fires that have been happening may be related," Peaster said. "The [e-mail] says kill, bomb, or destroy a bunch and just in general carnage."

The e-mail, Peaster said, talks about "killing, bombing and destruction."

However, the e-mails do not specify a location.

The 'Devine' father of local blogging

Thomas Divine kicks drug habit and keeps up with blogging habit

By Andrea Murray
Collegian Staff

You've probably seen him hanging around the Haigis Mall; a man about the age of your father, in his daily uniform: a worn baseball cap, a ratty T-shirt, some classic blue jeans and usually some well-loved Converse Chuck Taylors. Thomas "Tommy" Devine was a student the University of Massachusetts in the late 1970s, during its party hey day. Now, Devine is known as the "father" of the western Massachusetts blogosphere. He never did finish his degree at UMass, but still went on to become influential in the Pioneer Valley.

Devine was born in Springfield, Mass., and raised in the Pine Point neighborhood. He has moved about the country a few times to places like Texas and Florida, but has always come back.

"I always want to live in the Valley. I'll visit and try other places out but the Pioneer Valley is the best place overall," said Devine.

Devine's well-known blog, "Tommy Devine's Online Journal," started as a zine, and later became the first western Massachusetts blog in 1998. His following has grown so much that his readers express disappointment when he doesn't update every day.

"When I was in rehab, people were calling the police. My blog was down for two months," said Devine.

Last October, Devine entered a rehabilitation facility for a crack-cocaine addiction. After a relationship with a younger man who introduced him to the drug, he was hooked. The addiction caused him to lose everything: his computer, his apartment and all of his money. He found himself at rock bottom after a tent party near Puffers Pond. An outreach worker met him there and guided him to rehabilitation.

As an addict, any money Devine had went to drugs. He stopped buying food. The only reason he ate was because the Amherst Survival Center (ASC) offered him a daily meal at noon free of charge.

"It's the karma of it all. Now I'm the one preparing and serving the food there," said Devine.

Devine's new daily routine focuses around volunteering at the ASC every day. He said that it helps to keep him on track and reminds him what could happen to him again. After volunteering for the day, he spends his afternoon blogging in the UMass W.E.B. DuBois Library. He heads back to Northampton, Mass., via the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority, and attends an Alcoholics Anonymous or Narcotics Anonymous meeting before going back to his current group home in Northampton.

As a UMass student, Devine was a journalism major. Like most journalism majors, he wrote for the Daily Collegian, contributing editorial columns and news articles. The carefree party scene at college led him off the academic track into a time when his motto was, "I never went to sleep the same day I woke up." He never finished his degree at UMass, though he was only a semester away from graduation. Now, at his group home in Northampton, it's lights out by 10 p.m.

"I've learned how to live like a 'normal' person," Devine says.

In recent times, Devine has been brought to multiple journalism classes at UMass as a guest speaker on the emerging field of blogging. He makes a bit of money off blogging, usually about $150 per month through Google AdSense.

See DEVINE on page 5

Thomas Devine, a.k.a. "The Baystate Objectivist" visited his old stomping ground at the Daily Collegian this Thursday where he wrote during the years he attended UMass in the late 1970s. He founded his political zine in 1991 and put it online in 1998, creating the first blog in western Massachusetts.

Devine sits down for coffee at Northampton's Haymarket Cafe while reading the Valley Advocate. He writes monthly for the publication and writes on his blog daily.

Thomas Devine has lived in the Pioneer Valley most of his life, bouncing between Springfield, Amherst and Northampton most frequently.

Pioneering the blog frontier

Devine admits that he has never been very career-oriented, but has always written. Later in his life, Devine took a few courses and finished his degree in journalism at Western New England College in Springfield. He says his degree has never done him any good.

Before Devine made his presence known in the online realm, he created a zine called The Baystate Objectivist with his friend Jay Libardi when they lived in Springfield in 1991. Word processing programs were new and made it possible for anyone to publish their own material. While others in the area made zines about the local punk music scene, Devine and Libardi decided they would concentrate on Springfield politics.

"The real Springfield was corrupt and sleazy and incompetent. I said, 'Let's write about that other Springfield,'" said Devine.

Devine and Libardi's zine gained a lot of public attention locally. Libardi passed away in 1994, but Devine kept making his zine through 1997. Always on the cutting edge, Devine had the idea to bring his zine to the Internet in 1998.

"Whatever I do, I try to push it to the edge. I think, 'What is the next thing?'" Devine says. "If it's not cutting edge, I'm not really interested."

At that time, Web sites like Blogger.com, Livejournal.com and Wordpress.com didn't exist. Devine used Yahoo.com's Geocities to create the first form of his online blog. Once his zine went online, he could write about anything and everything due to an infinite amount of space. Around this time, his writing became more autobiographical.

His blog stands out amongst others not because it has been around for a long time, but because the content is so varied and honest. Devine will talk about anything, and he's not embarrassed by any of it. He has chronicled his homosexuality, his political views, and even his drug-fueled downward spiral on his blog. He focuses on topics that are taboo in our society, typically viewed as shameful and hard to admit to others.

"I'm experimenting. I think in the future, people will have two personas. One, a personal one, which is kept only for a small group of people," said Devine. "And a very large public one that is as large as you can attract people to be interested."

Devine is aware that most people don't know the real him. His online persona is merely an extension of his true identity. The information on there is what he wants people to see. Still, there isn't much that he spares his audience.

Devine takes inspiration to experiment with his blog content from the large number of young people who chronicle their lives online in blogs. The 2004 Perseus survey, "The Blogging Iceberg," found that teenagers have created the majority of blogs in the world. The survey also stated that half of bloggers are between 13 and 19 years old, and 92.5 percent of blogs were created by people under the age of 30.

"These kids are pioneering living their lives in front of an audience. I said 'I'm not a kid, why don't I pioneer that?'" said Devine.

"Tommy Devine's Online Journal" features posts concerning happenings in Amherst, Northampton and Springfield. Devine takes his own pictures and sometimes shoots original video to post to the blog.

As his blog became more popular, Devine was offered opportunities in other media forms. He filled in on Dan Yorke's television show that was on channel ABC 40, and sometimes helped out on WHYN's "Kateri Walsh Show." Eventually Devine was given his own radio show, "The Tommy Devine Show," which ran on WNNZ-AM 640, but was cancelled, due to poor ratings.

"I'm really a writer, not a radio and TV person," said Devine.

Devine is slowly putting his life back together. He keeps himself on a strict schedule so as to stay out of trouble. He's on welfare for now and has hopes of getting his own Section 8 housing in Florence, Mass., and maybe having his own computer again too. He writes once a month for Northampton's "Valley Advocate," and contributes to his blog nearly everyday. That's fine with him though, he doesn't think he's good for anything else.

"To quote Bob Dylan, 'anybody who gets up in the morning and does what they want is a success.' And that's what I do. I go around and I think of what's interesting and I tell people about it and I take pictures of it," says Devine.

Web users can check out Tommy Devine's blog at www.tommydevine.blogspot.com.

'Grannies' are all the rage

Rachel Dougherty

We're Raging Grannies
Singing our songs
Doo-dah, doo-dah
We're Raging Grannies
Singing our songs
All the doo-dah dah'
Gonna rage and roar
Gonna stop all war
We're Raging Grannies
Singing our songs
All the doo-dah dah'

The first time I saw the Raging Grannies protesting outside of the Student Union building, I wondered who spiked the tea at the Red Hat Society meeting. Here were these elderly women tricked out in gaudy hats and feather boas, waving signs and belting out protest songs.

It's not at all unusual to see groups protesting or promoting causes on the UMass campus, but this was something different. These weren't students or crazies come up from Amherst's liberal underbelly. They were something new — something that drew crowds out of passing students and made people want to know what they were singing for.

The Raging Grannies are a lot like the Red Hat Society. That is, if the Red Hat Society had a political agenda and a penchant for getting arrested for protesting army recruitment centers. They're an international organization of women old enough to be grandmothers who dedicate themselves to the non-violent protest of social injustice. They dress in clothes intended to mock the stereotype of older women or "grannies" and sing songs to draw attention to their cause.

If the sight of old ladies singing disarms the public, then the sight of them being dragged away in handcuffs enrages it.

"We use who we are," says Paki Wieland, a Northampton resident and one of the "grannies" arrested at an army recruitment center in Greenfield last year. "Right now, when older women start singing, it has a disarming quality. People will listen to us because of who we are."

The Raging Grannies depend on radical actions to incite the public to action. If the sight of old ladies singing disarms the public, then the sight of them being dragged away in handcuffs enrages it.

The Raging Grannies represent a dying breed of American activism. These are women who began fighting social injustice promoting the Civil Rights Movement or protesting the Vietnam War. Activists in their time were burning draft cards, hosting illegal sit-ins, and being hauled off Montgomery buses in shackles to fight for social justice. The most radical form of protest seen on campus today is the chalking of University sidewalks.

Student activists today are more likely to table or party for peace than perform radical acts of civil disobedience. Activism has become a part of the mainstream, and today's activists are quieter and more moderate than their predecessors from the 1960s and 1970s. The most aggressive "activist" group on campus today is fighting for the legalization of marijuana. At a glance, it would seem that the roar has gone out of contemporary activism.

The reason for the shift may be more complicated than that. "We live in a more repressed society than we did in the sixties," says Wieland. "Students are hemmed in by more restrictions, like the dependence on government power to take away student loans."

Our society is freer and more repressed than it has ever been. We have more legally recognized rights than ever before, but more restrictions and limitations on those rights. We're more dependent on the government for education, health care and employment. We're less free to act because our actions are more easily tracked and recorded than ever before by the government.

Additionally, the kinds of injustice that activists face today are less concrete than those in the 1960s, and therefore harder to fight. It's harder to protest the war when it's being fought by a volunteer army. It's harder to protest the effects of racism or sexism when there's no law to be overturned, and only a sort of indefinite social mentality that upholds the oppression. While our laws make us look like the freest nation on earth, our rights are slipping away on technicalities.

The new activists work within the system to achieve change. They're quieter, more mainstream, but that does not necessarily make them less persuasive, just less visible. Instead of civil disobedience, they petition to overturn unjust laws by legal means.

It's a new form of activism, and just as necessary as the radical demonstrations from groups like the Raging Grannies. "We need to form cross-generational alliances," says Wieland. "Support each other, and we'll help you move on to take the torch."

Who are you calling stupid, stupid?

Alana Goodman

While presidential candidates come and go, there's one thing that liberal college students and professors can all agree on year after year: conservative candidates are just plain stupid.

The idiocy of conservatives is a belief that goes unquestioned on college campuses. The mere mention of Governor Sarah Palin's name evokes a sea of tittering in political science classes. Unfounded assertions by students that Senator Barack Obama is "much smarter" than Senator John McCain generate nothing but an agreeable nod from so-called "objective" professors.

Labeling Republican candidates as "dimwits" is nothing new. Ronald Reagan was called an "amiable dunce" during his presidency and was widely ridiculed as a dumb Hollywood actor. The alleged stupidity of George H.W. Bush was surpassed only by the idiocy of his Vice President Dan Quayle, who couldn't spell "potato." Then there was Bob Dole, who was consistently described as "inarticulate" and "bumbling" during the 1996 elections along with his "dumb jock" running mate, Jack Kemp.

Of course, according to popular opinion on campus, the king of all dimwits is our current president, George W. Bush, the mentally challenged cowboy from Texas.

During his first run for president against Al Gore in 2000, reporters constantly barraged Bush with "gotcha" questions on foreign policy and world leaders. In contrast, the New York Times solemnly opined, "Is Gore too smart to be president?"

While Bush was often publicly derided for his C average at Yale, the fact that Gore was in the bottom fifth of his class during his first two years at Harvard was largely ignored. Also disregarded were the times when Gore failed out of divinity school and dropped out of law school.

When John Kerry ran against Bush in 2004, he, even made Bush's alleged stupidity a part of his platform. "All over this country people are asking whether or not George Bush is smart enough to be president of the United States," Kerry declared, to nods of agreement from Democrats and the media.

However, when the IQ scores of both candidates were made public, it was discovered that Bush's score put him in the 95th percentile while Kerry's only put him in the 91st. Embarrassed, Kerry told NBC's Tom Brokaw that "I must have been drinking the night before I took that [test]."

Her knowledge of foreign policy may have been a bit shallow for a presidential candidate, but it was certainly acceptable for a vice presidential candidate.

Even despite this evidence of his intellectual superiority, President Bush is still considered one of the most dimwitted presidents in history. This mantra is so often repeated that it's now considered common knowledge at universities. But after eight years of Bush-bashing, academia has found an even more conservative, and hence "dumber," candidate to bad mouth – Sarah Palin.

With all of the talk about Palin's idiocy — how she flubbed the definition of the "Bush Doctrine" and refused to tell Katie Couric what newspapers she reads — very little has been made of her phenomenal performance at last Thursday's debate.

Her knowledge of foreign policy may have been a bit shallow for a presidential candidate, but it was certainly acceptable for a vice presidential candidate. It's safe to say that she succeeded America's expectations by far.

That could mean one of two things. Either Palin is not as ignorant about foreign policy as previously thought, or she's smarter and a much quicker learner than people assumed.

While Palin's sufficient but brief statements have been torn apart by the media, Joe Biden's factual inaccuracies during the debate have been completely ignored.

For example, during the debate Biden moronically claimed that the U.S. and France kicked Hezbollah out of Lebanon – something that no country has ever done.

Biden also insisted that "[General David McKiernan] said the surge principle in Iraq will not work in Afghanistan" – which is a complete misinterpretation of General McKiernan's statements. Instead of catching Biden's error, the media immediately jumped on Palin's mispronunciation of McKiernan's name when she tried to correct her opponent.

Besides blatant lies like "Obama did not say he'd sit down with Ahmadinejad" and "John McCain opposed [Clinton's plan for Bosnia in the 1990s]," Biden also told the audience to visit him at Katie's Restaurant in Wilmington, Del. He apparently didn't realize that the establishment closed down nearly 30 years ago.

And despite all the media mockery about Palin's degree from the far-from-Ivy-League University of Idaho, not much has been said about Biden's less-than-stellar college career. He graduated 506th out of 688 students from the University of Delaware, and nearly got kicked out of law school for plagiarism.

In 1988, Biden ran for president and was forced to drop out because he was found guilty, once again, of plagiarizing a speech. I guess he's not as quick of a learner as Sarah Palin — but don't expect to hear that line around campus.

The road to better roads

Eric Magazu

If you've shared my experiences, you've probably noticed that most of the paths and roads around campus are in poor condition. This is especially acute if you have the chance to drive down North Pleasant Street on a regular basis. The poor quality of roads and highways around the country mirror this same phenomenon. We seem to accept the poor quality of roads in the United States as a fact of life, but does it have to be this way? Do methods exist that can be employed to improve the quality of private transportation in America?

The mid 1800s were a time when America was rapidly industrializing. This was the era of the great American industrialists such as Andrew Carnegie, James Hill and Cornelius Vanderbilt, and it was during this time that America saw a great explosion of railroad development. These industrialists, sometimes referred to scoffingly as robber barons, made the important investments and sought to be the first to bring the railways to new parts of the country. Other businessmen, less astute in entrepreneurship, relied upon protections and subsidies from the government.

A better way to reach efficiency in highway construction would be to turn over the entire system to the marketplace.

When the system of free enterprise is allowed to function by its own devices, with the bare minimum of government regulation necessary to ensure a structured and just order, efficiency tends towards maximization. This is the situation in which many of the railroads were constructed in America. Some railroad capitalists sought subsidies, which resulted in the poor design of track and the land organization around the track, while others, such as James Hill, used their own ingenuity to place track efficiency. Hill expanded his success by following up with the development of additional infrastructure around the track.

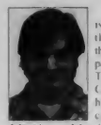
A system of individual entrepreneurship was the order of the day in the early era of America's railroads. A similar system prevailed in the early days of road construction. Private turnpike companies constructed toll roads throughout the United States. These companies often sought to improve routes already in existence in the hopes that the revenue from collecting tolls would earn a profitable return on investment.

Attempts were made as far back as the early part of the 19th century to formulate a national roadway network under the auspices of the federal government. These attempts generally resulted in failure, and one such attempt was vetoed by President James Madison. He found the bill to be unconstitutional.

It wasn't until the advent of the automobile, and the aftermath of World War II, that arguments were revived to create a national highway network. President Dwight Eisenhower argued that, for the purposes of national defense, a network of highways was needed. Eventually this system became law in 1956. The idea behind the massive government subsidization of the highway system is that private markets fail to provide an efficient level of roadways necessary to meet public demand, especially in rural and other lightly travelled locales.

However, as we can expect to occur with any project organized by the government, the system was inefficient. Instead of new roads being constructed in areas of maximum demand, they were designed by central planners in a less than optimal fashion. Local communities were severely disrupted by the division of cities by poorly planned roads and government seizure of private property. The quality of maintenance was, and is, often poor.

Recently, governments have become eager to send some of the work required to maintain highways back to private parties. This is generally done through the leasing of major turnpikes to a company that will charge tolls and maintain the road. According to a May 28, 2006 Denver Post article entitled "Roads to Riches," Chris Plunkett points out that there's often an improper projection of the increase in revenue resulting from such a lease. This result causes much financial mishandling around these transactions. Such concerns are part of the reason for the recent withdrawal of a private bid for a private entity to operate and maintain the Pennsylvania Turnpike.



The fact that this is a problem results from these leases not truly returning the administration of roadways to the private sector. They are merely contracting out a government function. A better way to reach efficiency in highway construction would be to turn over the entire system to the marketplace. A return to a largely private system of transportation funding would bring many of the efficiencies we've become used to in other areas of life to the roadways.

Whether such a system might work in local vicinities, such as our campus, would require further investigation and the willingness to seek infrastructure investment from private capital. There's been a long enough lapse since we have seriously examined the way we fund transportation in America, and this is a discussion worth having right here on campus.

While recent financial troubles have temporarily shaken our confidence in private capital in a world where private enterprise is transforming the status quo in a vast array of business sectors, why is it that we ought to expect anything less from America's transportation network?

Get on the party zeppelin

Matthew M. Robare

UMass is famed throughout the land as a party school. The Daily Collegian has duly chronicled the school's efforts to correct this image and crack down on excess at frat houses. As someone who lives in the dorms, I've been kept awake at night by the noises of drunken people returning as they yell, shout and generally make enough noise to wake the dead. When I finally get up in the morning, I find that the bathroom is a disaster area and people are sometimes passed out in the halls. I also find beer cans in the strangest places, like the statue of the Minuteman near the pond.

Passing frat houses while I go about my business during the day, I find their lawns covered in cups, cans and occasional articles of clothing. I've overheard people talking about police raiding the parties, making out with drunk college girls, and general acts of debauchery. Of course, I'm pretty sure that my main problem with these sorts of parties and the behavior displayed at them is that I'm never invited to any parties. I probably wouldn't go if I was, but it's nice to be thought of all the same.

Now, whenever I think about parties, I invariably start thinking about what sort of party I would throw. Because of my love for obscure words and phrases, I would call my party a box social. It would be a costume party and you could only get in wearing a costume. The guest list would include most of my friends, both those at UMass and from parts abroad.

Guests would arrive at the party location on velocipedes – those 19th century bikes with the gigantic front wheels and tiny back wheels, unicycles, or be driven in motorcycle sidecars. The party would be held in a zeppelin, and once it lifted off, latecomers would have to arrive by hot air balloon or biplane.

For entertainment, I would hire all three of UMass's Student Valley Productions comedy troupes – Mission Improvable, Improv With Attitude, and Sketch-22 – but the members would be on the guest list. I'd also have a couple of singers and bands. Voltaire, Weird Al, and a Grateful Dead cover band. I would also get a hypnotist too, because they're always fun.

I'm pretty sure that my main problem with these sorts of parties and the behavior displayed at them is that I'm never invited to any parties.

Once the party lifted off, there would be a leisurely cruise around the Pioneer Valley, complete with fireworks, freshly cooked food, open-air promenades, and a swimming pool right on the deck. Alcohol would be available to those over 21. People who tried to crash my party would be thrown overboard.

As the evening progressed, there would be movie screenings, possibly Mystery Science Theater 3000, or maybe I'd let the guests vote. I wouldn't be surprised if the whole zeppelin got rick-rolled at some point.

The party zeppelin would travel south, following the warmth and maybe stop in Cuba to buy weapons. This way, instead of having to stop at stores to replenish supplies, we could simply pillage the countryside.

Not to mention defend ourselves from anti-party forces once the pillaging began. I suspect we would always have to fight for our right to party.

Before reaching Cuba we would briefly stop in Washington, D.C. to take on Federal Reserve Board members, treasury officials and lobbyists so I could pay for the box social. I would write and dine the distinguished guests, softening them up so when I returned them to Washington, D.C., they would convince Congress to give the party a massive bailout despite our pillaging, unproductive partying and devil-may-care attitude.

In fact, I don't even see why the majority of Americans should object to my party being bailed out by Congress. After all, the people I would invite to my party are middle-class taxpayers too, unlike the government agents and lobbyists with their ties to the financial industry. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson used to be Chairman of Goldman-Sachs (guess which company got the biggest share of the bailout?), who encouraged banks to make subprime loans with the implicit guarantee that Congress would take care of them in the event of a crash.

Anyone with a zeppelin that would like to sell it to me (pavement should be made upon both major party presidential candidates deeming my party bailout necessary for the financial security of every American) should contact me using my e-mail address at the end of this column.

ARTS & LIVING

Donald Sutherland (left) and Elliot Gould (right) both struggled with Robert Altman's directing style while filming "MASH." The two actors' careers took a major step forward after the movie's release in 1970, becoming two of the most recognizable actors in Hollywood.

Altman's creativity highlights festival

By Kevin Kocwara
Collegian Staff

"The Academy of Music had a history of showing first-run films, but stopped doing that a few years back. And now different people work on doing special film projects," said Bob Climan of the Northampton Arts Council. This weekend, the Council will be putting on a film festival dedicated to Robert Altman and his body of work.

The Northampton Arts Council is a non-profit organization that gives out grants to local artists. This event is being put on with hopes of raising more money for more grants. Robert Altman is a great choice as a director to feature due to the way he operates.

Altman is one of America's most profound and unique filmmakers. He fought against the Hollywood system. He set out to tell of the American experience in many of his films with a style of his own.

"In a time when we're all focused on the election and looking at America, it's really interesting to see it through the eyes of a filmmaker," says Climan. "We hope that people will be educated about Altman."

Sadly, Altman died after completing "Prairie Home Companion" in 2006. P.T. Anderson ("Boogie Nights," "There Will be Blood") was hired during the filming as a secondary director who would step in and finish the filming if Altman passed away during the shooting.

Climan hopes this film series will open the eyes of the younger generation of movie enthusiasts in the Pioneer Valley, especially film students. "I can't imagine going through a film course and not knowing about Altman," said Climan.

Altman is most widely known for one of his earliest films "MASH.", which went on to be nominated for five Oscars, winning one (Best Screenplay Based on Material from Another Medium), and earning Altman the first of his seven nominations (five as a director). The movie also helped spur one of the most celebrated television shows in American history.

In 2006 Altman was awarded an honorary Oscar for his artistic choices and visionary films that changed the landscape of filmmaking. Altman was known for his artistic undertakings as a director who never compromised his beliefs for Hollywood or money.

With his trademark techniques of overlapping dialogue and ensemble casts, Altman created a film genre all his own, as well as the adjective "Altmanesque."

The overlapping dialogue allowed actors to create a real life feel in a film. With multiple characters talking at once, conversations at a party would become more than one or two characters discoursing back and forth. They'd become scenes where the audience gets to know all the characters. To do this, Altman encouraged improvised dialogue between characters.

"In a way, [Altman] is one of the most interesting filmmakers in America and he certainly tells the story of what America is about," said Climan. Altman filmed with a passion and worked on the American way of life in so many films. "MASH" is an anti-war film full of satire. "A Wedding" explores the ceremony of wedlock with a certain eye and humor that sheds light on tradition. He even went so far as to mock his own bosses in Hollywood with "The Player." He also took on radio with his final project when he directed "Prairie Home Companion."

Climan and the Northampton Arts Council are taking these classic films and giving them the respect they deserve on the big screen. "We're showing really pristine 35mm prints of the archived films," said Climan. "A lot of people are showing DVDs in theatres these days. It's not a film experience at all. We're really very conscious of showing film properly, especially at a theatre like the Academy."

The academy's screen is the biggest in the Pioneer Valley and will be one of the busiest this weekend with the Altman Festival.

A showing of "MASH" will kick the festival off today at 6 p.m. The Feelies will follow with a live performance at 9 p.m.

The film series runs Friday through Monday. Individual movie tickets cost $7 while there are many packages available. An entire festival pass is $30, Saturday and Sunday all-day passes cost $15. And then there is also a two-film deal that costs $10. For more information, go to www.northamptonartscouncil.org.

"The Scottish Play"

Theatre puts on "Macbeth" without fear of ancient curses affecting the show

By Michelle Fredette
Collegian Staff

One of Shakespeare's most violent tragedies, "Macbeth," will be performed by the Renaissance Center Theater Company beginning today.

This will be the fourth show of the year for the company, which was created in 2006 by the Amherst Renaissance Theater. The group has toured in the area performing a number of scenes from Shakespeare and other Renaissance playwrights.

Much superstition has surrounded the play. Shakespeare supposedly used real witches' spells in the text, causing the play to be cursed. It's said that productions of the play are troubled with accidents. Many consider it bad luck to say "Macbeth" out loud and often refer to it as "the Scottish play."

Director Nathaniel Leonard, however, seems unfazed by these superstitions, using the rightful name of the play throughout an interview.

A Ph.D. student in English Literature here at UMass, Leonard did his first work directing in 12th grade and has directed several plays since then. His biggest shows include "Oleanna" by David Mamet and an adaptation of the opera "Faust." He has also done other "weird random stuff."

The cast for this production draws heavily from the area. Leonard is not the only UMass student participating in the performance. Actors Tom Gostanian and Paul Devlin, who play Malcolm and Banquo, respectively, are both first-year students here at UMass Amherst.

Students from Amherst College will appear in the production as well, with sophomore Kathryn Libby playing First Witch, Lady Macduff, Donalbain and Doctor, and sophomore Natasha Smith playing Second Witch, Messenger, Servant Attendant and Gentlewoman. Amherst Regional Middle School 8th grader Gabrielle Holme-Mille will fill out the last of the "weird sisters."

Sean McHugh, who plays Macbeth, has performed on the North Adams Main Street Stage. He graduated from the Massachusetts College of Liberal Arts in 2008.

This is not Leonard's first time working with the Renaissance Center, although it is his first time directing for them. In the spring, he appeared in "Measure for Measure," along with actor Walter Carroll, who plays Duncan, First Murderer, and Seyton in the Company's performance of "Macbeth." Carroll is also from the Pioneer Valley.

When asked why the group chose "Macbeth," Leonard explained that they "wanted something small but recognizable that people would want to come and see." He points out the intimate space of the theater calls for something without a large group scene, and "Macbeth" fits this requirement.

In order to maintain the serious tone of "Macbeth," the Renaissance Center Theater Company has kept the set minimal. "Everything in the set is black," explains Leonard, "you get color from the costumes, but the lighting is minimal... everything technical we've kept minimal."

In keeping with a minimalist approach, Leonard has shortened his production of the already short play, deleting the entire "Hecate" scene, which is actually taken from Thomas Middleton's "The Witch" and is not written by Shakespeare.

This minimalist attitude stems from a desire to focus on the relationships between characters rather than the paranormal elements, and a desire to keep audiences entertained. "We're conditioned for two-hour experiences," says Leonard.

Of the characters, Leonard explains, "I've always liked the witches and Macduff. Macduff is human – he makes so many stupid mistakes." With this humanity, Leonard hopes to achieve a relatable production.

But Leonard is quick to note that even though he likes Macduff because we can empathize with him, he's most meticulous in the scenes involving Macbeth and Lady Macbeth. He sees their relationship as the central aspect of the play and even goes so far as to say, "if Macbeth weren't married, it wouldn't be a tragedy."

The Renaissance Center Theatre Company will perform "Macbeth" on Oct. 10, 11, 17 and 18 at 7:30 p.m., and on Oct. 12 and 19 at 2:00 p.m. Tickets are $15 for general admission and $10 for students and seniors.

Bird produces sweet songs

Andrew Bird brings his love for multiple instruments and whistling to the Calvin

By Brian Wood
Collegian Staff

Tonight there'll be a sweeping sound escaping from the walls of the Calvin Theatre in Northampton: a high-pitched flutter delving into deeper territories with effortless, virtuoso-like ease. The instrument? None other than Andrew Bird.

Perhaps music's most renowned whistler, Bird will grace the Pioneer Valley with his presence for a solo performance tonight, displaying his talented lips for all to hear. Removed from recent supporting roles for alt-country heavyweights Wilco and folk-revivalist Bright Eyes, Bird will perform in Northampton as part of his current cross-country solo tour.

While his whistling prowess garners the most attention, Bird is far from a one-trick-pony. Bird is classically trained in violin, obtaining a Bachelors' Degree for performance violin from Northwestern University in 1996.

Before turning to a career as a singer-songwriter, Bird released several albums showcasing his abilities with the violin, exploring genres from jazz to Balkan folk in the process.

Glockenspiel and multiple guitar styles are just a few of the Chicago native's other exploits. His sultry vocal styling and flair for history-laden lyricism add further depth to the multi-instrumentalist's music that wasn't present during his earlier instrumental releases.

Bird's new styles range from the acoustic-laden 2005 album, "The Mysterious Production of Eggs," to the more electric-driven 2007 album "Armchair Apocrypha," his latest release. Bird is an ever-evolving artist, continuously exploring new techniques and landscapes and utilizing his technical gifts while genre-jumping in the process.

Even with his shift to a more electric-oriented approach, Bird hasn't entirely abandoned the acoustic charms that made "The Mysterious Production of Eggs" such a well-received release.

With his latest release Bird has still maintained his historic-lyrical love affair with all the expected educational aptitude while moving into more rock-oriented territories. With topics ranging from holy wars and the human consciousness to lost civilizations, Bird covers heavy topics with incredible tact. He crafts accessible narratives around complex themes.

On "Scythian Empires," Bird makes references to modernized artifacts such as Halliburton, Scotch Guard and Macintoshes, while condemning them to potential obscurity in a similar manner to ancient relics of Scythian times. With America's current economic crisis, the societal collapse Bird paints is eerily more relevant now than ever before.

On "Plasticities," Bird laments, "This isn't

Slim romps the Iron Horse

Folk music gets the crowd out of seats

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

The preferred instrument of Langhorne Slim and the War Eagles is the foot stomp. They don't bring it with them; it finds them at each stop on their tour.

"We're gonna start it slow and sweet and then I hope we're going to get away from the tables and freak out," Slim told his audience at the Iron Horse Music Hall Wednesday night, proceeding to warm the crowd up with two solo numbers while bassist Paul Difiglia fiddled with the strings of his stand-up bass after technical difficulties.

Slim kicked things off with "Sweet Olive Tree" off his new album, a ballad of a lilted lover with a postmodern moral of the story. "Nobody knows their woman," Slim sings, "and nobody knows their man." Earlier in the song, he warns of the danger of too much casual acquaintance: "When you know too many people/your heart's bound to go bad."

By the time Slim broke out a new song, Difiglia had broken in a new string on his bass and the War Eagles were in working order.

The folk trio soon had the tables shaking with "Honey Pie" off the band's 2006 "Engine EP," and Difiglia's bass was worth the wait with a solo during "Restless" off their eponymous new album.

Slim is the only member of the band who looks like a real folk musician, with his skin-tight boot cut Levi's and pork pie hat. But the War Eagles don't need to look the part – they play it.

Those Darlins, a three-piece female folk trio from Tennessee opened on Wednesday, featuring guitar, bass and ukulele with a two-man backing band on drums and keys.

"This song is called 'DUI' – don't get one," said Nikki Darlin, as the band broke into a folk romp about bad decisions and broken hearts. The chorus, expectedly, was a repetition of the line "DUI, got a DUI."

The Heartless Bastards took the stage next, bringing the most electric sound the stage would see that night. The garage rock trio from Dayton, Ohio is fronted by Erika Wennerstrom, who sounds like a countrified Feist. The band's "Done Got Old" sounds like a blues response to Feist's "When I Was a Young Girl."

But despite the similarities in her vocals, Wennerstrom makes herself distinct with the Heartless Bastards' three-chord blues. She proved herself an able multi-tasker with "Into the Open," switching fluidly from the keys for each verse and her hollow body guitar for the chorus.

But like Difiglia, Wennerstrom was having some equipment trouble, too.

"We just came from the south, kinda, been here a couple of days. But this weather makes my guitar temperamental," she said. Her southern twang made itself apparent in her banter with the audience, but while she was singing she was too busy wailing to drawl.

By the time Slim and the War Eagles had attendees stamping feet to drummer Malachi DeLorenzo's bass drum, the crowd had fulfilled Slim's request and filled the dance floor. The band broke out "In the Midnight" off Slim's first album, "When the Sun's Gone Down," which is perhaps the folksiest song in Slim's repertoire. Slim, a.k.a. Sean Scolnick, might not have spent a lot of time on a farm as a child, but has no trouble evoking the imagery: "In heard a crow call/I heard a dog bark/I saw the snow fall/and you were in my arms."

The band broke into two straight numbers, "I Love You, but Goodbye" and the single off his new album, "Diamonds and Gold."

The crowd enjoyed it so much somebody bought Slim a drink.

"Thank you," he said, "I don't usually touch the stuff but I hate to be rude," and he took a swig.

After the band broke into another song and Difiglia packed up his bow for another solo, Slim made a soliloquy out of the chorus.

"I would do anything for…"

"For me?" asked a girl in the audience.

Slim grinned. "Well, I don't know – we haven't met yet," he said, before breaking back into the song without missing a beat.

Slim and the War Eagles finished off the show with the sing-along inspiring "I Ain't Proud" off his first album, delivering a message most college students can relate to: "After 24 years of age, I gotta get my ass in shape" – a variation on the studio version's "After 21 years of age I got to pack up the pace."

"I Love to Dance," brought a bigger crowd out of their chairs and to the floor, the foot stomps rattling the glasses on the table and ending the show with a War Eagle-led chant of "Dance, Dance, Dance."

Requests for an encore went unrequited, as Slim and the War Eagles had to clear out for the music hall's weekly Latin dance party, which Slim joked they were hosting.

Latin dance won the battle, but after a night of glass-rattling foot stomps, the War Eagles won the floor.

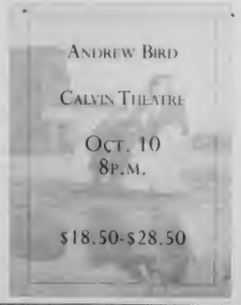
your song, this isn't your music. How can there be wrong, when by committee they choose it all?" delving into the ever-widening gap between the mentalities of the youth and elder generations.

The highlight of the album "Spare-Ohs," features some of Bird's most insightful quips on human understanding. "Don't speak about the cycles of life, 'cause your thoughts are so soft I could cut 'em with a spork or a bride's knife," sings Bird.



While performing solo, Bird is renowned for his ability to utilize looping techniques to accurately replicate some of his more complex selections in the live environment. For an artist with the ability to play a laundry list of instruments, such a technique is a necessity.

Bird's stop at the Calvin Theatre is one of the last on his current tour. Only two Los Angeles dates remain for fans hoping to witness the whistling troubadour in person.

Bird will be supported by Sandro Perri, a solo artist, producer and frequent collaborator from Toronto. Perri, whose music dangles between the wide gap of experimental and folk music, has played with a wide range of traditional-folk acts, including fellow Canadians, Great Lakes Swimmers. Perri's debut album, "Tiny Marrors" was released in 2007.

Andrew Bird plays tonight with opener Sandro Perri at the Calvin Theatre in Northampton. Doors open at 8 p.m. and tickets range from $18.50 to $28.50.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team needs goal production out of their leading goal scorer Vanessa Patry. Patry has five goals and three assists, leading the Minutewomen.

Sowry will counter that versatility with Orlando.

"She's playing center striker where Cher Kang normally plays so she's providing us with a lot of energy and competitiveness and she's the one that drives the press on our team so she has a huge responsibility this weekend when the opponent has the ball," Sowry said. "More importantly, now when we have the ball, she's coming up with some important plays for us and scoring goals."

Senior Jacklyn McGranahan's 10 points (three goals, four assists) lead the Billikens. McGranahan started all 10 games for Saint Louis this season.

The Billikens have given up an average of 6.25 goals in each of their four losses on the road this season. Saint Louis' only wins on the road came against winless Georgetown and D-II Bellarmine.

SLU is a second half team on both sides of the ball. The Billikens have 20 more shots in the second half than the first but have scored just eight goals total in either half.

Maroon and White playing through pain

Xavier has dropped six of its last eight games, registering one 2-0 victory against Ohio and tying Temple in double overtime, 2-2.

"They've started slowly and play much better in their second half," Rudy said.

"We want to start fast anyway; we're a little humbled by this past weekend, although we played well despite not scoring."

The Maroon and White lost their first A-10 match to GW, 2-0, on Sunday and were defeated again last Friday by Richmond, 1-0.

Senior forward Vanessa Patry was unable to score this weekend, recording just one shot against the Colonials and two shots on goal against the Spiders. Even without the goals, Rudy felt that Patry was effective and believes she'll continue to be a force on the offensive side of the ball.

"She worked so hard despite getting matched up and doubled up, and the targets better then anyone else," Rudy said.

"They know we're going with the ball on the ground or in the air, and she did a marvelous job of getting open and setting other people up or keeping position for us."

The Maroon and White were able to come from behind against the Musketeers last season, winning 3-1 while on the road. Patry registered an assist in that game, and could have a breakout of her scoring slide against a Xavier team capable of being put away early in games.

The Flyers remain undefeated in the Atlantic 10 while tying St. Josephs in a double overtime match on Sept. 28.

"I think the moment you neutralize one, they've got three or four others that will pop out," Rudy said, regarding Dayton's offensive players.

One key player for the Flyers has been Mandy Black, a junior forward/midfielder who is second in the conference in shots, while leading the team with five goals and 12 points.

"She's one of the top players in the league and is a very gifted, talented player," Rudy said.

The UMass defensive unit was depleted last year against Dayton, as senior Melissa Toulouse and Christina Nunes sat out after sustaining injuries against Duquesne. The Maroon and White were defeated 2-0, marking the first time the Minutewomen were shut out in its 2007 campaign.

Going into this weekend, UMass still has some lingering injuries, as midfielder Vanessa Lima continues to struggle with a high hamstring pull while sophomore midfielder Ashley Hamel is also suffering from a hamstring injury.

"It's like taking one step forward while taking two steps back," Rudy said regarding Lima.

"We don't have a long time and she doesn't have a long time because it's her senior year, so she's trying to play through it."

Rudy knows her team needs to record points against crucial nonconference opponents and must also be ready to play against both teams this weekend.

"We can't afford to start as slow as we did against GW and I don't think we will because everyone is really motivated to play better than what we did because we know we can," Rudy said.

Game notes

UMass has played games on a number of different surfaces this season in a number of different conditions. Play on turf is much faster than on grass. Turf is also a surface that can lead to more mistakes in a game. Rudy feels his team is at its best when they're playing on the grass at Rudd Field.

"We've basically been on three very tough surfaces in a row," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen tied Temple, 1-1 on Sept. 28 amidst a torrential downpour and terrible field conditions.

"We went from that to two field turf games. It is what it is, that's the A-10 for you. It's a conference of multiple surfaces and you have to just deal with it."

UM begins A–10 play

Minutewomen must battle through losses

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

All previous games were merely practice for the Massachusetts field hockey team as they enter the Atlantic 10 conference play today.

The No. 17 Minutewomen (8-3) travel to Richmond, Va. today to take on the Spiders (3-8) then return home Sunday to host Saint Louis (4-6).

UMass is coming off a 5-1 rout of Siena (0-8), a game in which reigning Dunn Bros. Player of the Week Jaime Bourazeris scored two goals en route to the victory.

Being its second weekend without starting goalie Alesha Widdall and starting forward Cher King – both participating in the 2008 Pan-American Games – UMass coach Justine Sowry is pleased with the number of players that have stepped up to fill the void left by King on offense and Widdall on defense.

"I'm actually pretty happy with how the rest of the players have stepped up," Sowry said. "They've used it as an opportunity to get more playing time and also take more responsibility for their positions on the field."

"I'll mention in particular Katelyn Orlando because I think from the weekend [in which the Minutewomen played] Albany and [No.2] Syracuse, she's really stepped up another level with her leadership and seniority on the team."

Richmond is usually a tough defensive team but head coach Gina Lucido, like Sowry, to UMass, is in her second season at the helm for the Spiders and her staff is relatively new as well.

The program hasn't been the same as the Richmond team that captured the A-10 titles from 2002-'07.

This year, freshman forward Katelin Peterson leads the Spiders in scoring with five goals on the season, just ahead of Alex Malatesta and Sarah Blythe-Wood, each with four goals, respectively.

UMass has a 23-17 edge over Richmond in total assists and has shown better ball control, having 163 shots to the Spiders' 93.

Another statistic favoring the Minutewomen is Richmond's 0-3 record at home this season, while UMass is 3-1 on the road.

"We always like to come back home to Garber Field," Sowry said of the transition from a road trip to a home-stand. "Hopefully we'll travel well and we're rested for our game on Sunday. Hopefully we can get back into a nice fluid game of hockey where we're passing the ball around."

The Billikens should be well-rested after a two-week layover from their last game, a 5-0 win against Division II Bellarmine (5-9).

Sophomore Stephanie Ertzberger leads Saint Louis in goals, with four goals and one assist, starting in seven of the 10 games for the Billikens. Ertzberger is a versatile player, seeing time this season as a forward, midfielder and defender.

Jaime Bourazeris and the Massachusetts field hockey team play two matches this weekend, both at Rudd Field. Conference rivals Dayton and Xavier will look to crush UMass' postseason aspirations.

Richmond in town

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts field hockey team takes the field at Richmond on Friday, they'll be adding another chapter to a rich rival against their conference foe.

Before the Minutewomen (8-3) won the Atlantic 10 tournament during last year's breakout season, the Spiders (3-8) were by far the class of the conference.

The last time an A-10 team other than UMass or Richmond won the conference title, it was Saint Joseph's in 1995. The Minutewomen then went on a run of six consecutive titles from 1996 to 2001. Richmond, however, had won five consecutive A-10 titles until UMass reclaimed the crown last season.

The Minutewomen have played the Spiders 13 times with Richmond holding the series lead of 8-5, dating back to 1994. Before losing in Amherst last year, the Spiders had won seven straight games against UMass, going back to 2001.

Even before UMass' 2007 game against Richmond, the Minutewomen were quickly emerging as the breakout team in the A-10. Their status as contenders in the conference was solidified when they ousted the Spiders in a 1-0 win with 2 games left to play in the regular season.

Senior Becky Letourneau was in goal for the shutout in a game where neither team could get the edge offensively. UMass barely outshot Richmond 7-to-6 while the Spiders just scraped ahead in corners 6-to-5.

The only goal of the game came off a penalty stroke by senior Nicole Phelan, the lone goal of the day, on senior day at Garber Field.

Last year's win over Richmond was an enormous step for the Minutewomen as they attempted to restore the program to its prior success. The win was especially important to the seniors who, throughout their career, acknowledged Richmond as the conference's best team.

"It was always that Richmond was the team to get in the A-10," said senior captain Mary Shea. "But now, it's almost like the roles have reversed. It seems like we're the team to get now in the A-10."

All the history, according to coach Justine Sowry, means nothing this season. "From when Richmond was successful, it's a completely new coaching staff now," Sowry said. "And the same with us, we have a new team and new coaching staff here. We try not to think too much of the past."

Despite Richmond's struggles thus far this season, the Minutewomen are not overlooking their opponent in the first conference game of the season.

"Coming into any A-10 game, it's a huge game and like any other team that we play we have to bring our best," Shea said. "Going into A-10 play, it's like our season starting from scratch."

Coming into conference play for the 2008 season, a lot has changed for the Minutewomen. Last year, UMass was an experienced, defensive-minded team that wasn't on anyone's radar. This year, however, the Minutewomen are coming in as favorites.

"The difference for this team from last year to this year is that we're not going to sneak up on any teams," Sowry said. "People are going to prepare for us a little bit better, being the defending champions and getting some national recognition."

The upcoming A-10 schedule is vital for the Minutewomen if they hope to repeat last year's success. According to Sowry, the collective bull's-eye on the backs of the UMass players gives the team a chance to focus on each game.

"The attention to detail and the commitment to improve has to be brought to a whole new level," Sowry said. It's important but it's going to push us to rise to the next level as well, so I'm excited about that."

Minutemen in vital conference match

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

All the training, travel and hard work has been in preparation for this stage of the season as the Massachusetts men's soccer team will find out if they're ready for conference play.

This Sunday the UMass Minutemen (2-5-2) travel to Kingston, R.I., to face off against the Rhode Island Rams (4-4-1), in the Minutemen's first Atlantic 10 conference game of the season.

The conference games take on a greater level of importance because it's the conference records that determine seeding and placement for the A-10 Championship, rather than the overall record.

The top six out of 14 teams will advance to the conference championships, so typically a team must win six out of nine games in order to qualify. This makes conference matches more important than other games.

"Do the math, obviously we want to get the momentum going in the right direction to start with ... we don't want to start going backwards," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

This opening matchup pits two teams that appear to be fairly equal, particularly in terms of common opponents. UMass defeated Boston University 3-2 while URI lost 4-0; the Rams beat Hartford 1-0 while the Minutemen lost 1-0; Siena beat URI 2-1 and lost to UMass 1-0, and both teams played Vermont to a 0-0 tie.

"Both teams want to start conference play going in the right direction, so it's going to be a very intense game. I think we're pretty evenly matched. Even though their record is better than ours, I think records go out the window once conference play starts," Koch said.

Both teams are closely matched in terms of statistics. URI has scored one more goal (eight) than UMass (seven), however, Massachusetts has allowed one less goal (11) than Rhode Island has (12).

The Minutemen have been preparing for the conference games by scheduling very difficult non-conference games. Tuesday night they faced off against the No.1 ranked Wake Forest Demon Deacons (11-0-0), and played them closely in a 2-0 loss. A 2-0 loss is a pretty good result against a team that has outscored opponents 38-7. Not that the Minutemen took any pride in a loss.

"The Wake Forest coach said we were the first team that was upset and disappointed at the end of the game. I think he felt that the other opponents had players that were happy Wake Forest hadn't scored more on them or whatever," Koch said.

The Minutemen's major weakness throughout the season has been the team's inability to score goals. They've been shutout in five of the nine games they've played while averaging less than a goal per game (.77). UMass has shown the ability to create chances, but they can't seem to take advantage of their opportunities. Midfielder Ben Arikian's penalty kick that clanged off the post on Tuesday against Wake Forest epitomized their season offensively.

Still, a slump can't last forever, and if the Minutemen can continue to get opportunities, sooner or later they'll finish them. Koch hopes the team will break its slump on Sunday.

"We have to keep doing what we've been doing. [If we] keep knocking on the door sooner or later it's going in. We just have to keep focused and doing what we have been doing," Koch said. "I think the methods we have been using have been successful and we have to keep at it."

Koch feels that his team has improved a great deal over the last two weeks and believes that it's rounding into shape. He feels that the team's ball movement has been better. They're using the width of the field better, creating more chances and cutting down on their errors.

"One thing I've seen over the last three games is that we've been eliminating our own mistakes. The more we eliminate those silly mistakes as far as playing simple and playing the way we face, we will [be able] to keep moving the ball. [This] will give us more time to create more opportunities to score," Koch said.

The Minutewomen and Kelsey Anderson (above) look to put their tough loss to Richmond last Sunday behind them. Anderson as one assist and eight shots so far this season.

Prince Obosi and the Minutemen travel to Kingston, R.I., to play the Rhode Island Rams in an Atlantic 10 battle. A-10 play is important in determining who makes the postseason.

Minutewomen have tough tests at Rudd this weekend

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

A little more than a week ago, the Massachusetts women's soccer team was unbeaten in the Atlantic 10 when it traveled to George Washington and Richmond for its first two conference games.

Now, after back-to-back losses, the Minutewomen will look to get back in the winning column when it hosts Xavier today at 3:30 p.m. and Dayton on Sunday at 1:00 p.m., with both games being played at Rudd Field.

"[These games] have become very important since we dropped two last weekend. The importance has been amplified with two tough but distinctly different opponents," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The Musketeers (11-10-1, 0-2-1 A-10) are coming off a 3-0 loss to the Flyers (8-3-1, 2-0-1 A-10) on Oct. 5.

Dayton was able to get their offense going early against Xavier, registering three goals in the first eight minutes of the game.

Celtics heat up the Mullins Center

By William McGuinness
Collegian Staff

When the Philadelphia 76ers were introduced in their pre-season home opener on Wednesday night, they were met with a chorus of boos from an audience wearing Celtic green.

It was all Peter Luukko's fault.

The game was played at the University of Massachusetts' Mullins Center rather than the 76ers' familiar Wachovia Center, but Luukko, a UMass alum and the president of the group that operates both arenas, decided to bring some friends the next time he visited his alma matter.

Luukoo said the game couldn't be played at a better time. According to Luukko, it was two years in the making, and the Celtics' summer championship only made the event more of a success.

He told the Mullins Center's staff to run the game as if the Celtics were at home.

"Obviously it's Celtics territory," he said. "So we know we're the 'home underdog' or whatever you want to call it."

He is the chief operating officer of Comcast-Spectator, a sports and entertainment firm that also has him working closely with not only the 76ers but also the Philadelphia Flyers and the Phantoms, a minor league hockey team.

The Auburn native is a fan of New England sports, but UMass may be his favorite Massachusetts basketball team.

"I root for the rent," he said. "You're with a team, and you have the ups and the downs, the wins and the losses and the highs and the lows. Through all that, I'm 100 percent 'sixers."

Luukko left UMass with a degree in sports management but came back on Wednesday evening to a media blitz. Local newspapers and television stations angled for his pre-game attention.

Luukko insisted this was not his first homecoming.

"I'm usually here once or twice a year," he said.

He came through last year for a

Question two: a tough topic

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

The question regarding decriminalizing marijuana in Massachusetts will be on the ballot this November.

The Massachusetts Sensible Marijuana Policy Initiative (also known as Massachusetts Ballot Question Two) aims to make marijuana use a less serious offense. If passed, the initiative will make it merely civil offense to possess less than an ounce of marijuana.

Currently, anyone caught with any amount of the drug is subject to criminal charges, which stay on a person's record for life.

Voters will have the opportunity to vote for or against the decriminalization of marijuana in Masachusetts on the November ballot.

"Marijuana will remain illegal," said Whitney Taylor, chairwoman and treasurer of the Committee for Sensible Marijuana Policy. "What we are doing is changing the criminal penalty system."

When a Massachusetts citizen is arrested and convicted of a criminal offense, a Criminal Offender Record Information file is created. This file shows up on all criminal background checks, and can prevent people from, reciving jobs, housing, educational loans and the ability to become foster or adoptive parents, Taylor said.

"There are [also] many bars and barriers created for professional licenses such as teaching, and we feel that for possessing less than an ounce of marijuana, that is an unjust punishment," said Taylor.

"You have a stain on your record for the rest of your life," said University of Massachusetts junior Heather McCormack, president of the Cannabis Reform Coalition.

However, some disagree with the initiative, citing that its use may become acceptable in certain circles.

"Decriminalization will send a message to children and young adults that it is OK to use and abuse illegal substances," said Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley. "In addition, decriminalization may have a serious effect on our workplaces and roadways."

UMPD Chief Patrick Archbald agreed.

"The UMPD responds to hundreds of reports of marijuana use per year. A civil, instead of a criminal penalty, will encourage those who would otherwise abstain from marijuana use to consider using it," he said.

According to a 2002 report by Harvard economics professor Jeffrey Miron, Massachusetts would save over $30 million per year by decriminalizing marijuana. This amount consists of arresting drug offenders (with less than an ounce), booking them, and preliminary court costs. The number does not include the price of potential jail time served by offenders.

"Spending $30 million a year to arrest and book people for personally possessing less than an ounce of marijuana is not a good use of our resources," said Taylor. "Under Question Two, [the drug] is illegal, it gets confiscated, a citation is given, and then the police officer stays on the street."

Opinions vary on how how Question Two would affect the UMass campus. Comparative literature professor David Lenson doesn't believe decriminalization will lead to a drastic change.

"It wouldn't effect the quality of everyday life, except there would be less arrests [on campus]," said Lenson. "I don't think you'd see an increase in marijuana use. You might see a little more carelessness [with visibility of marijuana]."

In contrast with the opinions of students and others, Archbald disagreed with the assumption that arrests overall would decrease.

"Our number [of arrests] would increase significantly," he said. "A criminal charge for possession of marijuana for a college student with a bright future can be a strong deterrent. A civil infraction would be much less a deterrent."

McCormack feels that if marijuana is decriminalized, there might be less of a police presence on campus. This was one of the issues voiced during the student strike last fall.

"Marijuana is one of the most obvious crimes because you can smell it," she said. "It's one of the primary reasons officers are able to get warrants to search dorm rooms."

She went on to explain that if possession of less than an ounce were a civil offense, police would have one less reason to gain access to residential halls.

She said it would "drastically affect the number of officers gaining access to dorms."

Under the current law, any individual charged with possession of any amount of the drug is subject to a $500 fine, a possibility of up to six months in jail and a criminal record. If Question Two is voted in, the penalty will be reduced to a $100 fine with no record.

Offenders under 18 years of age would be subject to additional penalties including parental notification, drug awareness programs, and 10 hours of community service. Offenders who do not follow through with the requirements would face an additional fine of $1,000 and possible delinquency proceedings.

Laws regarding selling, growing, trafficking and driving under the influence of marijuana will remain unchanged if Question Two is voted in.

BSU hosts 'real talk'

Discussion on Iraq, U.S. economy, Palin

By LaToya Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

The Black Student Union (BSU) held its monthly Real Talk discussion in the New Africa House on Thursday at the University of Massachusetts. The topic: the upcoming presidential election.

The Real Talk discussions give students the chance to voice their opinions on the presented topics. Thursday's discussion in particular allowed students to debate on the candidates for presidency and the political issues being raised surrounding the historical election.

A slideshow of quotes that encouraged the attendees to guess their authors played in the background while the president of the BSU, Mohamed Vandi, opened by announcing that "This [is] an open forum discussion. Say what's on your mind. This is about you guys and what's on your mind. Just try to keep it real."

Vandi began the discussion by asking the group who they felt would help the country the most through its economic crisis.

An attendee, who referred to himself as Moonlight, said that "neither of them really knows what they will face when they get in office. Obama has a better campaign as of the last presidential debate because he pays attention to small details. I find myself being able to follow Obama easier than McCain."

UMass student Danny Soto also responded to the question.

"I don't like Obama and I don't like McCain. Period. They're both politicians. They say what they have to to get elected. I watch the debates and McCain wins because he sticks to conventional things that are known to work," said Soto.

This comment ignited disagreement between the attendees and immediately moved the topic away from the economic crisis and more toward Obama and McCain.

"McCain may say that Obama is naive but we need a change. I wouldn't say that McCain won because during the debates he didn't answer the questions directly. He circled around them. Maybe Obama's answers were way out there but at least he had an A, B and C plan for them," said Maria Payano, external chair of the MANA Coalition.

The forum moved back toward the economic crisis now facing the country. They reflected on how this crisis is affected them as students.

"I don't think it has hit us yet that we're in a recession because we're in college but when you go out into the workforce it will hit you because when you're looking for a job, you won't be able to get it," said Kenisha Jackson, a member of the BSU.

Jackson then raised a question regarding universal health care in the United States. She was curious as to how the group felt about the possibility of America implementing the system.

"It would get watered down and I don't think anyone would want the health care anyways. I don't feel that, with our economic situation, it would work as well here as in other countries," responded Jimmy Destin, the vice president of the BSU.

Tadumo Tahlil, a member of the BSU, disagreed. She said that "it is very possible. We are the richest country in the world. We are financing this war. If we put that money towards something else, we could do it."

Most attendees seemed to agree with Tahlil's statement.

"This country can fund it. It is very possible. The way we structure health care now is a big business. It's what keeps us competitive. They could do it but I don't think that it would be a good idea," said Candace Johnson, another BSU member.

Vandi wanted to keep the group focused on the candidates in the election so he raised the question, "Who has the best policy on Iraq?"

This lead to a discussion about what many believed were the real reasons behind the U.S. involvement in Iraq, the war on terrorism and the problem with leadership ability in the United States.

"It was a stupid war to start in the first place," said UMass student Kenneth Sentamu. "We didn't accomplish anything that we set out to do. In pulling out, we risk damaging our image abroad and could lead to civil war."

"The problem is that a lot of people don't know what is going on. And we're not doing our research," Amaka Mbawuike, a BSU member, said. "People need to go get the facts and then we need to work together to find a way to pull out effec-

"It's a good excuse to come back ... it's been a lot of fun to have that student-professor relationship, but as you get on, you become very close friends with your professors and associates."

He said the relationship often results in his company recruiting university students.

"I want to make it very clear that we're absolutely biased towards UMass students," Luukko said.

"We've had a number of students come in on internships, we've hired a number of them."

He said students from the sports management major come in prepared and do good work.

But when it comes to being on their own, he said finding a job should come before finding one's dream job.

It's an odd statement coming from a man who said he's working his dream, but according to Luukko, he didn't get into the business in the conventional way.

"My advisor said 'They're building arenas all over the country! It's a great way for young people to move up quickly and get into the facilities side.' So I got in because I wanted a job like anyone else. I came in a different way, but I got there."

He often travels and speaks to students in his field along the way.

"I tell young people to just get their foot in the door, get a lay of the land and then you'll get where you want to go," he said. "You just have to be patient. It's hard to do when you're young. I'm not very patient now. But that's how I got here."

The Celtics lost 98 - 92 in a game that only featured the three big three of Paul Pierce, Ray Allen and Kevin Garnett for portions of the first and third quarters.

tively."

Regarding the issue of the war on terror, many people felt that the United States was largely responsible.

Selasi Binah said that she felt "it [was] a pride issue."

"Everyone wants to intertwine the war in Iraq issue and terrorist issue," she said.

"I feel like if we can't fix what's going on in our own country then why go into other countries? I think that's why people liked Clinton – the United States was his main priority."

In the time that was left in the segment, the forum decided to discuss the candidates for vice presidency.

The discussion seemed to focus largely on what the group thought to be Sarah Palin's inadequateness.

On Palin, Octavia Farquharson, a UMass student, said that "as a woman [she was] offended that McCain chose Palin for vice president."

"This is history," she said. "To have that kind of woman portrayed in the White House is embarrassing to me."

To wrap things up, Vandi asked one last question. He wanted to know what the attendees, as college students, should do.

"Generally Americans, in the past, have been ignorant," Sentamu answered. "We have to learn what's going on in the world and how the policies we make here affect other countries. The things we do have implications. Become more educated."

"We need to go back to the 50s, 60s and 70s when we weren't afraid to skip class and stand outside with picket signs," Johnson answered.

Before leaving, the group was polled on who they believed would ultimately win the election. Amongst the attendees, the results were overwhelmingly for Obama.

Yale debates free tuition

BY THOMAS KAPLAN
YALE DAILY NEWS

Last year was a good one for David Swensen GRD '80, the university's chief investment officer. Under his watch, the Yale endowment rose to $22.5 billion, nearly four times where it stood just a decade earlier. In one year alone, the investment income produced by the endowment amounted to $5 billion, more than the entire endowments of Brown and Dartmouth.

It also amounted to enough money to allow, at today's tuition rate, every undergraduate to attend Yale for free this year, next year, and, beyond that, for 19 more years.

Kissed by two decades of financial prosperity that lasted until a few weeks ago, Yale and some of its gilded peers have amassed pools of money unimaginable to Yale students a generation ago who lived in drafty dorm rooms and went to class in crumbling classroom buildings. But now those dorm rooms and classroom buildings have been renovated, others have been built and there are still billions upon billions left over.

Yet Yale still charges $46,000 annually for tuition, room and board. Though last year's investment gains surpassed the gross domestic production of Laos, Niger and 51 other nations, the university still asks for an amount just a hair under this country's median household income from the families of the 51 percent of undergraduates who do not receive financial aid.

Which raises the question: Can Yale be free? And, if so, should it?

Some economists conclude Yale could waive all student fees without breaking a sweat. But for Yale administrators, it's not an issue of whether Yale could be free. It's a matter of whether Yale should. And they're not sure about that.

In January, on the eve of the long-awaited debut of improvements to Yale's financial aid policy, University President Richard Levin was not resting for his big day. Instead, he was packing his suitcase. He would soon board a train and head to Washington, and not for any getaway. Nay, Levin was on a mission.

The next day, just as staffers in the Office of Public Affairs were preparing to e-mail reporters a lengthpress release about the aid initiative, Levin and his chief flack, Helaine Klasky, sat before the editorial board of the Washington Post. A few hours later, across the Potomac River, education writers at USA Today stared down the president and his aide.

Levin had a point to drive home. The University, he said, was committed to ensuring potential students are not driven away because of concerns over high tuition and that Yale was not merely hoarding its endowment riches.

"We wanted to get the message across to Washington, and particularly those in Congress," Klasky later recalled.

In other words, they wanted the ear of Sen. Chuck Grassley of Iowa, the ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee.

Since the Finance Committee held a hearing on the matter last September, quiet suspicions have percolated in some corners of Congress about whether wealthy schools like Yale are spending enough for their colossal endowments, or if they should tap deeper into their funds — accumulated through untaxed investment income and the receipt of tax-exempt donations — to curtail rising tuition and better promote college affordability. Grassley and others (most recently and most forcefully, Rep. Peter Welch of Vermont) have mused about introducing legislation that would mandate universities behave as not-for-profit foundations do when it comes to endowments — that is, disburse at least 5 percent of their assets annually.

Levin and other college presidents have been sharply critical of Grassley's threats. And that's why they have been so forceful in reminding people just how generous they are when it comes to financial aid.

But the staggering amount of wealth Yale and other schools have accumulated nonetheless raises questions about what exactly it needs all that money for. The Yale endowment, as of June 30, stands at $22.9 billion, the second most of any school in the country and approximately $2 million for every student enrolled here.

At a roundtable in Washington last month on the subject of endowment spending, Grassley raised a provocative question. "If an institution could educate all of its undergraduate students, regardless of need, free of charge with a payout of just 1 percent of its assets, is its endowment an unreasonable accumulation of taxpayer-subsidized funds?"

Grassley didn't name names. But Yale, it is clear, is one of the schools that could do exactly that.

In fact, according to a News analysis of last year's budget, by increasing spending from its endowment by eight-tenths of one percentage point, the university could make Yale College free — no tuition, no room and board, no anything — for every undergraduate.

Part of the reason Yale could waive tuition without stretching its endowment too thin is a reflection of the changing shape of finances at a modern research university.

Just how much does Yale actually need revenue from students to balance its budget? The answer today is much different from the answer in 1701.

At Yale's founding, the 30 shillings per year each pupil paid in tuition comprised the majority of Yale's annual budget. In 1831, for instance, when the first printed Treasurer's Report was produced, more than three-quarters of Yale's annual revenue came from tuition. That year, of Yale College's $19,674.87 in revenue, nearly $17,000 came from student term bills. At that time, the Yale endowment – at $30,856 – at was only one-and-a-half times the school's operating budget.

But over time, that endowment would grow, and Yale's dependency on tuition would diminish. By the end of the Civil War, term receipts provided little more than a third of the College's annual revenue. The $670,000 endowment, meanwhile, dwarfed the College's $85,500 annual operating budget.

That proportion would stay about the same through World War I, when tuition, room and board accounted for about a third of the university's net income. By the end of World War II, it was down to a mere quarter. Today, tuition, room and board – though higher, when adjusted for inflation, than ever before – account for only 17 percent of Yale's overall revenue across the university, according to budget documents obtained by the News. (The documents are accurate as of June 2007, when financial details were last available.)

Yale's endowment has boomed in recent decades. Meanwhile, its reliance on tuition as a source of revenue has, on the whole, declined.

In Yale College, for instance, the university projected $230.2 million in revenue in the fiscal year ending June 30 from tuition, room and board paid by undergraduates; it also projected $62 million in expenditures, which can be vague.

Levin and other college presidents have been sharply critical of Grassley's threats. And that's why they have been so forceful in reminding people just how generous they are when it comes to financial aid.

Upon recieving a $22.5 billion endowment, Yale College now technically has enough money to pay for the costs of undergraduate tuition, room and board, currently totalling $46,000, for all of its students.

Professor fired for plagiarism sues Columbia University

BY JOY RESMOVITS
COLUMBIA DAILY SPECTATOR

After running out of options at Columbia University to reverse being fired, Teachers College professor Madonna Constantine filed a lawsuit against the school with the New York Supreme Court on Friday.

Constantine, a tenured professor of counseling and clinical psychology, gained notoriety last October when a noose was found on her office door and sparked a national debate about racism in academia. Police have not found the perpetrator.

In February, Columbia announced that Constantine had been found guilty of plagiarizing passages from the work of three former students and colleagues. After Constantine appealed the decision, the college found her guilty once again and raised the penalty from undefined sanctions to termination pending appeal.

The law firm of Paul Giacomo will argue Constantine's case under an Article 78 proceeding of New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules, which allows Constantine to challenge the process by which Teachers College decided to fire her as being "arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable" under state law. This means that the New York Supreme Court will use Columbia's own rules to evaluate the process of Constantine's termination.

Article 78 is a blurry area of law because it appeals an internal procedure to state court. The court will judge the case based on Columbia's internal procedures, which can be vague.

Constantine has said that she feels her "due process" was violated and is thus extending the process beyond the university.

Marcia Horowitz, of press relations firm Rubenstein Associates, who Teachers College appointed to speak about Constantine on its behalf, declined to comment because she said the school had not seen a copy of the lawsuit by Sunday evening.

Over the weekend, several news sources reported that Constantine was suing Columbia. In fact, Constantine is suing Teachers College, Columbia's affiliate.

The case comes after several internal appeals to faculty committees. In a previous statement, Giacomo said that Constantine could seek payment for "job actions taken against her" under federal and state employment law.

Though Teachers College's Faculty Advisory Committee had already rejected an appeal of sanctions imposed on her based on plagiarism charges, this summer Constantine appealed the committee's recommendation.

The appeal, announced in a letter addressed to college President Susan Fuhrman from Giacomo's office, claimed that Constantine's termination was retaliation for Constantine's appeal of the first decision. The letter demanded a "de novo" or brand new investigation of all plagiarism charges and called for the removal of professor Barry Farber from the faculty committee due to a conflict of interests.

Giacomo, who was out of town this weekend, argued in the summer appeal letter that Teachers College should not use statements by Constantine condemning the institution as grounds for her termination. He claimed that this violates her First Amendment rights.

"The vague reference you make to a document submitted to the media ... cannot provide a pretext for my client's termination," the letter said.

Specifically, Giacomo condemned the "secret" nature of the investigation, the circulation of documents among the Faculty Advisory Committee and trustees, and "attempted blackmail" of Constantine to provoke her resignation.

In the original decision against Constantine in February, independent firm Hughes, Hubbard & Reed found that Constantine had used "strikingly similar language" to some of her students' in her work.

The decision named three individuals who had complained about Constantine's plagiarism — former professor Christine Yeh and students Tracy Julaio and Karen Cort. Teachers College paid for their legal indemnity, or insurance for legal consequences the revelation of their names might cause.

Since that verdict, Spectator has learned that several other individuals have leveled charges against Constantine, but they were not granted the same legal privileges and thus kept their names hidden. Sources have also said the ordeal dates back to years before Fuhrman's presidency and includes allegations of misused departmental funds.

The Faculty Advisory Committee dismissed Constantine's earlier appeal, saying that her evidence was not verifiable.

Representatives from Giacomo's firm said they went to great pains to verify evidence — submission letters from editors that seem to prove that Constantine wrote the passages in question first — and circulated a spreadsheet detailing evidence of Constantine's alleged innocence for each allegation of plagiarism.

Constantine is still listed in Columbia's faculty directory and on the Teachers College Web site as a professor of psychology and education.

Cell phones affecting polls

BY COLIN KAVANAUGH
DAILY PENNSYLVANIAN

For pollsters, cell phone static may be getting in the way of good polling.

Across the country, pollsters attempting to accurately reflect the public's choice for president are facing a big – and unprecedented – problem: cell-phone dominance among youth combined with historic young-voter turnout in the primaries.

"There's a great fear that the traditional methods of polling," which utilize only land lines, are not "representative" of younger voters who tend to only use cell phones, said Richard Johnston, a Penn Political Science professor.

In 2004, just 5 percent of Americans were cell-only users, according to the Gallup Organization.

Pollsters believed that group was an accurate sampling of the population at large.

But now, 13 percent of Americans only use a cell phone, according to Gallup, and that number disproportionately includes younger people.

Eric Nielsen, senior director for media strategies at Gallup said the organization has been watching the impact of youth voters and overall cell-phone-only use this election cycle, and he considers it an important issue.

For its election polling this year, 13 percent Gallup's sample is made up of registered voters who only use cell phones.

Nielsen said he realizes that it remains to be seen how much of the expressed young voter interest will turn into results on Election Day.

For that reason, not all polling firms agree that cell-phone-only voters should be included in their sampling.

Ann Selzer, president of Selzer & Company, a public-opinion research group famous for its accurate polling in the Iowa caucuses, said there is "very little difference" in demographics between cell-only users and land-line users.

As a result, she is not convinced that cell-only voters' political views trend a particular direction distinct from land-line voters.

Selzer has thus opted not to include cell-only users in her sample.

However, she does weight younger voters more heavily to account for increased youth interest in this election.

Selzer said polling firms can no longer use "the past" as a reference point for how to weigh younger voters in their models, given the historic youth turnout in the primaries.

In her polls, she said, she thinks nothing is lost by not polling cell-only users so long as each age group is weighted accurately.

One thing is certain. With historic youth turnout and the increase in cell-phone use nationally, pollsters have been forced to reexamine their methodology and construct new ways to accurately represent the population.

"We're all going to have to start involving cell phones in our polls," Nielsen said.

Be more like Ike

Ted Rogers

Like most people that go to UMass, I'm unabashedly progressive when it comes to politics. However, I have a dirty little secret. When you ask me who I think did one of the best jobs as president, I'll look around to make sure no one else is listening and then whisper – Dwight Eisenhower. The Republican's republican.

He knew when to not touch the economy and where to put federal funding to get things going. If you enjoy our federally funded highways, you have him to thank.

And he was brave. Most people will tell you about his tenure as Supreme Commander of the Allied Forces during World War II as an example of this. As for me, I think the single bravest thing that he did was to give a warning on one of the final days of his presidency.

He said he feared for America's well-being if our main business was military business. He argued that large-scale disarmament was a goal to be reached through continued diplomacy.

What he cautioned against wasn't just a call for peace. What he called for was politically and economically smart. Today, the U.S. military budget is huge – very huge. You know how everybody screamed about the U.S. government bailout of Wall Street a few weeks ago? The 2009 military budget is about equal to that – at a total cost of $713 billion.

That is an enormous sum of money. China, the country with the second highest military budget, spends about a seventh of that. In fact, you'd need to combine the next 15 military budgets of other countries to be equal to that of the United States.

As one can plainly see, the size and misapplications of the U.S. military budget present major problems.

We could pay off the federal education budget of the United States for a decade without cracking that number. Federal earmarks, a current symbol of monetary waste in Washington, cost us about one-fortieth of that.

Despite the huge costs of maintaining such an army, there are few politicians who would dare to bring this up. It would be considered political suicide to seem "soft on terror." This is despite only about $200 billion of the budget is spent on fighting the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

What of the other $500 billion? Some of it spent on personnel costs and veterans' benefits, which is entirely necessary. However, a giant portion – nearly another $200 billion – is spent on what military types call "Major Weapons Systems."

Those are things like tanks, stealth fighters, and nuclear attack submarines. These are things that could come in handy with World War III, but generally not useful for fighting terror cells in small towns.

Since an all-out war with Russia and China seems unlikely, and because Osama bin Laden's submarine fleets are apparently in the shop, wouldn't it make sense to cut a little cash when it comes to this area? Is that unreasonable?

The cash spent on these programs seems misapplied. Billions go into a Cold War missile defense program while our troops die by roadside bombs. The government spares no expense when it comes to buying the next generation of jet fighters, but lets Walter Reed Army Medical Hospital run itself into the ground.

Another sad part of spending that much money on the military is that problems at home tend to be ignored. Last month in Iraq, eight soldiers were killed by hostile fire.

In the same month, six people were murdered in Boston. There is something fundamentally wrong with the fact that you run nearly the same risk of being killed whether you're an American in Boston or Baghdad. It's especially wrong when the government is throwing billions of dollars at one city and barely any at another.

As mentioned before, there are few politicians that speak out against this. Democrats, while professing to want an end to the war, argue against few spending bills. Republicans of the house may have cried that the Wall Street bailout was "socialistic," but have gladly funded the same amount of money to the military.

The only presidential candidate who argues for reduced military spending is Ralph Nader – and as anyone who has typed in "Ralph Nader and Parrot" into YouTube's search engine knows, he is two-thirds insane.

As one can plainly see, the size and misapplications of the U.S. military budget present major problems. In today's rough economic times, it makes sense to do some sensible cutting of the budget. Such an action would also have a higher purpose as well.

Going back to wise, plain-spoken Ike: "Every gun that is made, every warship launched, every rocket fired signifies, in the final sense a theft from those who hunger and are not fed, those who are cold and not clothed. This world in arms isn't spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its laborers, the genius of their scientists, the hopes of its children. ... This is not a way of life at all in any true sense. Under the cloud of threatening war, it is humanity hanging from a cross of iron."

Smear tactics gone too far

Scott Harris

On a sunny day in Sept. 1963, the pews were packed with men, women and children ready to jump to their feet in prayer for a brighter future. Addie Mae Collins, Denise McNair, Carole Robertson, and Cynthia Wesley gathered in the basement to prepare for Youth Sunday, an 11 a.m. sermon which the four girls led with inspiring vigor.

When the first hymn of the day, "God, Our Father, We Adore Thee," began, Charles Decker recalled he had heard the lyrics chanted from his general store nearly five blocks away.

The screams traveled further, he noted. The only thing that could match the congregation, it seemed, were the explosions that ripped through them.

Members of the Ku Klux Klan had planted pipe bombs in the basement of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church to send a message to the black community: know your place. All four girls were casualties of that message.

The foot soldiers of white supremacy that rigged the devices were to blame, of course, but the radicalization was derived from state and national figures who told them that the only reason for pain in their lives was the creeping progress of desegregation and civil rights.

In the United States and around the world, this kind of scapegoating has led to incalculable violence. It is obvious, then, that no one should ever seek to rip those wounds open again.

I fear that the conduct we have witnessed by John McCain, Sarah Palin and their supporters has moved us dangerously close to doing just that.

After the financial crisis unfolded and Barack Obama's message on the economy gained more traction, McCain's poll numbers tanked. From an essentially tied race immediately after the Republican convention, McCain now sits nine points behind the Democrat and looks to be headed to a wipe-out in November.

McCain's camp concluded sometime last week that the only way to turn the tide in their favor was to stoke anxiety over Barack Obama's alleged ties to William Ayers, Tony Rezko and Jeremiah Wright. They believed that a message of fear about Obama's "otherness" would tilt the race just enough for them to win in a squeaker.

The bombing at the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church demonstrated for the last generation how stoking racial and ethic tensions can lead to horror.

It has led the McCain campaign and the Republican National Committee to run ads repeatedly accusing Obama of "pulling around with terrorists." It has led Sarah Palin to make pointed accusations that Barack Obama does not love this country.

It has led all three to claim he is a radical, a subversive, someone waiting for the opportunity to sell America down the river to Iran and the mullahs.

Perhaps, most frighteningly, it has led them to radicalize their supporters to the point where violence against Barack Obama has become a legitimate fear.

At a campaign stop in Ohio, McCain asked the crowd "Who is the real Barack Obama?"

"Terrorist" and "Arab" were the most audible responses on the tape. At another campaign stop in Minnesota, a McCain line led one person in the crowd to scream "off with his [Obama's] head!"

When McCain spoke about Obama's tax proposals in Wisconsin, one woman screamed "traitor!" The Secret Service confirmed on Friday that two white teenagers at a Palin rally in Florida yelled "kill him" after she questioned his association with William Ayers.

Perhaps the scariest of these scenes was in Georgia. On Wednesday, Republican incumbent Saxby Chambliss faced off in a televised debate with Democratic challenger Jim Martin.

In response to a question about their view on the presidential race, a woman in the crowd shouted "Bomb Obama!" Bomb Obama. Four little Alabamian girls are rolling in their graves.

It has gotten so bad that, at a rally last Friday, McCain tried to calm the waters by assuring voters that Obama was a "decent family man," one "that you do not have to be scared of as president of the United States" and was booed by the crowd.

This was, of course, only after polls showed that the rhetoric was scaring independent voters into Obama's arms and several rebukes from high-ranking Republican officials like Rep. Ray LaHood (R-IL), former McCain campaign manager John Weaver and conservative columnist Dan Balz.

McCain and Palin are explicitly responsible for the hatred that has been provoked. Their words on the campaign trail, in ads, on talk radio and television are stoking a new generation racial tension that will haunt this nation far after their joke of a campaign is run off the rails in November.

If, God forbid, something were to happen to Obama, his family or any of his supporters, based on the vitriol we've witnessed at his rallies, it would only be appropriate to seek a criminal indictment of the two for inciting violence.

The bombing at the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church demonstrated for the last generation how stoking racial and ethic tensions can lead to horror. We can only hope, for the good of the nation, that McCain and Palin recognize the scum that they have become, and reverse course. I do not believe that their pending electoral destruction will pacify what they have created.

A new look at race

Greg Collins

Concerns about race relations from "Justice for Jason" leaders and Obama supporters bring to light one central assumption about the history of race in America: blacks, as former slaves brought to America against their will, have always been powerless in our white-majority society.

Unfortunately, this vision is downright deceptive. Even in environments in which societal opinions about blacks were far more insensitive than they are today, blacks were able to achieve incredible progress.

For instance, contrary to assumptions about the lack of access to quality education for minority students – because of supposedly inadequate funding and the poor socioeconomic background of their parents – the fact remains that there have been clear instances of black schools surpassing white schools in academic performance.

Dunbar High School, the only black public high school in Washington, D.C., at the turn of the 20 century, consistently outperformed white, public high schools on standardized tests.

Even though Dunbar High students did not come from affluent backgrounds (most of their parents were blue-collar workers), they exhibited better academic patterns than many of their white counterparts at other public high schools in D.C., such as higher attendance rates.

Think about that. This was a time when government-imposed racial segregation was much more rampant than today and a time when whites were far more racially insensitive towards blacks in general. Still, black students were able to overcome these barriers through hard work and dedication to their studies.

This is not an isolated instance of black achievement 100 years ago. Black families had higher percentages of two-parent households and labor participation rates than whites during the same time period.

One overriding implication reflects these empirical realities. When both blacks and whites think of the term "black culture" today, we automatically associate it with broken families, low-income communities, and high unemployment rates.

Yet history shows that this phrase, like so many other racial stereotypes, deceives us into thinking that such cultures have demonstrated the exact same characteristics and patterns throughout the entirety of American history. The truth could not be further from this preconceived notion, since cultures, as reflections of human behavior, change over time.

This information is public and readily available for anyone who wants to look at race in a serious way.

For instance, the dichotomy between the progress of blacks before and after affirmative action programs shows that blacks were able to make historically unprecedented socioeconomic gains prior to any race-conscious public policies.

The black, poverty rate fell 39 percent from 1940-1960, a rate far higher than white poverty shifts during the same era. In addition, the number of years of schooling, home ownership rates, and blue and white-collar jobs also rose dramatically for blacks in comparison to whites.

Make no mistake; blacks were able to achieve this astounding progress before the federal government outlawed employment discrimination, before the federal government launched its "War on Poverty" programs, and before the federal government implemented race-based affirmative action.

For those people who perceive Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Black Panther Movement, and Malcolm X as the first and most iconic symbols of racial progress and black power, they should take a closer look at the frequently unrecognized efforts of countless individual blacks that truly showed the first signs of minority empowerment even before the 1960s.

Furthermore, the supposed division between white and black cultures can be as misleading as the assumption that blacks have always been powerless in American history. Why is this so?

It's because there are internal patterns within black and white societies that make such designations simplistic and naive. While teachers and media outlets have informed us sufficiently about "white flight" – the movement of urban whites to the suburbs as blacks moved to the inner cities following the two world wars – they have failed to mention that "black flight" also occurred.

That is, blacks in northern cities also began moving to the suburbs as southern blacks entered these urban districts, in no small part because of differences in cultural trends such as the increase in inner-city gangs. Northern blacks simply did not want to live in crime-ridden neighborhoods.

This information is public and readily available for anyone who wants to look at race in a serious way. When people are committed to do so, they will see that the assumption that blacks have always been powerless in American history is simply misleading.

This assumption is intolerant and insensitive to the millions of overlooked blacks who have sacrificed their lives to improve the well-being of their families and of future generations of blacks.

But most importantly, only when we determine what has worked in the past for blacks can we decide how to best guarantee success for them, and for all Americans, in the future.

Don't worry, everyone is watching

Chris Amorosi

YouTube is a monument to the fallibility of man.

Every sort of moronic behavior can be found in its database by searching keywords: from "funny pets" to "skateboarders" to "Palin."

This information is accessible to people sitting through a boring humanities course with wireless Internet nearby, among others.

The Web site is a force for transparency. Any kind of gaffe or lie can be quickly and publicly displayed for disapproval without requiring a major news organization's resources.

What we do in public is now under greater scrutiny than ever before. What your name turns up on a Google search is becoming as important as references listed on a résumé.

Why not make observation systematic across all public spaces by using closed circuit cameras? Naturally there are places where it is less feasible to monitor, but those places probably don't have enough traffic to warrant observation. Better yet, make the video archives available on the Internet free of charge and without restriction like YouTube.

Imagine what a service to society closed-circuit television, or CCTV would be. A well-marked camera might make a would-be criminal think twice. If he opts out of thinking, then the video evidence will help convict him.

Conversely, cameras can help prove the innocence of someone wrongly accused by providing an alibi. Cameras are an honest, impartial witness.

Imagine how we could catch the Gary Condits and Mark Foleys in the midst of some indiscretion. No longer would congressmen have the ability to cruise around after hours violating young men and women and their party platforms. Freely accessible scandal footage should put a dent in incumbency rates.

And, especially dear to this former Southwest resident, the dregs of society would be caught in the act of vandalism. The University would still have more students responsible for the tens of thousands of dollars in damage here without evidence provided by CCTV cameras. To think of the ruined careers of those involved makes me giddy.

CCTV has been highly popular in Great Britain for about a decade. Footage was used to identify the murderers of a toddler kidnapped in a train station, and, due to the high profile nature of the case, the British government offered to fund CCTV programs in interested municipalities.

Today, British police officials concede that, while expensive, a well maintained system can be as helpful for solving crimes as fingerprinting and DNA tests.

For instance, those responsible for the recent London Underground bombings in July 2005 were identified using camera footage. Admittedly, the best use of the system is for monitoring parking lots or other more mundane sources of crime.

What your name turns up on Google is increasingly as important as references listed on a résumé.

The free access in my proposed program precludes the usual accusations of Orwellian mischief filming everybody might otherwise enable. Big Brother will not be behind every television screen in your home. Since the data is freely available on the Internet, we would all be watching the watchmen.

Not that I give much credence to those who argue that observation somehow translates into a totalitarian dystopia. Do innocent, law-abiding people have a reason to evade tracking?

Is it only because they're uncomfortable? I'm not comfortable knowing that to track a dangerous criminal we must rely on him to skip merrily around spreading a trail of credit card uses or other forensic breadcrumbs.

I think the fear of losing privacy is really a fear of public embarrassment. The great American Puritan tradition clashes with, and indeed provokes, the desire to have sex outside and buy liquor on the Sabbath. It's easy to feel embarrassed when everyone else says you should.

It's harder to feel embarrassed when you can see them doing the same thing. In essence, we have YouTube as 21st century humiliation. It's far more humane to place video on the Internet than to place a person in the stocks and pelt him with fruit.

Unfortunately the fruits of my system will take some time to ripen into society-wide change for the better. The infrastructure must be built, Web sites maintained, and accusations of a police state debunked. And only the most recent generations, like ours and the one after us, will be the most thoroughly documented.

Of course, isn't that slowly becoming the case? I await the elections of 30 years hence when all the demons lurking in YouTube and Facebook begin to haunt candidates.

The pictures and videos I've seen on the Internet in the blogs of business majors and their ilk are already impediments to public office or corporate vice president positions. I think their individual contributions to their careers' dead ends should be augmented by a society-wide effort. It's more equitable that way.

Buckingham to showcase solo endeavor

BY HEATHER WAXMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Lindsey Buckingham certainly knows how to mark his territory.

The rock prodigy will play at Northampton's Calvin Theater tonight, making it his second stop at the venue in the past year.

After three decades as the triple-threat (lead-singer/guitarist/producer) of the legendary 70s rock band, Fleetwood Mac, Buckingham has abandoned his original stomping grounds.

He is now embarking on another U.S. tour in lieu of his latest solo effort, "Gift of Screws."

On the heels of Fleetwood Mac's ubiquitous 1997 comeback, "The Dance," Buckingham's record company was less than interested in his latest solo project. They instead wanted another sold-out tour and complementary MTV reunion.

He surrendered to their wishes and returned to the recording studio with the rest of Fleetwood Mac (without vocalist/keyboardist Christine McVie) to record what would be the band's final album, "Say You Will," released in late 2003.

Before hitting the studio with his fellow band members, Buckingham had been writing "Gift of Screws" for quite some time.

Consequently, much of his material, including the first single of "Say You Will," entitled "Peacekeeper," was implemented into the bulk of the album.

At the time, Buckingham was accustomed to the constant burden of adhering to Fleetwood Mac's outrageous success.

The pressure, however, finally took its toll on him.

He relinquished his leading role in Fleetwood Mac and reverted to focusing on wrapping up his recent, discarded solo endeavor.

Over a decade in the making, "Gift of Screws" was released in September.

Despite being a multi-platinum phenomenon in the company of Fleetwood Mac, Buckingham has managed to remain somewhat of an under-the-radar solo artist, proving that he is truly all about the music.

"Gift of Screws," which features cameos by old mates Mick Fleetwood and John McVie, is a clear testament to the notion that the guitarist extraordinaire couldn't disappear if he tried.

"Screws" puts a modern spin on Buckingham's previous solo albums and, as a result, scored him impressive reviews from his harshest critics.

From the album's beginning, Buckingham takes his listeners on an eerie, futuristic, supersonic ride through space.

On the first track, "Great Day," his vocals echo behind his always-impressive guitar riffs. The slightly oceanic sounds cohesively tie into his lyrics as he sings, "Swimming in the water, goggle at the moon."

The song's chill-inducing guitar solo is described by Rolling Stone magazine as "Designed to bitch-slap anyone with the nerve to wonder if Lindsey Buckingham still rocks."

He has never taken a guitar lesson or read a lick of sheet music in his life, relying purely on intuition and curiosity. All the more reason to note his remarkable talents.

On the album's first single, "Did You Miss Me," he croons, "A hundred years out of town/It's not so long, so I found/Just long enough to get free/Oh, when you were my baby."

Old Mac disciples may presume the song to be a testament to the dwindled romance between him and Fleetwood Mac bandmate/singer, Stevie Nicks.

The two had known each other since junior high school and retained a blatant mutual attraction from day one. It took a long time for them to hit the ground running and they desperately tried to keep their relationship under wraps in the midst of their celebrity.

It may be nostalgia. It may be regret. It may be a simple reflection of good times.

Whatever it is, it only verifies Buckingham's reining seat in the house of rock royalty.

Classic skills in Macbeth performance

The Renaissance Center Theatre Company's production of "Macbeth," running until Oct. 19, has tried to give its audience an experience which closely mirrors that of an actual Renaissance spectator.

Most seats were filled on the opening performance – a crowd consisting mostly of middle-aged and elderly viewers, but the small size of the theater means needing only about 30 people for a full house.

The company successfully achieved their goal of emphasizing the domestic relationship in the play, as Macbeth and Lady Macbeth [illegible] while speaking and kiss to show their [illegible] for each other while they plan to steal the throne.

Okkervil River leaves audience dissatisfied

Frontman, group lack cohesion at Pearl Street performance

BY BRIAN WOOD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Wednesday night at Pearl Street promised a number of things. Sadly, it only delivered in the most unexpected places.

Show-openers What Cheer? Brigade provided an up-tempo start to the evening. A hipster-infused perpetually of a band that shunned the stage in favor of playing directly amongst the crowd, the Brigade was full of unexpected life and energy. For an opener, the multi-brass and drum line instrumentalists delivered on all cylinders, setting the table for the more recognizable acts to follow.

The consistent high of the Brigade's set would unfortunately not be seen again.

All the energy and anticipation that had been stirred up was deflated within minutes by Seattle-based Crooked Fingers.

The four-piece implemented violin over guitar that was overly-repetitive in its minimalism and relied heavily on delay effects. Crooked Fingers mixed things up occasionally by using more Latin-inspired guitar tracks, but ultimately their statue-esque stage presence and drab material grew tiresome at an alarming rate. Performing over a sea of side conversations and background chatter, it was clear the crowd was here for one thing only, headliners Okkervil River.

Taking the stage in his now typical business attire, Okkervil frontman Will Sheff welcomed the crowd with haze in his eyes. Whether exhaustion or intoxication was to blame for his glazed-over stare, Sheff was visibly not at his best.

For a band touring in support of an album titled "The Stand Ins," the performance that followed was incredibly fitting. At its worst moments it was deserving of a more derogatory title.

"The Imposters," has a nice ring to it.

From the very beginning of their set, a sloppily delivered rendition of "Plus Ones," it was clear that the band was collectively not on the same page.

During much of the set's infancy, Sheff explored the confines of the stage, shaking his disheveled mass of hair in his compatriot's faces while annoying himself into a riff. Try as he might, his enthusiasm was rarely mirrored by any of his bandmates.

Supporting members looked around at each other with uncertainty. Gone was the cohesion that once had propelled the band's lively stage performances, replaced by timid support to Sheff's graceless flair.

During a stripped-down version of "A Stone," Sheff took the slow-paced track down to an unbearable crawl. By painfully dragging out vocal notes and using comical emphasis on phrases, the song fell laughably flat.

This lackluster rendition was the evening's most troublesome. Sheff performed the song as his encore during the band's stop at Pearl Street last September with exactly the opposite effect. It was an intimate re-working of the song and featured prominent use of lap steel.

Wednesday's rendition was indicative of the night as a whole: off the mark.

As in past performances, Sheff shed layers of clothing as the night progressed. With each stripped garment, the band slowly became more in-tune with one another.

"Lost Coastlines," a recorded duet featuring Sheff and the since-departed keyboardist Jonathan Meiburg, showed the first real signs of life out of the band. A spirited banjo introduction led into the upheat maritime-themed song, with Sheff sounding his best during the track's introductory verse.

When Meiburg's verse came, Okkervil's bassist stepped into the vocal spotlight. The crowd reacted enthusiastically, with an array of cheers following his first lines.

Okkervil River frontman Will Sheff received less than rave reviews of his performance at the Pearl Street Night Club last Wednesday.

New CD makes waves

Rock-infused group Of Montreal gives a bizarre and erratic performance on their latest album, titled "Skeletal Lamping."

BY JOE STAHL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Kevin Barnes, Of Montreal's frontman, probably never played with geometric shaped blocks as a child – fitting a wooden triangle block into a triangle shaped hole would've been far too boring for him.

In the world of this band, bred in Athens, Ga., music isn't designed to fit into any space. It's conjured to stand alone, be speculating and provoking – for better or for worse.

"Skeletal Lamping" is Of Montreal's latest album, which has a philosophy that goes against the grain of all art that "works," as Barnes said.

The goal for this album was to surpass the weirdness of the band's last success, "Hissing Fauna, Are You the Destroyer?" Of Montreal's most ingrained virtue is to surprise and create mild confusion amongst its listeners. Shock value is the band's only value.

"Skeletal Lamping" is not for passive listeners. Its 15 songs often run into each other, which makes the album seem more like a single composition rather than a collection of separate tracks.

"Hissing Fauna" was a real foreshadower for this new album, with unknown transitions from song to song. Both albums are like run-on sentences that leap from topic to topic; punctuation is used sparingly and erratically from start to end.

It is evident that Of Montreal wants to bring back the concept of the "album" – a trend that currently eludes popular music due to the era of the iTunes single download. This new effort highlights the shift back in time when people actually purchased CDs.

The stream-of-consciousness in "Skeletal Lamping" is maddening. Barnes' complex psyche is exposed in lights all over the spectrum. It is incredibly moody and unpredictable, making it initially tough to warm up to. If "Skeletal Lamping" is a parallel of Barnes' mind, he should call a shrink.

What does "lamping" mean in the album's title anyhow? It's a hunting technique in which hunters enter the forest at night, flood an area with light, then shoot or capture animals as they run in panic from their hiding places.

Metaphorically speaking, the end result of the lamping of the group's own skeletons is a mixture of intriguing things.

Humor is blended with apprehension on the track, "Women's Studies Victims," which speaks about the experiences between a boy and a bitter feminist, but opens with spooky electronic beats that could be in a thriller movie.

For the 11 years Of Montreal has existed, elements of pop have always been in the band's music. Though erratic at some points, "Triphallus, To Punctuate!" has an infectious chorus that can beat any rays of sunlight with its jovial synth keyboards and up-tempo percussion.

"An Eluardian Instance" is another tune that keeps the pop sound alive. This is achieved by a brilliant trumpet that carries the melody and the repetition of the lyrics: "Do you remember our last summer as independents?" Barnes is used as his own backup singer as a means of harmonizing.

Barnes is a free spirit as he indulgently bends notes from beginning to end. He also likes to incorporate off-kilter shrieks and reverb, a tool that gives "Skeletal Lamping" a cosmic feel.

The usage of digitalism in the vocals is far too excessive on the album. Such advanced sound engineering makes the music artificial and becomes a barrier to the real meat of the songs.

Lyrically, "Skeletal Lamping" is borderline sleazy. Barnes is overtly sexual as he sings lyrics like, "We can do it soft core, if you want, but you should know I do it both ways." Salacious banter pops up everywhere on this, at times, horny album.

Because Barnes gives himself freedom to do as he pleases on the microphone, he is often caught in falsetto. On "St. Exquisite's Confessions," Barnes uses soul power and idiosyncrasies to emulate Beck during his "Midnite Vultures" era.

The album is a schizophrenic mess through its abrupt fragments, songs within songs, shifts in moods, outer space productions, gender bending, and ego-tripping.

But underneath it all, Of Montreal's peculiar essence still lingers through and through.

Macbeth rendition bodes well

half of the show, which ran only two hours, including a brief intermission. Her wild eyes and gesturing expertly reflected the madness that overcomes Lady Macbeth when she sees the throne becoming hers.

Sara Leonard's execution was impressive as her tone moved between quiet, reserved excitement and fierce bellowing.

Other actors did not achieve this balance quite as easily. McHugh's shouts, while passionate, were not quite as convincing as Leonard's. Jonathan Turbin, who played Macduff, seemed to scream nearly all his lines, divesting the role of the range of emotions it should have contained.

Turbin, however, was the only performer guilty of overacting that night. The younger actors from the University of Massachusetts and Amherst College, including Paul Devlin, Tom Gostinian, Natasha Smith, and Kathryn Libby, blended perfectly with the older and more experienced actors.

These students were professional without being stiff. It was only the youngest actor of the show, eighth-grader Gabrielle Holme-Mille, who seemed to betray some signs of nervousness during her performance.

Nevertheless, Holme-Mill was able to hold her own among the rest of the cast.

Death scenes, often challenging in a performance, were done well in the Renaissance Center Theatre Company's performance. They were serious without being melodramatic.

In addition to the deaths of Banquo and Macduff's son, director Leonard moved Lady Macduff's death, which typically occurs offstage, into the spotlight to heighten the violent nature of the play.

The performance stumbled only in the usage of the same actor for multiple parts. Turbin played two roles, Devlin three, Libby four, Smith four, Holme-Miller four, etc.

While using the actors for several roles is understandable on a low budget, it distracted from the performance. On a large stage this would be fine, but in such an intimate atmosphere the characters did not flow as seamlessly from one role to another.

"Macbeth" will have performances Oct. 17 and 18 at 7 p.m., and Oct. 19 at 2 p.m.

Okkervil performance falls flat

OKKERVIL from page 5

By the second verse, however, Sheff was inciting a chorus of claps to hide the band's inability to reproduce Melburg's signature vocal stylings. While it's impossible to hold this as a fault to the band in its current form, Melburg's absence was all too apparent during this moment more so than any other.

The band kept their improved form all the way into the set's first conclusion. On "Unless it's Kicks," the band showed its collective best. Up-tempo and tightly-knit the band fired through the song with an adoring response from the crowd.

In a night full of stumbles and missteps, even their tightest offering had its faults. Sheff grabbed the microphone during a refrain and urged the crowd to clap along in unison. When the entirety of the crowd failed to comply with his request, Sheff threw a tantrum, yelling at the back of the room to clap along with the song's conclusion.

Stripped down to just a sweat-soaked undershirt, Sheff launched into the night's encore, delving back deep into the band's back catalog for the first time all night. "Okkervil River Song" off the band's debut release "Don't Fall in Love with Everyone You See," was met with less fanfare than some of the band's newer selections, but was played with the flare that had been lacking all evening.

Closing out the encore was another selection from the band's debut release, "Westfall." Inviting the members of the What Cheer? Brigade onto the stage, the folk-rock inspired tale of evil and murder became a rollicking conclusion full of flashy horns and percussion.

The biggest surprise of the night's beginning coincidently was the highlight of its conclusion.

Captain Mary Shea scored her first goal for the Minutewomen in the team's 5-0 win over Saint Louis this weekend. The senior also had two assists in the game to tie her for the team lead with six on the season.

game, constantly producing goal-scoring opportunities and maintaining pressure on the Billikens.

"I think we used our space well. From the backfield, to the midfield to the forwards," Orlando said. "The midfield was doing a good job dribbling into the circle, along the end lines and the forwards were getting into the right positions."

The Minutewomen spread out their offensive production, with their five goals coming from four different players. Jill Powers led the way with a pair of goals while Orlando and Kelly added to their weekend totals. The final goal came from team captain Mary Shea, her first of the season.

Shea, who also had two assists in the game, is more known for her defense and assists on offense than her goal scoring.

"I really try to focus on having better awareness," Shea said. "Trying to listen to my teammates and where they are and trying to see where the spaces are up field."

Sunday's game against Saint Louis marked the fourth and final game that UMass would be without Cher King and freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall, both of whom were still away at the Pan-American Games in Mexico City. With King still out, coach Sowry made several adjustments in the defensive lineup.

Sophomore defender Jackie Iait started the game, but saw limited time as Sowry opted to give some of her freshmen extended playing time.

"We're just trying different lineups. We were able to get Amanda, Dietz and Christine Cutry in there today," Sowry said. "Also, Makaela [Potts] plays the fullback position really well. So it was a combination of trying some new lineups and resting some legs."

The Minutewomen return to action with conference games at La Salle on Friday and at West Chester on Sunday.

UM offense explodes

Kelly, Powers and Orlando fill in absense left by King

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the past two weeks, the Massachusetts field hockey team was expected to lose production up front with junior forward Cher King participating in the Pan American Games in Mexico City.

The offense, however, has seen no such drop as forwards Katie Kelly, Jill Powers and Katelyn Orlando all had multiple goals this weekend.

The No. 17 Minutewomen (10-3, 2-0 Atlantic 10) saw one of their most dynamic weekends offensively with a 3-1 win over Richmond Friday and 5-0 victory over Saint Louis Sunday.

It was their win over the Billikens (4-7, 0-1 A-10), however, that showed off a much more aggressive offense that featured the team's forwards. With three goals this weekend, Orlando led the offense that took advantage of the Saint Louis defense.

"I think in any game, it's an opportunity that arises because of how the defense plays you and what you see on the field that day," Orlando said. "We just played off of what they gave us and it worked out."

Senior midfielder Mary Shea was also invaluable to the offense against the Billikens.

The team captain penetrated the first line of the defense and then spread the ball to her teammates Shea, who is not used to putting up big numbers, earned a goal and two assists against Saint Louis, including an off-balance shot that crossed in front of Billikens goalkeeper Katherine Deem and went in.

"Their forwards were really putting a lot of pressure on our backs too, so once we got in behind their forwards, we were able to penetrate and there were so many lanes that were opening, especially in the circle," Shea said.

For the past four games, the UMass offense has been nearly unstoppable, putting up 17 goals. Its success was no more evident than in its performance in the second half against No. 2 Syracuse on Sept. 28. The UMass offense scored four goals against the second-best team in the nation and has not looked back since.

With the other members of the forward line making enormous contributions, UMass coach Justine Sowry joked that King might be out of a job when she returns.

"It's great, maybe we used to rely a little bit too much on her, but the confidence level of all the forwards is just growing game after game," Sowry said. "You can see that it's almost like they're growing taller and they feel like they can now do it and get into the right positions."

Despite their prolific open-field offense, the Minutewomen struggled on corner plays this weekend. Out of their eight goals, none came off of corners.

"I think our rebounding [was the problem], because on a lot of our corners we did get off and we had shots on goal," Orlando said. "But we weren't getting on the rebounds fast enough and their defense was quicker than us defensively on corners."

The Minutewomen got off several clean shots off against Saint Louis goalies Alex Lafarge and Katherine Deem. However, Sowry was disappointed that her players didn't get on the board through their second-chance opportunities.

"We would like our penalty corner attack to be a weapon for us," Sowry said. "We were trying to keep it simple, not too many fancy options but we were really trying to get the sticks on the ball and be ready for rebounding."

UMass looks to continue its offense and overall success against two 5-8 teams in La Salle and West Chester this weekend.

UMass drops A-10 opener

Shutout by URI's defense, offensive struggle continue

BY SCOTT FELDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

KINGSTON, R.I. – They made the right passes, took the right shots, earned numerous set-piece chances, and outplayed their opponent for nearly the entire game.

Yet, once again the Massachusetts men's soccer team walked away in frustration.

The Minutemen were blanked again Saturday, falling to Rhode Island, 1-0, in the conference opener. Rams defensemen Dwayne Williams knocked in a header off a free kick with three minutes left in the game to send UMass home having been shutout for the fourth straight game.

"If we don't score we're not going to win games 'end of story,'" said UMass coach Sam Koch. "It's very frustrating, we didn't score and they did. We didn't enough to win the game, but we didn't get the final tally."

With the score tied 0-0 with less than five minutes remaining, it appeared the game would be heading into overtime. Then with a little more than three minutes left, Minutemen midfielder Bryant Craft was issued a yellow card for an errant slide tackle, giving URI a free kick.

The Rams took the advantage as midfielder Gary Crooks lofted the ball perfectly so that Williams could out-jump everyone and put a header past Simmons into the top left corner of the net. Rhode Island broke out in celebration as the Minutemen were crestfallen.

|---|---|
| UMass | 0 |
| URI | 1 |

The loss puts the Minutemen (2-6-2, 0-1-0 Atlantic 10) under a great deal of pressure to win the rest of their conference games. To have a realistic chance to make the A-10 Championships, they must win six of their next eight matchups.

It was a very physical contest in which five yellow cards were issued between both teams, including four late in the second half.

The physicality started when UMass midfielder Ben Arikian was upended by a URI player after a header and fell on his head. Both sides immediately jumped to their player's defense and a shoving match broke out before the referee's were able to separate the teams.

The first half displayed the difference in strategy both teams used. Rhode Island (5-4-1, 1-0-0 A-10) played a possession-style offense, attempting to get the ball deep in the box and take shots at close range. Meanwhile, the Minutemen tried to push the ball along the sidelines and create corner kick opportunities, something they did very well in the first half, earning six corner kicks.

However, neither side's offensive plan could break the other side's defense. Whenever UMass took a corner kick, a URI defender out-jumped UMass and headed the ball out of danger. Whenever the Rams would try to dribble the ball into the zone, the Minutemen defense took the ball away and eliminated all the shooting angles. It was an even half, but Koch was disappointed that the team could not take advantage of its chances on set pieces.

"The timing of our runs was not precise and our service was off, the combination of those two [problems] made it very hard to score on set pieces," Koch said.

Rhode Island seemed to come out of the half with more intensity than UMass. The Rams outshot the Minutemen 10-5 in the second half and forced the defense and goalkeeper Zack Simmons into tough situations.

Three minutes into the second half, Rhode Island got a shot five feet away from the goal that Simmons managed to stop with his fingertips. Later, with 15 minutes left in the game, Rams forward Erkko Puranen got behind the defense for a near breakaway, but was stopped when Minutemen defenseman Chris Brown chased him down from behind and slide tackled him.

"I thought we played better in the first half, the first 20 minutes or so of the second half were not the way we played in the first half," Simmons said. "We weren't controlling the game the way we were in the first half but we were battling. I thought Rhode Island just played better in the second half and that limited what we could do."

The Minutemen have two key conference games coming up, against St. Bonaventure on Friday and Duquesne on Sunday, which will be critical to their season.

"We're on the road where we've got to get a result at Duquesne, an extremely hard to place to play and at St. Bonaventure another very hard place to play," Koch said.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu.

Midfielder Mike DeSantis and the UMass offense continues to struggle. Over 10 games, UMass has seven goals, one of which came from DeSantis.

Offense giving away chances

decreased, so has its red-zone efficiency. This cannot be blamed solely on Coen, however.

The veteran signal-caller was responsible for one of UMass' four missed opportunities in the red zone the previous two weeks. The other three have been on two fumbles by tailback Tony Nelson and a turnover on downs after four attempts by Nelson to get the ball into the end zone.

The Minutemen started off the season missing one chance in the red zone – a fumbled snap by Coen against Holy Cross – throughout the first four weeks of the season. But in the past two games, against Delaware and Northeastern, UMass was 0-for-2 and 4-for-6, respectively.

Despite Coen and the offense struggling to finish drives, UMass has gone 2-1 in the past three weeks, the lone loss came from Football Bowl Subdivision's No. 7 Texas Tech. With the team still winning despite the offense not playing at its full potential, it speaks largely to the character and will of the team.

For the first three weeks of the season, the Minutemen leaned on a near-perfect Coen to get to 2-1, but the past two weeks the team, whether it is the defense or Nelson, has picked up the slack when Coen has not been himself.

With the Maroon and White getting into the thick of its conference schedule, it may need everyone — Coen, Nelson and the defense – playing at its best if they want to go to the playoffs for the third straight year for the first time in school history.

Nelson breaks loose in fourth

a sideline interference penalty, called on UMass, moved the attempt up five yards – from 42 to 37 yards.

Johnson did not miss on the second opportunity and gave his team its third lead of the game going into the half, 17-14.

Nelson did not put up numbers in the first half that would lead one to believe he had a career day – he had 36 yards on 13 carries and a touchdown in the game, but had nine yards in the second quarter.

But it was what the senior did in the fourth quarter that gave the Minutemen the victory.

"I kind of came out sloppy in the first half," Nelson said. "I just talked to myself at half and said: 'You're going to have to step it up if we're going to win this game.' The fourth quarter came and I just turned it up. I did what I had to do and we had a great team win."

The teams traded scores in the third quarter to head into the fourth quarter separated by a field goal, with NU leading 24-21. In the fourth quarter, Nelson carried the ball 14 times for a total of 108 yards – an average of 7.7 yards per carry, after averaging 2.9 the first three quarters – giving him a total of 37 carries and 175 yards for the game, both career highs.

With UMass trailing and in possession of the ball to start the fourth quarter, the Minutemen threatened to take the lead when they got the ball down to the Huskies 1-yard line. However, they failed to punch it in on a fourth-and-goal.

UMass' defense came up with a stop on the next drive deep in the Huskies' territory to force a punt giving the offense the ball back on the Northeastern 48-yard line.

On the third play of the drive, Nelson took the handoff from quarterback Liam Coen, found a hole created by the offensive line and then found open space as he rushed for 30 yards to the Huskies 5-yard line.

"I just kept running as hard as I could. I said: 'I know we're going to break one eventually,'" Nelson said. "As soon as I broke that one long one it was over and I was in the zone."

UMass would later take the lead, 28-24, on a 3-yard rush by Coen (20-of-30, 265 yards, one touchdown and one interception), a lead it would not forfeit. But Nelson was not done.

The Minutemen's defense came up with their second big stop of the quarter on the Huskies first play of the next drive. After Orio completed another pass to Theoudele, cornerback Corey Davis hit the wideout and forced a fumble. Davis then recovered the ball on the Northeastern 35-yard line.

Nelson then took the next play 34 yards to the Huskies 1-yard line only to have the play called back by a holding penalty on Matt Silver. After two more rushes, Nelson took the ball for the fourth straight play, and ran it for 22 yards. On the following play, Nelson had his only blemish of the game when he was hit from behind by Phil Higgins, jarring the ball loose into the end zone.

Northeastern's Cord Parks recovered the ball for a touchback, giving the Huskies hope with 3 minutes and 39 seconds left in the game.

On the next play, Broomfield took the ball 31 yards up the right side of the field. But Northeastern then faced a stout UMass defense on the next three plays to force a fourth-and-three, where Orio would fumble the snap only to have it recovered by UMass safety Jeromy Miles to seal the game.

shot to the upper right hand corner to tie the game.

As the period progressed, UMass controlled play much better, moving the puck around successfully and not allowing North Dakota good looks at Meyers.

Before the first intermission the Minutemen took the lead once again with a power-play goal 13 minutes, 55 seconds into the game. UMass' first power-play unit moved the puck around its offensive zone. Alex Berry and Justin Braun made passes back and forth on the blue line opening up space for possible shots and passes toward the goal.

Braun faked a shot, creating a seam between the UND penalty killers. Sophomore winger James Marcou circled the net and positioned to the right of Walski. Braun fired the pass to Marcou who redirected the puck past a screened Walski.

The next goal was important. At the start of the second period the Minutemen were creating more chances and dominating play better than in the first. UMass' penalty kill did well clearing the zone, but wasn't as successful on the counter attack, allowing UND to forecheck deep into its offensive zone.

The fourth goal of the game came from a slashing minor on North Dakota's Chris VandeVelde 13 minutes, 55 seconds into the second period.

UMass' power-play unit was moving the puck quickly around the rink with solid passes creating many chances in the offensive zone. Cory Quirk received a pass from Berry and took a shot toward the goal from the right face-off circle. The shot rebounded out to Quirk, who reshot it, and Marcou redirected at the left post into the net for his second goal of the game.

But North Dakota didn't back down. In the third period North Dakota came out strong offensively dominating play and holding the puck in its offensive zone for most of the period. The Fighting Sioux outshot (19-4) and outscored the Minutemen (1-0). With five seconds left on a North Dakota power play (7:22 into the period) VandeVelde scored after spending the majority of time in the offensive zone.

"We played OK in the first period, hung with them in the first. In the second period it was a good effort and then the third period we literally hung on for dear life, but with great goaltending we held on to the win," Cahoon said.

Like in Friday's game, strong goaltending brought the team success. Michigan State's goaltender, Jeff Lerg, held the Spartans the entire game. Meyers did the same for the Minutemen, giving up far less rebounds on Saturday than on Friday and posting a career-high 40 saves.

Michigan State came out hard Friday night and UMass played flat, struggling to create offensive opportunities and keep control of the puck on its breakouts. Although UMass didn't play as well as it did on Saturday, it wasn't for a lack of scoring chances.

Michigan State started out the game scoring 3:04 into the first period. The Minutemen had just gotten back to being at full strength after Marcou's boarding penalty when MSU's Andrew Rowe scored off a failed clear attempted by the Minutemen.

The Spartans scored two more unanswered goals at the beginning and end of the second period, but in the third period UMass wasn't going to give up.

Sophomore Brian Keane scored his first goal of the season 12:54 into the third period. Keane skated the puck into the zone and crossed in front of the goal, with a saved shot by Lerg. Keane and the puck went into the net, taking it off its pegs. Officials initially disallowed the goal but, after review, ruled it went in legally and before the net dislodged.

UMass had a strong offense in the third period. The Minutemen limited the Spartans time in their zone, and didn't allow one shot on goal.

The Minutemen played a different game on Saturday compared to Friday. The goaltending improved, special teams went from capitalizing on 0-of-6 power plays on Friday, to 2-of-4 on Saturday and broke the puck out of their zone quicker and easier.

UMass plays again on Tuesday Oct. 12 at Rensselaer.

Defense strong on penalty kills, 1-for-7 against North Dakota

game drastically overnight. The Minutemen defense also stepped it up to a new level in the second game as well.

The Maroon and White defense, led by Martin Nolet and Justin Braun, played at a high level, despite allowing 42 shots and, according to Cahoon, played better. UMass made life difficult for the Fighting Sioux all game.

North Dakota boasted one of the most potent offenses in the Western Collegiate Hockey Association last year. Its 85 goals were only second to St. Cloud State's 95. Screening the opposition's goaltender has led the Fighting Sioux to success.

UMass defenders made sure that Meyers saw the puck coming in at all times. Nolet and fellow defensemen held their ground, making sure not to let UND attackers interfere with Meyers' vision, making his job easier than it could have been.

The Minutemen were also spectacular on the penalty kill. UMass was penalized seven times Saturday night, four times in the second period alone.

Braun and defensive forward Brett Watson were the anchors of UMass' penalty killing units. The two were on the ice for most of all the penalties, putting pressure on the power-play formations the Fighting Sioux tried to set up.

North Dakota managed 14 shots on seven penalties. Though, the Fighting Sioux did manage a power-play goal 7 minutes, 22 seconds into the third period. Despite the goal, UMass kept the UND power-play unit chasing after the puck the entire night.

With the defense and goaltending finding their own respective strides in the second game of the young season, the only question now is if they can keep it up.

Luckey stops Flyers

terrific diving saves to her left early to set the tone for UMass on defense. Toulouse, Rodriguez and company took care of the rest for the Minutewomen, but it wasn't easy.

The last six minutes of the contest the Flyers – led by 2007 A-10 Player of the Year Mandi Back and Colleen Gibson – had numerous scoring opportunities. But no one could get the ball by Luckey, who finished with five saves.

"Lauren is amazing, she saved us a bunch of times," Toulouse said. "She just has an energy that you can feel from the back – she talks a lot which is great for the defense. There's a sense that even if we let the ball get through, she's going to be there to stop it."

"I can't say enough about Luckey," she added.

The goalkeeper typically gets much of the credit – and of course, the blame – when goals get scored, but UMass' junior goalie knew and appreciated how well her defense played in front of her Sunday.

"They are my little comfort blankets," Luckey said of Toulouse and Rodriguez. "We're great friends off the field and on the field we really work for each other. They fight for everything and I fight for everything and we win as a team."

With one of its most significant wins in years, the Minutewomen are now a team that is very much in the mix for the A-10 tournament. After an admittedly poor weekend which resulted in losses against Richmond (Oct. 3) and George Washington (Oct. 5), UMass needed to turn things around quickly if it wanted to be a factor in the conference.

They began that process on Friday, with a 1-0 home win over Xavier (1-10-1, 0-3-1 A-10). Smith scored the only goal in that game (unassisted) midway through the second half. Luckey also made five saves in that shutout.

"I don't think many people expected us to beat Xavier, let alone Dayton – especially after last weekend when we didn't have good games," Toulouse said. "I think people will start paying a little more attention to us now."

Minutemen hold off Huskies, ride career day by Nelson

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BROOKLINE — After what was thought to be a breakout game last week for the Massachusetts football team's defense, there were few times in the first three quarters when the "D" looked like that of the week before.

But with a career performance by tailback Tony Nelson, the defense was saved once again, in the Minutemen's 28-24 victory over Northeastern.

No. 13 UMass (4-2, 2-1 Colonial Athletic Association) answered the first two scoring drives of the Huskies, tying the game seven points and again at 14 right before the half — but continued to struggle to get a lead in the first half, something they have done all season.

"Right off the bat we were fighting uphill again, but we just kept fighting, kept battling, seesawing back and forth in the opening half," said UMass coach Don Brown.

Both teams capitalized on their first drives, a 22-yard run by Northeastern running back Alex Broomfield (22 carries, 169 yards for one touchdown), followed by a 1-yard touchdown run by Nelson. A couple of drives later, after a UMass three-and-out on offense, the Huskies (2-4, 1-1 CAA) burned UMass for an 80-yard touchdown reception from senior quarterback Anthony Orio (10-of-19 for 179 yards and two touchdowns) to senior Roh Theoudele.

The catch was the longest reception against UMass' defense since the Minutemen gave up an 86-yard reception against William & Mary in 2000, and was also for more yards then the UMass secondary gave up all of last week, when they surrendered 40

UMass then scored on a 1-yard run by fullback Chris Zardas (two rushes for three yards and two touchdowns) to tie the game at 14. The score left 18 seconds on the clock, but it was more than enough for the Huskies.

Northeastern's Rashad Jordan returned the kickoff 27 yards to its own 49-yard line and Orio followed with a 26-yard pass to tight end Conor Gillmartin-Donohue. The completion set the Huskies up for a 42-yard field goal with four seconds remaining in the half.

Kicker Mat Johnson, who had already missed a 37-yard field goal after hitting the front of the crossbar in the first quarter, was given another chance. His second kick turned into one from the same distance when

See FOOTBALL on page 8

The Minutemen's offensive line dominated last year when they met with Northeastern. Things were no different this past weekend as the offensive line helped Tony Nelson run all over the Huskies for 175 yards on 37 carries.

UMass finding ways to win despite mistakes on offense

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BROOKLINE — Liam Coen knows his teammates have his back.

After having the defense bail him out of a three-interception game against Delaware two weeks ago, Coen needed career highs from his tailback, Tony Nelson (37 carries for 175 yards), to help the Massachusetts football team get past Northeastern last weekend.

Coen did not play poorly in the No. 13 Minutemen's 28-24 win — he was 20-of-30 for 265 yards — he was just not the Liam Coen he was expected to be.

Coen's first three games of his senior year were statistically the best of any of his four years at UMass. Through the first three weeks the quarterback threw for 826 yards and nine touchdowns, despite throwing for 92 yards in Week 1 against Albany. His bests before that were 672 yards and eight touchdowns in his junior year.

As for interceptions, Coen only gave up one through the first three games, matching his lowest since 2005 when he had one through Weeks 2 and 4 (Coen did not play in Week 1).

Since getting off to that great start, Coen has thrown for good yardage (145, 228 and 265 yards against Texas Tech, Delaware and Northeastern, respectively) but has not thrown many touchdowns and has given up more interceptions. In the last three games, Coen has had a 1-to-5 touchdown-to-interception ratio compared to his 9-to-1 in the first three games.

The large number of interceptions has greatly limited the number of points UMass' offense has been able to score.

After scoring 111 points through the first three games (37 points per game), the Minutemen have managed less than half of that total, 55 points (18.3 points per game) through the last three games. Those 55 points are the fewest points over a three week span the Minutemen have scored since they scored 45 from Oct. 28 to Nov. 11 in 2006.

Just as UMass' points have

BOSTON — The Massachusetts hockey team played two very similar games over the weekend. Its role in the two games, however, was reversed.

The Minutemen defeated No. 5 North Dakota on Saturday for its first win of the season, 24 hours after losing to No. 11 Michigan State, 3-1, in the Ice Breaker Invitational at Agganis Arena in Boston as they outshot the Spartans, 37-16. On Saturday the losing team once again had the shot advantage (42-16), but junior goaltender Dan Meyers (40 saves) helped the Minutemen secure the 3-2 win over North Dakota (0-2).

"Here we are 24 hours later and it's almost like a mirror image of [Friday] night's game but in reverse," UMass coach Don Cahoon said on Saturday.

UMass (1-1) started the scoring. After many slap shots from just inside North Dakota's blue line, junior Topher Bevis received a pass from Cory Quirk and took a shot into the upper right-hand corner of the net, past Fighting Sioux goaltender Aaron Walski, with a little less than four minutes into the game.

North Dakota answered back halfway through the first period. Three North Dakota forwards – Ryan Martens, Darcy Zajac and Matt Watkins – moved the puck around Meyers. With Martens open in the high slot, he collected the puck and Meyers dropped down to anticipate the shot. Martens took a Junior Dan Meyers got the surprise start for UMass but helped them go 1-1 over the weekend. The goaltender had 40 saves on 42 shots in the Minutemen's upset over No. 5 North Dakota.

Meyers saves forty in upset over No. 5 Fighting Sioux

BY RYAN FLEMING

BOSTON — What a difference a day makes.

Sixteen shots, 13 saves in the Massachusetts hockey team's 3-1 loss Friday night against Michigan State.

Forty-two shots, 40 saves in its upset win against No. 5 North Dakota one day later.

UMass goaltender Dan Meyers must have been visited by NHL greats Gerry Cheevers, Terry Sawchuck or even Ken Dryden in his dreams Friday night. If so, they shared some invaluable information that led to his 100 percent turnaround between the two games.

Meyers looked nervous in UMass' debut Friday night. He was caught out of position, gave up rebounds and wasn't aggressive, staying in the crease instead of coming out to challenge Spartan attackers.

Saturday against the Fighting Sioux, Meyers was called on again to start in net for UMass. Surely, his confidence was shaken after his poor performance the previous night.

But on Saturday night he skated to his crease, put the previous night's loss behind him, acted like a veteran and put forth his best effort. And a great effort it was. Meyers stopped 40 shots, robbing North Dakota attackers at point-blank range numerous times.

Rebounds, unlike Friday night, were at a premium. The 6-foot-2, 203-pound Meyers came out, challenged the attackers and either caught the shot with his chest or glove or smothered any second effort that was rarely given.

"The goaltending was superb tonight," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "Just like we ran into a superb goaltender [Friday night], [North Dakota] ran into one [Saturday]."

Meyers, who was a surprise starter in net Friday, was said to have started because Paul Dainton was out indefinitely with an injury.

Meyers, though, wasn't the only one to improve their

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the weekend began, the Massachusetts field hockey team was the only ranked team in the Atlantic 10 conference. With a 3-1 win at Richmond and a 5-0 shutout at home against Saint Louis, the Minutewomen showed why they deserve the national attention they've been receiving.

UMass (10-3, 2-0 A-10) was the heavy favorite in both games for the second straight weekend as neither the Spiders (3-9, 0-1 A-10) nor the Billikens (4-7, 0-1 A-10) have found success early this season.

Despite their slow start, Richmond posed a potent threat to UMass coach Justine Sowry and her team.

"It was a difficult game, they threw a lot of things at us that we struggled with," Sowry said. "But on the pleasing side, we scored three really outstanding goals. They didn't get on the scoreboard much but they gave our defense a lot of difficulty."

The Minutewomen scored first with a goal by Katelyn Orlando about five minutes into the game. Orlando, who had two goals in the game and another against Saint Louis, scored on a breakaway that was assisted by sophomore Katie Kelly. Orlando's three-goal weekend gives her nine on the season and seven in the past five games.

Richmond changed goalies during halftime as senior Becca Weaver came in to replace junior Jacki Raithel. Despite the switch, it was more of the same for the Maroon and White in the second half. Kelly and Orlando scored early goals to put UMass up 3-0 just under four minutes into the second half.

Richmond responded with a goal when freshman Katelin Peterson's deep pass was tipped in by junior Megan Thompson. The Spiders didn't score again though, since the UMass defense stood up to late offensive pressure by Richmond.

The defense continued its success in UMass' shutout win over Saint Louis, as the Minutewomen smothered the Billiken offense. Saint Louis produced eight shots in the game and five corners. The Minutewomen, meanwhile, accumulated 23 shots and doubled their opponents corner plays with 10.

Sowry, however, was still disappointed with the opportunities her defense was giving the other team, especially on corner plays.

"Our corner defense is a really solid unit. We defend corners well," Sowry said. "What I'm disappointed in is that we give up too many corners and that's really got a lot to with our organization and structure before anyone even comes down there."

Meanwhile, the UMass offense was explosive throughout the entire

Minutewomen beat Dayton

First victory against Flyers in nine tries

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKG

The next time Dayton faces the Massachusetts women's soccer team, it may want to re-think things.

"They were expecting us to lose," UMass coach Jim Rudy said after Sunday's game between the conference rivals. "I told our team before the game that their point of view is 'We're Dayton and they're UMass' and they've always been that way."

And for the past nine seasons it's been precisely that way – as the Flyers have utterly dominated eight consecutive meetings, outscoring UMass 18-4 in the process.

But for the first time since 1998, the Flyers (9-4-1, 3-1-1 Atlantic 10) walked away from the rivalry without a victory, as the Minutewomen (6-4-3, 3-2-1 A-10) stunned the Flyers, 1-0, at Rudd Field on a goal by Vanessa Lima early in the first half.

"It's a good moment for them and it's a good moment for me and my career," Rudy said. "I'm just so happy for them and I'm so appreciative. That was certainly remarkable that we could play with a team with that ability level."

Dayton's impressive offensive attack took just 14 seconds to show, as the Flyers had a good scoring opportunity early. They continued to show that ability in the early going, consistently pressuring the UMass defense.

They were more than up for it.

Led by goalkeeper Lauren Luckey and senior defenders Melissa Toulouse and Tina Rodriguez, the defense blocked and saved shots from all corners and all directions, noticeably frustrating Dayton players and coaches.

That frustration turned up when Lima put UMass ahead 20 minutes into the half. Therese Smith's corner kick went directly to Rodriguez, who attempted to head the ball in. But the ball ricocheted to Lima, who spun and kicked the ball past UD goalkeeper Deana Waintraub.

"I honestly didn't know that it went in until one of my teammates tackled me and I looked back at the net and saw the ball," Lima said. "I can remember just seeing Tina going for the header – I thought she was going to score on it – but it dropped right in front of me so I figured I'd turn and kick."

The goal came on UMass' first shot of the game. Dayton already had six.

The Flyers continued with the shots all afternoon, outshooting the Minutewomen 19-7. UMass finished with just one shot on net the entire game, as Waintraub made no saves.

Sisters to hold vigil

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Alpha Chi Omega sorority aims to illuminate UMass students' awareness of domestic violence. The sorority will be holding its annual candlelight vigil called the Luminary Project, on Oct. 22 at 7p.m. The vigil will be held on the W.E.B. Dubois Library lawn.

From Oct. 14 until Oct. 22, the sisters will man a booth in the campus center where the public is asked to donate money in support of victims of domestic violence. Alpha Chi Omega will sell bags containing tea-candles that can be used during the vigil for $1. The sisters encourage people to buy these bags and decorate them for the vigil. As they have been for the past five years, the sorority intends to split the donations between shelters, including UMass' Every Woman's Center. Depending on the shelter, some of the proceeds may go towards aiding in giving battered families food, shelter or professional counseling to deal with their individual situations.

During the vigil, co-coordinator of the Luminary Project, Alpha Chi Omega sister Emily Green, a UMass junior majoring in sociology, will deliver a speech about the challenges facing domestic violence victims today.

Campus organizations work on deadline to get out the vote

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The five-campus University of Massachusetts System hopes to register 8,000 students to vote in the upcoming presidential election by today's deadline.

At UMass Amherst, several groups are making a final push to reach the specific campus' goal of registering 5,000 students.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG), University Democrats, and Cannabis Reform Coalition have combined to register 1,500 students as of Tuesday night with a goal of 3,000 by the end of today, said Tracie Konopski, MASSPIRG campus organizer.

The Student Government Association had registered 900 students as of last night and hopes to total 1,200 by the deadline, said SGA president Malcolm Chu. The SGA also distributed 300 absentee ballots.

"We've been registering a lot of freshmen and students who weren't registered two years ago," said Yasmin Abbyad, vice chair of MASSPIRG. "We will definitely get close to our goal."

MASSPIRG will continue to hand out voter registration cards today across campus, especially at bus stops along North Pleasant Street. Members can be spotted wearing bright yellow t-shirts displaying the web address www.studentvote.org, where students can register online, said Abbyad.

The SGA has been visiting classrooms and lecture halls to hand out registration cards, provide information and answer students' questions, said Chu.

The University Democrats have also been visited classrooms where they were invited, said club president Emma Einhorn. The group has registered about 550 students and handed out over 600 absentee ballots, she said.

"We are not just focused on getting students registered, we want to give students the opportunity to vote," said Einhorn.

MASSPIRG, the SGA and UMass Democrats plan to organize a busing service to bring students from campus to several polling stations in Amherst so they can vote on November 4. Unlike past elections, there will not be a place for students to vote on campus this year. Instead, students will be directed to one of three locations based on where they live on campus.

The New Voters Project, a non-partisan effort to register young people and get them to the polls on Election Day, has focused on "dorm storms," or knocking on doors in residence halls and reminding students to register, said Katie Perry, the project's campaign coordinator.

The project registers students on college campuses across the U.S and plan to register about 25,000 in New England.

The group recognizes some students have already registered on their own, but others may need some help.

"We want to be there as a resource for students who do not have a connection on how to register to vote," said Perry.

The Cannabis Reform Coalition, Center for Education Policy Advocacy, UMass Labor Coalition, Civic Initiative, and the Women of Color Leadership Network are also among those encouraging students to register.

Some professors who did not have class on Tuesday due to the Monday schedule were asked to e-mail their students the link to a website with information on how to register, Perry said.

"It has definitely been a group effort," said Abbyad.

Beyond the support from numerous groups around campus, students are being motivated to register for other reasons.

For students from Massachusetts, ballot questions like the call to repeal the state income tax and the issue of decriminalizing marijuana have increased student interest to register for this election, said Perry.

"There are definitely things that are grabbing students' attention," she said, because the issues affect higher public education and people's lifestyle directly.

The groups hope today's last-minute efforts will help them reach their goals for student registration.

"When people are told there is a deadline they are much more responsive," said Perry.

After today's deadline the New Voters Project will start another campaign urging students to get out and vote on Election Day.

Students who filled out registration cards on campus were asked to provide their name and phone number through like the New Voters Project. UMass Democrats and MASSPIRG have said they will call students to remind them to vote and inform them of their polling location.

They will also follow up with students who are using absentee ballots to make sure the students received and submitted their ballot correctly, said Einhorn.

Students can also sign up for an e-mail or text message reminder to be sent on Election Day.

State voter registrations must be postmarked no later than 5 p.m. on October 15. Online registration is also available at www.studentvote.org.

Economist Pollin headlines UMass faculty lecture series

BY SHALINI JAYARAMA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The distinguished faculty lecture series kicks off Oct. 20 and features Robert N. Pollin, a professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts since 1998.

A tradition beginning in the mid-1970s, every year faculty and staff nominate professors of their choice to receive the honor of a distinguished faculty member for their academic achievement, and after a board of judges chooses four winners, each honorary gives a speech to the students, faculty, and staff of UMass on his or her research.

Past series have featured professors from a variety of fields of study, including Madeleine Helena Blais, a Pulitzer Prize-winning journalism professor honored in 2001, and H. Martin Wobst, a professor honored last year, who lectured about his archaeological research.

Robert N. Pollin is first of the winners to present his research, "How Green Growth Can Revive the Economy," this coming Monday. In addition to founding and co-directing the Political Economy Research Institute, Pollin has published research on ways a green economy could benefit the American public.

His report "Job Opportunities for the Green Economy," published in June 2008, discusses the various types of jobs that would be created, the extent of employment provided and the average wage of each green job worker specifically in twelve U.S. states if certain strategies were used to combat global warming. Another report on "Green Recovery," also published in 2008, explores the provisions of a $100 billion short-term agenda to combat the energy crisis and global warming, including the reduction of unemployment in the U.S. by 1.3 percent (calculations based on 2008 U.S. labor market conditions).

His credentials also include working with the United Nations throughout his career to improve employment and poverty situations in third-world regions such as sub-Saharan Africa.

Professor of Economics Robert N. Pollin will be the first to speak in the Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series.

"[This is] really an honor," Pollin said of the distinction. "[I am] excited to be able share my research [with] the community."

The other honoraries include Rafael A. Fissore, professor of Veterinary and Animal Sciences; Weibo Gong, professor of Electrical and Computer Engineering; and Sally I. Powers, professor of psychology, who will be presenting their research on December 9, February 23, and April 27, respectively.

Each lecture will begin at 4:00 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center and is free and open to the public.

Fall River woman dies on way to watch Lipizzaner Stallions

According Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald, spokesman for the University of Massachusetts Police Department, a 79-year-old woman died on Sunday Oct. 12 after requesting medical attention at the Mullins Center.

Archbald said Lee V. Correa of Fall River, Mass. was at the University to attend Sunday's Lipizzaner Stallions show. The call came from the handicapped section of the Mullins Center parking lot at 4:06 p.m. UMPD officers made efforts to resuscitate Correa which included the use of an automated external defibrillator. Correa was transported by the Amherst Fire Department to Cooley Dickenson Hospital where she was pronounced dead.

Collins named as chancellor

EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees appointed a new chancellor at Worcester's UMass Medical School last month.

The board unanimously selected Collins, based in part on the recommendation of President Jack Wilson.

"Michael Collins is committed to students, committed to success and excellence in research, and is strongly committed to our public service mission," Wilson said. "He is tireless, he is creative, and he is a man of outstanding character."

Collins had been serving as interim chancellor of the school since June 2007 and was previously part of the UMass system as the chancellor at UMass Boston. Prior to his work in the UMass system, Collins was president and CEO of Caritas Christi Health Care System for a decade.

"His experience both as a hospital administrator and then in higher education made him a good candidate for the position," said Robert Connelly, spokesman for the UMass president's office.

Collins graduated from the College of the Holy Cross in 1975 and from Tufts University School of Medicine in 1981. He is a physician of internal medicine and has held a number of positions in education at Texas Tech University Health Sciences Center and at Tufts University, where he was both a professor and dean at each school. Collins is also a Fellow of the American College of Physicians.

"He has a real vision for the school becoming a true global research center," said Connelly.

Collins was chosen out of a pool of over 100 potential candidates and was recommended by the UMass Medical School Chancellor Search Committee, who spent six months searching for a new chancellor.

The previous chancellor of the medical school, Aaron Lazare, stepped down last year due to health problems.

Syracuse students protest Columbus Day

BY SHAYNA MILLER
DAILY ORANGE (SYRACUSE)

Regina Jones was 19 years old when a woman on the bus she was riding walked up to her, raised her hand to her mouth and mocked the clichéd Native American call.

"I forgot about it for years, and I blocked it from my mind," Jones said. "It was hurtful. And I can't believe she did that to me. Why would she do that to me?"

It's been 35 years since that bus ride.

Jones, a member of the Oneida nation, joined more than 50 Syracuse University students on the Quad Monday for a demonstration against Columbus Day.

Now an assistant director of Syracuse's Office of Multicultural Affairs and leader of the school's Native Student Program, Jones helped coordinate Monday's event so Syracuse's Native American students might not have to endure the prejudices she suffered when she was their age.

The demonstration, which included singing, dancing and handing out informational fliers, aimed to educate bystanders about Native American culture and the problems Christopher Columbus' founding of America caused for native nations, Jones said.

"People don't even understand that the history of colonialism has changed indigenous people forever," she said. "And these hurts perpetuate through all of our generations. Our people still deal with biases and prejudices, and I think people still believe we should just adopt the white way of life."

The event involved people from all cultures affected by colonialism, Jones said. Participants came from groups such as the Native American Students at Syracuse, the Indigenous Law Students Association and La I.U.C.H.A., a Latino student organization. They wore purple T-shirts for the color of the Hiawatha belt, a representation of Upstate New York's six native nations.

Jones said she's happy Syracuse doesn't cancel classes in honor of Columbus Day, and that it shows respect for the history of Native American nations, specifically Syracuse's Onondaga Nation.

For students like Daniel Loran, a member of the Mohawk Nation and a senior retail management major, Monday's event served to connect students to their native cultures. Loran's mother is white and his father is Native American, and he said that makes for a complicated self-identity.

"It affected the way that I learned my culture," he said. "I'm not as deep-rooted in it as a lot of my friends, who have two parents who share the same culture. This is definitely about identity and preserving our culture. It's really important for everyone to know where they're from."

Ivy ROTC programs debated

BY VERA BERGENGRUEN
THE DARTMOUTH (DARTMOUTH COLLEGE)

In the most recent incarnation of a controversy that has reappeared in various forms since the Vietnam War, advocacy groups continue their battle to reinstate the Reserve Officers Training Corps at the multiple Ivy League institutions where they are currently banned. Recent years have seen opponents of the ROTC raise objections on the grounds that the program, through its ties to the U.S. Armed Forces, legitimizes the military's policies regarding homosexuality.

The issue of the ban was most recently raised by presidential candidates Senator John McCain and Senator Barack Obama in speeches at Columbia University last month. Both candidates agreed that Columbia is making a mistake by banning the ROTC from its campus.

"I don't think that's right," McCain said. "Shouldn't the students here be exposed to the attractiveness of serving in the military, particularly as an officer?"

Obama agreed, saying that, some students disagreement with military policy should not preclude others who wish to participate in ROTC programs from doing so.

"The notion that young people here at Columbia or anywhere, in any university, aren't offered the choice, the option of participating in military service, I think is a mistake," Obama said.

According to the Wall Street Journal, audience members booed in disagreement.

The ROTC program, which was once common at most colleges and universities across the country, has met renewed opposition in Ivy League institutions.

At Harvard, for example, around 25 percent of the students in the mid-1960s served in the military through the ROTC, according to Paul Mawn, a 1963 Harvard graduate and chairman of the Harvard Advocates for ROTC. The numbers were higher in the preceding decades – during the Korean War, around 60 percent of students served in the program, and participation was as high as 80 percent during World War II, Mawn said.

The ROTC is a 140-year-old military officer-commissioning program that prepares college students to enter military service. The program includes the study of ethics and military history, physical fitness training and provides full scholarships for students who are contracting with the ROTC.

In the 1960s, most Ivy League campuses banned the ROTC due to protests by students and faculty who objected to a program that, in their opinion, brought the military onto campuses and into the curriculum.

Today Dartmouth, Cornell University, Princeton University and the University of Pennsylvania operate ROTC programs on their campuses. Students at the other four Ivy League institutions have the option of participating in the ROTC through other nearby universities.

Campus opposition to the ROTC in more recent years has been centered on the U.S. military's "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy, which prohibits any homosexual or bisexual person from disclosing his or her sexual orientation while serving.

Advocates of the ROTC's return to college campuses say that future military officers should not be punished for a statute that originated in Congress and not in the military itself.

Sean Wilkes, a 2006 Columbia graduate and chairman of Columbia Advocates for ROTC, said that ROTC is completely unrelated to the DADT policy.

"I absolutely agree that DADT is discriminatory and that it challenges both the policies and the social norms of Ivy League universities," Wilkes said. "But DADT is not simply a policy that the military decided one day to enact on its own accord."

David Bookstaber, a 1999 graduate of Yale University who attended the university on an ROTC scholarship, said that opposition to ROTC has been ongoing since the 1960s but has manifested itself in different ways over the years.

"In my opinion, banning the ROTC at the Ivies has just been a tool of academic politics," Bookstaber said. "The liberal majority [of the faculty at certain Ivy League schools] has despised the U.S. military since Vietnam, and the rationale for ongoing opposition has changed over the years. The Clinton administration gave them a new excuse for opposing the ROTC by passing the DADT law."

us everyday," said Green. "I really want to get across that people need to know what the signs of domestic violence are because some people may think that how their boyfriends or girlfriends are acting is normal. But if they are being abused, they have to understand that it's not normal. They have to understand that it is okay to get help."

According to the American Bar Association, approximately 13 million women and 835,000 men are physically assaulted by an intimate partner annually in the United States.

In addition to Green's speech, other sisters will read poems and stories written about or by domestic violence victims. Also, a few victims of domestic violence will share their personal stories.

"Last year was the first time I had seen the event take place," said co-coordinator Tricia Allen, a senior art history major. "I've known people who have gone through really hard times suffering from domestic violence. Most of the signs I've seen with [female] victims are they are really withdrawn and defensive. They usually are very quiet, reserved and lack self-confidence. It's awful that [domestic violence] can change someone. It's similar to the effects of depression or eating disorders. It's just really touching to hear of people's experiences. There are so many people around us suffering, and we don't even know that this is happening to them."

Last year, Alpha Chi Omega raised over $200 and donated to several shelters.

"Hearing the stories and poems that our sisters read totally sticks with me," said Green. "They make me realize that domestic violence is a very important and serious issue that people just don't think about as much as they should."

Technology gone bad

Katherine Marr

Flashback to my calculus days. I had just begun an exam and, since math isn't my forte, I was double-checking every step with my calculator.

I entered '11 – 3' and hit '='. I'm no mathematician, but even I saw a red flag when the glowing answer on the screen was "3." I reentered the equation and received the same answer. I thought the answer was "8," but the calculator told me '3,' and how could the calculator be wrong? There I sat, seriously perplexed, not considering that the calculator screen had broken so that half of '8' was missing (hence the '3'), but instead wondering if I was suffering from some type of mental blockage.

For the record, I ignored the defective calculator, the piece of junk that it was. But some people let technology trump common sense in far more life-threatening situations than failing a math test.

Global Positioning Systems have gotten a few media headlines over the past year. Drivers obey their presumably infallible GPS, even when all signs are pointing in a different direction, literally. You miss a road and GPS demands a U-turn to get back on track, you obey, because naturally GPS knows it's safe to do a 180 around a five-street intersection with no traffic lights. GPS tells you to drive in the wrong direction down a one-way street; you comply, because those "One-Way" and "Do Not Enter" signs must be outdated compared to your high-tech GPS. Yet, if your friend in the passenger seat told you to turn onto a one-way road, you'd reply, "No way, it's one-way," without a second thought. But for some reason, it's a different story when the automated voice from your GPS is spouting directions.

This past September, technological compliance was taken to the extreme when a New York man drove his car onto train tracks per the instructions of his GPS. Luckily, he was a safe distance away when an oncoming train collided with his stranded vehicle. If this seems like an isolated incident, I should mention that the exact same thing happened last January. Apparently, railroad crossing signs, lights and gates were not enough to deter some people from staying true to their GPS. The New Yorker who drove his car onto the tracks simply explained that he "did what he was told," to which a railroad spokesperson aptly responded, "If the GPS told you to drive off a cliff, would you drive off a cliff?"

Although it's all well and good that machines provide a check for human error, often there isn't equal reciprocation.

Beyond the roads, technological advances have contributed to another new host of problems in hospitals and pharmacies. For example, computerized physician order-entry (CPOE) systems are growing increasingly popular. In theory, these machines remove doctors' notoriously bad penmanship from the equation, and cut down on other human error, such as failure to take into account current medications when prescribing a new drug, or overlooking an allergy. Computerized systems scan for these potential problems in a matter of seconds, thus preventing serious complications.

Although it's all well and good that machines provide a check for human error, often there isn't equal reciprocation in terms of people correcting technological error. If these relatively new systems fail to integrate data correctly, or if medical professionals are unaccustomed to computerized procedures, mistakes inevitably ensue. Errors that might have been met with skepticism on a handwritten slip aren't even questioned because of a blind faith in technology. When pharmacists are thinking one thing and the computer is flashing something else, human inclination is frequently toward that omniscient computer.

A classic example dates back to the late 1980s, when the Therac-25, a computerized radiation therapy machine, administered dangerously large overdoses to patients. Although several factors contributed to the dosage error and continued usage of the machine, the onus was on the machine's software and manufacturing. But those responsible for managing the machine and resolving safety issues may have harbored such overconfidence in its abilities that the problem wasn't resolved until significant harm had been done.

We are constantly disregarding our commonsense and looking to technology as the voice of authority. In fact, if I paid any attention to how Microsoft Word is currently advising me with its pesky green and red underlining, this column would be a grammatical disaster. Even though its suggestions are frequently the antithesis of grammatically correct and refute everything our sixth grade language arts teachers drilled into our heads, we have a hard time hitting 'Ignore' when Microsoft Word is defining subject-verb agreement.

There are a million times a day when you should place your trust in technology, but at the same time, you need to remain skeptical, and if necessary, hit that mental "Ignore" button. Otherwise you might take off on a road trip that reaches an abrupt end when your car is flattened, courtesy of Amtrak and your GPS.

Two parties, two ideas, nothing done

Adam McGillen

Much more divides this country than a few arbitrary aisles in Congress. Yet the two party system in place here in America has skewed Americans' perspectives to black and white, left and right, with no room left for intellectual growth or innovation.

It's as if every American falls neatly into 'Republican' or 'Democrat,' born and wrapped into a red blanket or a blue blanket, with no other options, with no real individuality.

In the midst of a ideological war, this War on Terror, Americans turn their eyes from the ideological battle that must be fought at home. Neither one of the candidates offered to us this election season is going to miraculously save this country. The system itself is broken, and no product of that system can save it.

You can see it in your fellow students. On October 7th, I was reading an article in The Daily Collegian about students registering to vote. I came across a telling and all too horrifying quote from Dan Reilly, a Republican at Providence College. He said that the College Republicans on his campus were not extensively pursuing voter registration because "generally getting people registered doesn't help our party."

There is nothing more American than casting a ballot. No one can truly consider themselves a citizen until they have participated in democracy at its most basic level. Registering voters is an act of heroism. It brings Americans out of their deeply rooted apathy and shows them how they can make a difference and help save their imperiled country. To discourage the registration of voters because it hurts your party amounts to treason: serving your party at the expense of your country.

In a perfect democracy, everybody would vote. If so many voters hurt your party then it is not the number of voters that needs to be changed, it is the party.

So many politicians, especially those running for president, serve their parties before their people. They cling to their conservative or liberal ideology unflinchingly. Do not let the talk of aisle-crossing fool you. It only amounts to a bi-partisan race, tailoring up which party crossed the aisle more. Even the politics of non-partisanship has become a partisan politics.

Treason: serving your party at the expense of your country.

All the while, the American people sit across the street, waiting for someone to finally shed that party comfort blanket and step across the enormous chasm that divides our government from the people it purports to represent.

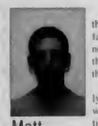
As evolution shows, adopting an ideology is the single-most counterintuitive thing a person can do. If you adopt an ideology that places your entire economy in God's trust, you may find it hard to hold God accountable for massive economic losses. Adopt an ideology where torture is acceptable to gather information, and you will be thankful you are ignorant if the enemy catches you, because it is only fair within your ideology that they torture you for information.

Clinging to an ideology seals the mind up and inhibits intuitions from flexing their creative and powerful muscles. When you commit your mind to an ideology, no matter what question comes your way, you try to apply a singular answer to it. When you use a Phillips head screwdriver on a flat-head screw, you only end up screwing yourself.

Grab onto the light of some mighty ideology too tightly, and you will merely become its shadow. It only amounts to a bi-partisan race, tailoring up which party crossed the aisle more. Even the politics of non-partisanship has become a partisan politics.

This election, as always, we are left with two men chosen by their parties. They promise change and a maverick approach to dismantling the corruption in Washington. Yet this empty rhetoric holds only more corruption as we are all well aware that both parties have led America to this precarious place, and whoever wins will certainly conduct much of their business across that aisle.

As a nation we need to adapt to the perils of our time. Yes, we pursue answers to global warming and terrorist threats, but all the while, the framework of our government crumbles from its lack of cognitive diversity. The problems we face today are new and complex, and both left or right in our government do not have the capacity to deliver the new and complex answers we need.



Vote McCain. Vote Obama. It's ironic that in a campaign centered on making change, the American people have only the same tired question to answer: Republican or Democrat? Unfortunately, neither will do the job done.

Putting some punch behind the insanity plea

Matt Kushi

Anyone that follows politics in the United States knows that this fall has been heavy on political news. As of the past few weeks, the issue on the forefront has been the bailout.

While this issue has been analyzed in almost every imaginable way, another piece of legislation was passed by the Senate on October 1, and was able to float under the radar. This was the article put forward, to the President, by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-MA), Sen. Peter Domenici (R-NM), and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-VT), titled "Mentally Ill Offender Treatment and Crime Reduction Reauthorization Act S.2304."

What this bill covers is $50 million in grants to local and state governments to create and expand treatment programs and mental health courts to aid criminal offenders that may have a mental health disorder. What the President now must do is sign off on this seemingly small, but very important piece of legislation.

For too many years, people that have mental health disorders have been filed into criminal logs and cases for crimes that they may have not had the capacity of truly understanding. This bill is what needs to be done to correct this problem. While it may seem fair to those looking in from the outside to see a criminal tried and found guilty, to those on the inside it is a gross injustice. Here in America, we are in the land of hope and opportunity. Who are we to strip that hope and opportunity from those that need it most?

While this is a tough issue – due to the fact that there is so much gray – we must look at this issue from a moral perspective. Is it fair that people can be charged with crimes that they may not have the capability of understanding? There are some cases in which an individual, no matter whether they have a mental health disorder or not, should be kept locked up. One only has to look at Charles Manson for such a case.

Let us help people through their problems instead of locking them up so that we don't have to deal with them.

As easy as it is to argue this matter both ways, I have to believe that you cannot hold a person up to the normal standards of the law if they have a mental health disorder. In the United States' legal system, we find murderers and robbers to be innocent of a charge with the plea of insanity. Therefore, the same must be true of those who suffer from a mental health disorder that hinders their thought processes.

There can be many causes for a mental health disorder. Two specific causes that I will outline are a result of a biological defect or a psychological or mental health disorder brought on as a result of the way that an individual was brought up.

Take the latter. Say a kid grows up in a fractured home. Maybe somebody he knows is a drug-addict or alcoholic. As a kid, you are heavily influenced by those around you and this kid may pick up some of these bad habits. As this person grows, the only life that they may know is their addiction and the little.

If and when that kid grows up to be 30, he or she finds him- or herself in trouble and ends up in jail. Maybe this kid was psychologically and mentally scarred from growing up in this manner.

At this kid grows up, may be he or she finds an outlet. It is around this point. While it is less time he or she committing crimes, and throwing him- or herself into the system. While there must be some form of punishment, it should also be supported that this person needs help in some form – not to a committee. That was instead of having an offender blindly locked up for the release and watching him or her, as society does, who knows what he or she will do and get back to work and his or her life as an effective member. This approach is the best option we have to correctly correct by the way that we treat the mentally ill. If we can only be treated by jail, we are going to continue to see these people through the criminal justice system like any other common criminal.

It a person has a mental health disorder like depression, the answer is not to lock them up as another criminal who wants to hurt people. We are brought up being taught to help each other through the good and the bad. If we help people through their problems instead of locking them up so that we don't have to deal with them. Ignorance can only be bliss for so long, before it comes back and hurts you.

We need to be here for people. They are no different than we are aside from the fact that they must overcome a few more obstacles than we do. With this bill, our Government is stepping in the right direction of making sure that we treat all human beings as equals.

Humans, Zombies rise again – again

BY ANDREW SHERIDAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you're reading this, you've probably already witnessed the zombie outbreak.

Students, red bandanas wrapped around their arms, roaming the streets with Nerf guns in their hands.

Packs of humans, armed to the teeth with marshmallows and socks, banding together for safety.

You may have not seen their counterparts, clad in red headbands, but as they grow in numbers, they will surely catch your eye.

For those who are perplexed or confused by this strange and sudden behavior, welcome to the Plague: the world of Humans versus Zombies.

HvZ is essentially the world's largest game of tag, and it is sweeping the country. It is played on more than 30 college campuses across the United States, and has been featured in national newspapers, magazines, and even "The Colbert Report."

In simple terms, the goal of the zombie team is to tag humans – thus converting them to zombies – and the goal of the human team is to survive until the end of the game.

Although vulnerable, humans are not utterly defenseless. Nerf-style projectiles, balled-up socks, and marshmallows are fired at a zombie, thus "stunning" them for five minutes and giving the humans time to escape.

As HvZ has no central governing body, specific rules vary from school to school. Each game is run entirely by students, who modify the specifics to fit their needs.

Here at UMass, the game begins with five zombies, one from each of the major residential living areas.

Their numbers invariably swell, and life suddenly becomes tricky for the remaining humans.

"Tricky" is the key word as the game itself never stops. Dormitories, dining commons, and campus buildings are safety zones where one cannot be tagged, but there is no time limit the teams must adhere to.

For the duration of the game, the UMass campus is a perpetual battlefield. Players are chased, DCs are sacked, and ambushes are set up around every corner.

Whoever chooses to play must be prepared to be hunted in addition to sneaking.

See HVZ on page 6

The popular campus-wide game Humans vs Zombies will return to UMass today. Nerf guns and bandanas are just a few of the accessories that will be seen all over campus.

UMass undergrad crafts comedic musical

BY BRITTAINY BELL DAUPHOND
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Walking the underground tunnels of the University of Massachusetts, don't be surprised if you suddenly feel like you're in the middle of its own rendition of "High School Musical."

It's not Disney. It's "Wide Open Eyes," a movie-musical written by sophomore Jamie Maletz.

The musical, which Maletz wrote as a sophomore in high school, is a comedic story of an evil ghost, Jeric, played by Adam Miller.

Jeric lives underground and is trying to find a way to raise the dead. The catch here is that his test subjects must be human.

"Wide Open Eyes" follows four unlucky people who get mixed up in the mayhem, as well as two helpful ghosts named Luna and Luce, both of which are products of Jeric's failed experiments and are eager for revenge on Jeric.

The musical is "silly and entertaining and not in any way to be taken even the slightest bit seriously," said Maletz.

In fact, in conjunction with the singing and cameras around, don't be astonished to see a few people in fairy wings or horns.

From ghosts to "Furies," costumes are expected to be otherworldly.

Although such costumes won't seem out of place during the month of October, come November and December, they may especially catch your eye.

Maletz would like to keep the film at UMass.

As well as having a cast and crew of UMass students, Maletz hopes to film the musical all around the campus.

"The campus will be perfect," she said. "We're hoping to get permission to film in some of the laboratories and the underground tunnels."

After years of working on this musical, Maletz has a lot of faith in it.

"As you go on, you make changes, so this script is long standing ... everyone who has read the script has really liked it and had nothing but good things to say about it. I'm usually self-conscious about my work but I have some confidence in this one," she said.

Casting was a cinch for Maletz and co-producer Emily Fanty.

"We were able to find exactly what we need. Everyone is just really great. I'm really pleased with the cast. It couldn't have been better people; they fit the characters so well," said Maletz.

Sherry Ng, who plays unlucky kid, Cricket, "a quirky, firm-believer in all things supernatural," mirrors Maletz' faith and excitement for the film.

"I think the musical's really cool. Jamie did a really good job with the music and story and the cast is awesome. I can't wait to really start working on it," said Ng.

Maletz has begun staging the film, which is moving along quickly. Pictures of the staging

'Blindness' fails under critical eye

New picture mirrors zombie-film plot, suffers from lack of humility

BY SHAYNA MILROD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A sea of milky white nothingness engulfs the vision of those afflicted with the white sickness – the epidemic of choice in Fernando Meirelles' film, "Blindness." Based on the 1995 novel by Nobel laureate Jose Saramango, "Blindness" is a dossier tale steeped in allegory and human suffering.

Meirelles ("City of God") casts a pale hue over the screen, akin to the white block settled over the sight of the afflicted. The film opens with urgency – while pausing for a red light, a Japanese man (Yusuke Iseya) suddenly loses his sight. Car horns sound as people hurl curses in his direction.

He fumbles in his seat, unsure what has happened. The audience fumbles in their seats, too. No one quite knows what's going on, but the riveting nature of the sudden plunge keeps the audience in a spell of suspense.

Sadly, once Meirelles establishes the central premise, "Blindness" loses its bearings, becoming a thriller devoted more to the grim depiction of decaying humanity than to humanity itself. The film chronicles the mysterious epidemic as it sweeps through an unnamed city, bringing residents to a state of desperation as they struggle to adjust to a life without sight.

Julianne Moore stars as a woman inexplicably immune to the sickness. Her optometrist husband (Mark Ruffalo) is struck by the sickness early, forcing her to feign blindness in order to stay by his side.

While a Hollywood powerhouse with such juggernauts as "The Hours" and "Boogie Nights" on her resume, Moore has lent her talents to many a waterlogged thriller, like "The Forgotten" and "Freedomland." This is one actress with a hit or miss arm for screenplays, as her presence here indicates.

Moore bears witness to the horrors that unfold inside the quarantine facility where the blind are quickly transported.

She's joined by a motley group of unnamed secondary characters. They include an escort (Alice Braga) who goes blind while servicing a customer, a bartender (Gael Garcia Bernal) who is later declared king, a man with an eye patch (Danny Glover) and a car thief (Don McKellar, also screenwriter).

A mouthpiece for the government soothes the group initially with reassurances that they'll be well cared for. These reassurances later give way to urges that the blind form communities, elect representatives and carefully ration out their meager food supplies. This seems like a bizarre suggestion.

When, in hospital-quarantine situations, have patients ever been asked to form committees?

Western delivers beautiful cinematics, artful direction

Ed Harris serves as both actor and director in "Appaloosa." The film is his first directorial effort since 2000's "Pollack."

BY PETER RIZZO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Appaloosa" opens like most westerns do, with an old-fashioned shoot out and a quick set of killings.

This sets up the plot, which finds this contemporary western straying far from the over-indulgent westerns of the past.

Unlike last year's epic shoot-em-up, "3:10 to Yuma," "Appaloosa" makes its action quick and brutal with a heavy side of introspection, and what unfolds is a delicately acted character piece.

The action takes place in the well-developed psychological battles and strategic positioning between characters. And the brief but violent skirmishes that interrupt the film are framed as acts of bravado from cowboys who never find themselves on one side of the law.

Working off the Robert B. Parker novel of the same name, Ed Harris takes on directorial duties for the first time since helming 2000's biographical "Pollack." Harris shows the temperament of a great filmmaker making gold out of the wafer thin plotline through strong character development, with the help of unexpected turns by a well-chosen cast of actors.

"Appaloosa" gets its name from the small town with the same name. It's a classic western town complete with quaint store fronts and peppered with small town businessmen, each on the side of their own interests. But the centerpiece of the narrative is the relationship between two self-styled lawmen and old friends, Virgil Cole (Ed Harris) and Everett Hitch (Viggo Mortensen), who blow through town to take out a gang of troublemakers led by Randall Bragg (Jeremy Irons).

This relationship showcases the movie's key strength which is the ability to craft well-defined relationships with sparse dialogue and little back story. What can be derived is that Virgil and Everett have been at this job a long time. Their relationship is oftentimes symbiotic with Virgil, acting as the blunt, tough-talker who needs his sentences finished by the eloquent if soft-spoken Everett, who is often waiting in the background with a shotgun should trouble rear its head.

This relationship turns abruptly when Ally French (Renee Zellwegger), a lonely widow, rolls into town with only a dollar to her name. Within a few days time, Ally manages a home with a white picket fence on the edge of town with Virgil as well as some not so subtle advances on his best man Everett.

Zellwegger's Ally is not your archetypical western female. Here she plays the part of the lonely

Television shows poking fun at contemporary cubicle life

NBC's "The Office" is the latest in a long line of comedies to expose the humor behind mundane daily labor.

BY PATRICK S. PEMBERTON
MCCLATCY NEWSPAPERS

There's a reason why people buy red staplers, Dwight Schrute bobbleheads and stuffed Dilberts: It's because many Americans are disenchanted with their jobs, and those items – pop culture icons that symbolize the worst in office culture – affirm that others view the workplace with the same disregard.

"I think it helps people to know they are not alone in their frustrations," said Scott Adams, who created his "Dilbert" comic strip nearly two decades ago.

In a sense, then, pop culture has become therapeutic for the disheartened American worker. And while many books (think anything by Kafka) and movies ("Fight Club") have dealt with jobs that can suck the life out of their employees, three sources have stood out as the ultimate symbols for everything wrong about the office: "Dilbert" the movie "Office Space", and the TV show "The Office," whose fifth season premiered Sept. 25.

"Dilbert," of course, started it all. In 1989, Adams debuted his strip about an engineer who deals daily with the frustrations of his workplace. It was a huge success, prompting readers to buy stuffed dolls, calendars and books.

"People like to see me mock the things they can't mock themselves without losing their job," Adams said in an e-mail interview. "I am sort of a surrogate voice for them."

"Office Space," a cult favorite from 1999, features a trio of software employees trying to fight back against impending layoffs and a numbing office environment.

As film critic Roger Ebert wrote, the movie is about work that crushes the spirit: "Office cubicles are cells, supervisors are the wardens, and modern management theory is skewed to employ as many managers and as few workers as possible."

That "The Office" started out as a British TV show suggests that the view of the office as a dysfunctional family is not merely an American perception. The U. S. version of this sitcom takes place in a Pennsylvania paper company, where workers confront the boss's boneheaded decisions – and the awkward scenarios they foster – on a daily basis.

As bad as popular culture makes it seem, though, the American office really isn't so horrible, said John Gannon, a Pismo Beach, Calif., psychologist who often deals with work issues.

"Ninety percent of American business is doing what you need to do every day, and it's working pretty well," he said.

Still, he added, when people talk about their jobs the worst normally comes out, offering a distorted view.

"If somebody is going to talk about their experience at work, they're likely to select negative or dramatic experiences because no one's interested in hearing, 'I went to work yesterday, and it was nice.'"

Still, the small frustrations at the office are often seen as a microcosm for what's wrong with the business world, which is currently getting bad reviews with news about outsourcing, bank collapses and high CEO salaries.

With all that in mind, we decided to look at how the office is viewed by the Big Three – "Dilbert," "The Office" and "Office Space."

Office environment

Dilbert calls his workplace The Land of Cubicles, where workers file into a maze of partitions. Artwork comes from low-cost Dogbert Corporate Art Source, which boasts the motto: "If it's in a frame, it will look like art to you."

In "Office Space," the gray and mostly windowless Initech building is also filled with cubicles. When consultants are brought in to recommend layoffs, a large banner is erected, asking workers: "Is This Good For the Company?"

While the cubicles in "Dilbert" and "Office Space" belong to lower-end workers, "The Office's" Michael Scott has a room with window blinds that allow him to hide from employees when he makes unpopular decisions.

Employee view of work

In the Big Three, no one wants to be at the office.

In "The Office," Jim Halpert resists promotion, saying, "Because right now, this is a job. If I advance any higher, this would be my career. And if this were my career, I'd have to throw myself in front of a train."

In "Office Space," Peter Gibbons is even less positive. As he tells his therapist: "Ever since I started working, every single day of my life has been worse than the day before it. So that means that every single day that you see me, that's on the worst day of my life."

In "Dilbert," it's Dogbert who acts as the therapist, telling Dilbert, "You suffer from the dull ache of insignificance."

Management

In short, the Big Three view managers as clueless schmucks who thrive on minutiae and couldn't make an important decision if their lives depended on it.

In "Office Space," Bill Lumbergh is a condescending boss who has no life outside the office. When faced with a difficult task like firing an employee named Milton Waddams – he has someone else do it.

Michael Scott, meanwhile, is ignorant of the fact that none of his employees respect him. (He owns a "World's Best Boss" mug he bought for himself.) When asked how he views himself as a supervisor, he says, "I guess the atmosphere that I've tried to create here is that I'm a friend first and a boss second, and probably an entertainer third."

While Michael is quick to do things unrelated to work, he delegates serious duties – like announcing cuts in health care benefits – to others.

Dilbert's "pointy-headed boss," meanwhile, is a micro-manager who doesn't listen to employees. In one meeting, the boss announces, "That's the plan. Now I will listen to your irrational concerns" before putting headphones on.

Work functions

In the Big Three, work functions are perceived as nonsensical, work for the sake of work and frustratingly bureaucratic. "Office Space" best illustrates this when Lumbergh and other bosses repeatedly remind Peter that he must include cover sheets on his TPS reports.

In "Dilbert," meetings are seen as a waste of time where confusing jargon makes presentations pointless. In one meeting, Dilbert says, "The next transparency is an incomprehensible jumble of complexity and undefined acronyms – you might wonder why I'm going to show it to you since the only possible result is to lower your opinion of my communication skills."

In "The Office," employees often run personal errands for the boss or attend special meetings – about diversity, office safety or women in the workplace, for example – that are necessitated by something their boss Michael did.

Technology

Technology in the Big Three represents yet another inconvenience.

In "The Office," Michael resists

Vinyl making a retro comeback

LPs still selling despite advanced technologies

BY GREG KOT
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

CHICAGO – At a time when convenience and portability rule for consumers listening to music collections on MP3 players, the stodgy old vinyl album and turntable are making an unexpected comeback.

While CD sales continue a double-digit decline, sales of vinyl albums have doubled in the last year to 6 million and turntable sales increased 80 percent last year.

The resurgence is being led not just by Baby Boomers nostalgic for gatefold album sleeves and the pops and scratches of favorite records, but by college-age consumers discovering the elaborate artwork of vinyl-album packaging for the first time, and entranced by the grittier, less-artificial sound quality.

"We're seeing the [vinyl] resurgence in all walks of life, from 50-year-old guys who want high-quality product to match their high-end stereos to 19-year-old kids who are sick of the minimalist Ikea design that has plagued dorm rooms for the last decade," says Ken Shipley, co-owner of the Numero Group, a Chicago label that specializes in reissues of underground soul music. "Vinyl is the new books."

This year, 40 percent of the label's income is coming from vinyl sales.

Sundazed Music, a New York-based reissue label, has seen vinyl sales surge 500 percent in the last three years. The percentage is far lower at major labels, but still significant enough to warrant not only reissues of classic titles such as the Beach Boys' "Pet Sounds" and Radiohead's "OK Computer," but new titles as well.

Warner Brothers sold 12,000 vinyl copies of the White Stripes' 2007 release "Icky Thump" and sold out a 5,000-copy run of a $115.98 vinyl boxed set of Metallica's latest album, "Death Magnetic." Nonesuch's vinyl version of Wilco's 2007 album "Sky Blue Sky" has sold 15,000 copies.

Matador Records, home to such bands as Cat Power, Yo La Tengo and Mission of Burma, is seeing a double-digit percentage increase in vinyl sales. "We can't press it fast enough,"

Vinyl records have made a resurgence in popularity. Many purists prefer the sound of classic LPs despite the convenience of CDs and MP3s.

Humans vs Zombies returns

Campus-wide game set to kickoff today

sprinting and fighting their way across campus.

In past games, the zombie outbreak was caused by careless scientists or doomsday cultists. This time around, the unscrupulous Lazarus Corporation has released a deadly virus into the population, which causes the infected dead to rise again and feast upon the living. The corporate theme is going to pervade the entire game, to which significant changes have been made since last year.

"It's going to be a lot more structured this time," said Devin Ashe, the game's chief coordinator.

Ashe is president of MassGames, the sponsoring body behind the UMass branch of HvZ.

There are going to be missions just about every day, as well as smaller 'encounters,' and we are putting more of an emphasis on squad work."

Squads are groups of eight or more players who have banded together for the purpose of mutual survival. Squad leaders, recognized by their gold bandanas, are prime targets for hungry ghouls, but the risk comes with benefits. This year, squad leaders will receive advanced information on missions, encounters, and possibly hints as to the location of anti-zombification vaccines.

The biggest change during this installment is the timeline. Whereas both previous games lasted two full weeks, this game will be shorter, lasting from October 15 through October 25.

"People have told me that it gets old. They need a break," said Ashe.

Another aspect of HvZ which Ashe is trying to emphasize is charity work. In the past, the game has been put on hold to allow for canned food drives, where the team who donated the most canned food (which last spring totaled more than 2,000 pounds) received an in-game bonus or strategic edge.

During the next ten days, Ashe hopes to raise the bar, by co-hosting a Red Cross blood drive with similar incentives.

In the past, HvZ has occasionally run afoul of the university administrators.

While the core game of tag is fairly innocuous, problems arose when buildings such as LGRT and Franklin Dining Hall were surrounded and held for long periods of time.

While no actual property damage has ever been incurred, UMass is justifiably uncomfortable about students laying siege to any part of campus.

When asked about his standing with the administration, Ashe replied, "The University regards us as a harmless nuisance. There were a few incidences, but in general people play nice."

For those who are interested in playing but have not yet signed up, time is of the essence.

Registration is open until October 17 on the game's website, www.umasshvz.com. The site contains a wealth of information about the zombie struggle, such as complete rules, leader-boards, up-to-date team numbers, and discussion forums.

If you find yourself a bystander to a one-man ambush outside of a dorm or a massive clash between ghouls and men, don't be alarmed. The bullets may fly, but they are only made of foam.

If you are among the dwindling survivors, however, beware.

Keep your eyes open and your Maverick loaded, because you never know what may be lurking around the next corner. Good luck, and Godspeed.

process are now up on the film's [illegible] group, "Wide Open Eyes: The Musical."

Once staging is complete, filming will begin, followed by post recording.

Since Maletz wrote the songs solely for piano and voice, she is collaborating with the film's director, John McLaughlin, and guitarist, Jake DeGregorio to write parts for guitar and bass. She is still currently searching for a percussionist to do the score for the drums.

Although casting was easy, "Wide Open Eyes" is still looking for talent and help from the campus community.

"We can still need extras, background, camera operators or special assistants, anyone who has experience with making movies or just loves making movies," said Maletz.

Maletz hopes to complete filming by the time everyone leaves for winter break so that special effects and editing can be completed during that time.

Once finished, Maletz hopes to enter "Wide Open Eyes" in film competitions, as well as making it available on YouTube. She also hopes to make it open to the UMass community through on-campus screenings during the Spring 2009 semester.

As writer, co-producer, and director, Jamie Maletz has her hands full.

The cast and crew of "Wide Open Eyes" have a lot of work ahead of them in the coming months. It is exciting to see a student film that is so vital to the University.

Along with the Facebook group, the website, www.WideOpenEyesTheMovie.com, includes a forum and contact information for anyone interested in getting involved or following the progress of the film.

a new Web site, preferring old-fashioned methods of doing business. "People will not be replaced by machines," he declares, after crashing a car with a sophisticated navigation system. "In the end, life and business are about human connections. And computers are about trying to murder you in a lake."

In "Dilbert," technology is deliberately confusing. As Dilbert once said at a presentation, "You won't read my technical report, so I summarized it in this complicated slide. If you stare at it long enough, you will either experience the illusion of understanding it or be too embarrassed to admit you don't."

In "Office Space," the three main characters take out their frustrations on a printer, beating it to bits with a bat.

Losing your job.

In the Big Three, workers seem less concerned about promotion and job satisfaction than with simply keeping their jobs. Yet, the threat of layoffs and outsourcing is always there.

In "Office Space," the arrival of "efficiency experts" signals pending layoffs. The experts – also known as "the Bobs" – question workers on what they do, to which Peter replies that his key motivation is to work just hard enough to not get fired.

After Michael blurts out that the Scranton branch will be shut down in "The Office," employees who stayed on out of convenience suddenly have to ponder life after the office.

Since management doesn't like firings, other methods in the Big Three are employed. In "Dilbert," the boss tells one worker, "It's my policy to make your job so unpleasant that you quit."

Employee relations.

While employees occasionally get along quite well (like Jim and Pam in "The Office"), personalities often clash.

After the merger in "The Office," Andy and Dwight become instant competitors, as Andy seeks to become Michael's No. 2. This causes Dwight to fight back. As he discloses, "I have decided to shun Andy Bernard for the next three years ... which I'm looking forward to. It's an Amish technique. It's like slapping someone with silence."

In "Dilbert," office worker Wally explains his tendency to blame his mistakes on dead or nonexistent people. "I used to blame living co-workers but it made the meetings awkward."

The difference in worker perception of the job is apparent in "Office Space" after Peter declares "I gotta get out of here ... I think I'm gonna lose it." Another

Schoolhouse bike rides on the rise

California programs encourage students to bike to the classroom

By Will Oremus
Palo Alto Daily News

PALO ALTO, Calif. – At Gunn High School, as at big schools everywhere, morning and afternoon bring a crush of cars to campus, clogging Foothill Expressway and El Camino Real and turning Arastradero Road into an extension of the parking lot.

Unlike other schools, however, cars and buses aren't the undisputed masters of the roads around Gunn these days. As they stop and start and honk, they're overtaken by a quieter swarm of teenage commuters: bicyclists.

Years ago, the school started a program encouraging students to bike to campus, handing out treats and prizes to cyclists on randomly selected days. Fed by similar programs in Palo Alto, Calif.'s middle schools, the concept gradually caught on, and last year the 1,900-student school broke 500 cyclists on a single day for the first time.

That record was shattered last month, when program organizers counted 632 bikes on campus on Sept. 11.

This week, as the Palo Alto Unified School District celebrated International Walk to School Day, it was clear that Gunn isn't the only campus where non-motorized modes of transport have become the norm. Elementary schools held "bike rodeos" for third-graders; Palo Alto High School reported between 450 and 600 students are now rolling onto campus each day; Jane Lathrop Stanford Middle School is ordering new bike racks to accommodate ever-growing demand.

Parents and administrators say they remember a time when it was hard to convince kids to bike to school because their classmates considered it "uncool." Whether because of gas prices, gridlock, or greenhouse gases, today's students say that's no longer the case.

In fact, biking to Gunn is a something of a social activity, said freshman Asaf Rotman, 14.

"You'll see like 50 people riding together in one big bike pack," he explained. "It's the same every morning."

Wednesday afternoon, Rotman and fellow freshman Nick Deierlein chatted as they unlocked their bikes after wrestling practice. Deierlein said he could easily get a ride in a car, but the 10- to 15-minute bike ride is actually faster because of traffic.

"When I ride with my sister, I'm always late," he said. Plus, with a bike on hand, "I don't have to call and wait for a ride" when wrestling practice lets out.

For underclassmen who can't yet drive, biking to school carries the added bonus of after-school mobility, said Ramsey Salah-Marx, 14. It means he can easily meet up with friends at Jamba Juice if he feels like it.

The schools are doing their part to encourage the trend. At Gunn, the "Pedaling for Prizes" program not only gives cyclists candy on certain days but registers them for raffle drawings. The more regularly someone bikes to school, the more chances they have to win things like homecoming tickets or a new bicycle.

Schools across the district offer maps of safe bike corridors on their Web sites. "Green Teams" at Paly, JLS and other schools work up incentives to encourage walking and biking. And at both Gunn and Paly, student parking permits cost between $100 and $150, prices designed to dissuade kids from coming to school in cars.

Christine Fawcett, a parent leader of Gunn's traffic safety program, said the trend has noticeably reduced vehicle gridlock at the school.

"Once a few people start, then their friends want to do it too," Fawcett said. "I've got friends in (the Mountain View-Los Altos Union High School District), and it's a different kettle of fish there. This year they're just introducing a similar program."

Tom Jacoubowsky, assistant principal at Gunn, agreed.

"It's a very accepted part of the culture of the city and the community, and ecologically it makes so much sense. We have so passed the tipping point on the acceptability of riding to school."

The trend is great as long as students ride safely, said Jerry Berkson, assistant principal at Paly. His lone concern is that he sees too many students riding without helmets. It's possible, he said, that helmets still carry a stigma even though biking in general no longer does.

Meanwhile, as trendy as biking has become, its luster is still trumped in most students' minds by one cherished teenage rite of passage: according to Gunn freshman Joe Suh, 14.

"If you can drive," Suh said, "it's always cooler to drive."

Biking to school has become an increasingly popular trend amongst youths as an alternative to crowded bus rides.

Vinyl records returning in favor for music fans

says Matador General Manager Patrick Amory.

"You have to get in line now at these pressing plants, which is amazing, because vinyl was virtually non-existent two or three years ago," adds Bill Gagnon, senior vice president of catalog marketing at EMI Music.

The turnaround time at pressing plants has doubled to two months because of high demand, says Robert Griffin, who runs the Seat label out of Cleveland.

"How many commercials have you seen that involve a DJ spinning a record?" he says. "Repeat with incidences on TV shows, movies. It's being presented as a cool thing, not anachronistic, which was the late '90s attitude."

Though Gagnon says vinyl will eventually make up about 4 percent of EMI's revenue, it's a profitable business that will have long-lasting appeal, in part because a younger generation is getting hooked on it.

Eric Shah, a 23-year-old law student at Loyola University, says he didn't start buying vinyl to be cool, but because "I like the sound."

It's closer to the sound you might hear in the studio when the music is being recorded. I like the idea of listening to an artist's work on vinyl. It becomes a process. You sit down, play through a side, it becomes more singular because you're more focused on it. It's not portable. You have to pay attention, turn the record over when it's done. It encourages active listening."

Alfie Samata, a 20-year-old studying architecture at the University of Illinois at Chicago, rhapsodizes about "the emotional connection of placing the record on the turntable, putting the needle down and sitting there with your friends to listen."

It's definitely a community experience which I don't get from downloading an MP3 file. It's as close to going to a concert as you can get."

The disadvantages of vinyl are numerous: tough to transport, bulky to store, easy to damage.

MP3 files have enabled consumers to essentially pack their entire music collection in a device the size of a cigarette box and listen to it any time, anywhere.

Clearly, digital is the future of music, and the re-emergence of vinyl won't change that. But hardcore music lovers are a demanding bunch, and they still want a tangible connection to the music that a digital file can't provide.

"There's an art to making a vinyl album, and it invites serious listening," says Matador's Amory.

"For me, vinyl is more of a personal listening experience," says Ben Meyerson, 22, who is studying journalism at the University of Maryland.

"I have my turntable in my room, and it's hands-on – a compensation for the lack of physicality you get from a hard drive and iTunes. It's fills a void in my musical experience."

There are also legions of album junkies who insist that no digital format, whether compact disc or MP3, can compare to the sonic richness of a stylus penetrating the grooves of a vinyl record.

"There's a huge difference," says singer Sam Phillips. "It has a little grit and texture compared to digital. It's heartbreaking not to have all that sound on an MP3 file. I love my vinyl, and I play it all the time. Nothing sounds like it."

"Who would've thought? In the early '80s, we were trying to take all the noise out by making these really precise recordings. And now, we want it all back because it sounds more real, more like the work of a human being instead of a machine."

The new market for albums is in part directed at these audiophiles, with heavier 180-gram discs made out of so-called "virgin" vinyl (which contains no recycled plastic) more resistant to the degradation and warping that accompany cheaper materials.

With fewer pressing plants and more expensive material, the packaging can get pricey. Some vinyl albums sell for double the price of a CD.

The situation was reversed 25 years ago, when compact discs first came on the market and were double the price of most vinyl albums.

In addition, the nuances of an audiophile vinyl album won't be apparent unless the listener has a turntable of sufficient quality to pick them up.

A hand-me-down turntable from an uncle or a flea-market bargain special won't necessarily yield sonic results that satisfy any more than a low-grade MP3 download.

But the romantic pull of turntables and vinyl is strong, both for an older generation that grew up with them, and younger listeners looking for a deeper connection with the music they love.

"Everything old is new again," says Tom Biery, general manager of Warner Brothers. "Now that iPods and MP3s have become your parents' music, the kids want something different. The kids in the dorm with the turntable are the cool kids now."

Film blind to its own faults

toes? All the while, the reasons for the spread of the sickness go unexplained.

It's not long before the quarters swell with new occupants, straining living conditions in the facility to their breaking point. The blind feel their way haplessly through refuse-laden corridors, stumbling over the bodies of their fellow afflicted while so doing. Thanks to production designer Tule Peak, the film looks strikingly beautiful even as garbage clutters the screen.

As "Blindness" continues, it becomes a study of pack culture. The wards of the quarantine facility break into gangs. When one of the wards gains access to a loaded firearm, suddenly human nature takes a turn for the worst. The empowered ward gains control of the food supply and begins looting the facility – first for money and jewelry, then for women.

Bodies meld en masse for the grainy, out of focus shots that constitute the film's rape sequences. Grunts, intermingled with cries of protest, resound throughout the theater for stomach-churning effect.

If you buy into "Blindness" at all, this is what becomes of humanity when vision is lost. Forget about the estimated 40 million across the world that have managed to keep civility, nay, dignity, intact in the face of such handicap. Here, deprive enough folks of their sight and eventually everyone becomes a monster.

If you turn a critical eye to "Blindness," you'll notice something else, too. The blind aren't chewing down on human brains and entrails, but they might as well be. The film settles in old-school zombie territory. You've got a ragtag band of survivors and an unexplained epidemic taking hold of the populace. You've also got soldiers sporting large, semi-automatic weapons, poised to kill as the world teeters on the edge of apocalypse.

The zombie theme is never as clear as when Moore and gang journey outside the quarantine facility. She spots a supermarket where the living blind linger, greedily shoving fistfuls of packaged foods into their mouths. She tiptoes past them, making her way to a basement stockroom filled with meat and other goods. But before she can escape with her food, they smell the meat and pounce.

They do everything but bite her limbs off.

Despite the obvious parallels, the blind are never called zombies. Still, the horrors that "Blindness" contains are just as gruesome and pointless as any witnessed in a Fulci or Romero film. The difference in "Blindness" being an inability to see itself for what it actually is.

'Appaloosa' proves a welcome directorial return for Harris

widow with an air of naïve desperation. Harris shows his directorial subtlety framing Ally's need for a man as not an act of lust, but mere frontier survival.

For a time the two are successful at keeping the order within their lives before eventually arresting Bragg, managing to arrange a trial with a witness. Bragg despite being incessantly cornered always manages to make an escape, somehow miraculously garnering a presidential pardon in the process.

The film's narrative is often interrupted by these acts of fate, one of several cinematic techniques that link the film to older low-budget westerns. Scenes fade in and out, into black and back without a semblance of the passage of time interrupted only by scenes that are as sparse with their dialogue as the frontier landscape is with its foliage.

The cinematography focuses heavily on the desolation and loneliness inherent in the visuals of the landscape. Majestic shots of canyons and trees as well as mighty rivers showcase the outlying area of town enforcing its alien and dangerous nature. This same patience is also inherent in the filming. The characters, through facial expressions and sardonic dialogue, each seem instantly accessible, despite the fact that the narrative mentions almost nothing about them.

Mortensen's quiet Everett steals most of the scenes and, in a way, acts as the film's narrative voice merely with his movements. Mortensen plays the quiet Nick to Harris' love-struck Gatsby, hopelessly devoted to a woman and a town that are always acting in their own best interests.

Less patient viewers might find the movie meandering as it never abides to one concrete story and instead focuses on the changes in character arcs. The movie lacks hails of gunfire or the generous explosions that its counterparts use to tart up the genre's aging plotlines but in doing so it quietly blazes its own trail.

"Appaloosa" may not shock you out of your seat or provide much fodder for the popcorn crowd, but its expert cast makes sure the movie expands beyond the boundaries of its two-hour screen time by engaging your mind. "Appaloosa" is a rare theatrical treat that attempts to pay homage to both the tales of old westerns and those who lived them, weaving itself into a tight complex tale of redemption, friendship and loyalty.

Viggo Mortensen provides a quiet and profound presence in the new western "Appaloosa."

49ers struggling late

Fordham impressing, Charlotte losing leads

BY HOLLY J. GALVIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Facing back-to-back Atlantic 10 stalwarts in the opening of conference play, the Fordham men's soccer team upset previously undefeated No. 9 Saint Louis, 1-0, after falling 2-1 to No. 21 Charlotte.

Fordham's A-10 opener set the tone, as the 49ers were 60 seconds away from being upset as well. An epic in the Bronx saw underdog Fordham hold the 49ers in a 1-1 deadlock until the final minute of play, when A-10 offensive leader Chris Salvaggione netted the game-winner.

The hard-fought conference opener infused motivation into a 5-5-1 Fordham squad set to take on the No. 9 Billikens on only a day's rest.

A–10 Soccer

Backed by six saves from freshman keeper Ryan Meara, relentless defensive play and an early goal, the Rams muscled out a 1-0 victory over SLU, accounting for their first win against a ranked team since 2006. Senior defender/midfielder Sam Acheampong played hero for Forham, scoring his first goal of the season in the 28th minute. Acheampong, formerly an exclusive defender, was assisted by Tim Richardson on a strike from 10 yards out into the lower left-hand corner of the net.

In what initially looked like an eerie repeat of the Charlotte game's excruciating final minutes of play, Saint Louis seemed to have tied the match 1-1 in the 89th minute of regulation. Junior Billiken midfielder Kyle Hayes' cross-goal conversion, however, was controversially called offside. Overall offside calls in the game were 3-1, in favor of the Rams.

Beating ranked opponents is becoming an occasional occurrence for the Rams, who have ousted three ranked opponents in the past six seasons.

CHARLOTTE STRUGGLES TO HOLD LEADS

Non-conference NSCAA rankings within the A-10 continued to be threatened with La Salle's (2-7-3, 1-1 A-10) upset of Charlotte. After losing a 1-0 lead and falling 2-1 to No. 12 Maryland in overtime, Charlotte squandered a 2-0 lead in a 3-2 loss against La Salle.

Though Salvaggione's late heroics were sufficient in defeating Fordham, his team-leading 10th goal wasn't enough against La Salle. The Explorers tabbed Charlotte for three unanswered goals in an evenly matched game.

The Explorers rallied from a 2-1 deficit in the last 10 minutes of play to win on goals by Tom Kalpokas and Daniel Heavey in the 83rd and 87th minutes of play, respectively. Kalpokas, Week 7 A-10's Rookie of the Week, had already scored a clutch goal earlier in the week in a close 3-2 loss to SLU.

The 49ers (9-3-0, 1-1-0 A-10) were unable to sweep the A-10 portion of their recent road trip, going 1-1, and face Dayton this upcoming week.

SLU STREAK ENDS

The Billikens (4-1-5, 1-1 A-10) loss to Fordham ended an almost year-long unbeaten streak for SLU. The streak dated back to last Oct 19's 1-0 loss to Massachusetts, and was broken at a time when tough conference opponents are waiting in the wings.

Dan Donigan and SLU take on Xavier and Dayton at home before facing offensive powerhouses Dayton and Charlotte at Hermann Stadium.

FLYERS, OWLS START STRONG

With undefeated conference records, Dayton (8-2-1, 2-0 A-10) and Temple (6-3-2, 2-0 A-10) sit tied atop the conference after one week of the "new season", as college soccer coaches allude to when discussing non-conference bouts. Player of the Week Alex Torda and the Flyers beat last-place Richmond, 4-3, and George Washington, 3-1. Temple, meanwhile, capitalized on strong play from redshirt sophomore goalkeeper Bret Mollon to shut-out two opponents: Duquesne (5-4-3, 1-1-0 A-10) and St. Bonaventure (2-3-4, 0-1-1 A-10), 2-0 and 1-0, respectively.

Holly J. Galvin can be reached at hgalvin@student.umass.edu

Dayton junior Isaac Kissi tracks the ball down against UMass in a game last seaon. The Flyers (8-2-1, 2-0 Atlantic 10) are one of a few teams to start the conference season undefeated.

Issues abound for Cowboys

BY JENNIFER FLOYD ENGEL
(MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE)

IRVING, Texas — A perfect storm of adversity touched down at Valley Ranch on Monday, with none uglier than losing QB Tony Romo for likely a month with a broken pinkie.

Your Cowboys also have injuries of varying severity to big-time contributors Felix Jones and Mat McBriar and a very good possibility of a Pacman suspension coming down on Tuesday morning.

Did I mention this team is coming off a string of average to ugly performances? Or that frustration seems to be building?

In many ways, all of this ugly has a chance to really galvanize what had been a floundering Cowboys team. Bring out the fight in them. Inspire personal accountability. Challenge every big-time, talented player on this team to Cowboy up and demonstrate a little intestinal fortitude until Romo returns.

And let's start with the big uglies up front. Give left tackle Flozell Adams a chance to pledge to ramp up his game after that Desert Disaster and be a leader in such trying times.

"Hey," Adams said, "we did all right."

And he was actually serious, after that pig of a game this Cow offensive line dropped in Arizona, with him being Piggy No. 1.

Good luck with all of that Brad Johnson.

And so much for certain precincts of this locker room suddenly being willing to be real. On a day when Coach Wade attempted to morph into a hammer dropper, adding a "hell" and a "damn" for emphasis, we were reminded his sunshine-pumper style already has trickled down to his players. Too late to try to be a butt kicker. That horse is already out of the barn.

And so trying to clean up this mess, without Romo, without Flozies, without McBriar, without Newman, looks a little daunting. Hardly impossible.

Too much talent exists in this locker room to put a fork in them. What they have to show in these next three games is something they have yet to show...an ability to whip adversity into submission.

"I'm just disappointed in this organization right now, the whole deal of it," linebacker Greg Ellis said. "I think things just aren't going really good. Before the game, I said everybody has got to take part in this football team, strength coaches, coaches, owners, head coaches; this football team is truly a team sport. You need everybody to win, everybody's got to do their best for us to win. Right now, I feel like we players, Greg Ellis included, all of us ... we're just not putting our best foot forward right now."

Ellis admitted this probably holds less water coming from him, with his whines from recent seasons. He felt he had to talk anyway. And amen, Greg.

If anything, he needed to be stronger with specifics. He hinted and danced around what a lot of us have been saying for a while ... this was a team not willing to be real about its flaws.

Instead we hear how the Cowboys won the second half against the Redskins and how they beat a team that took the Giants to overtime and about those 13 Pro Bowlers.

Pay no attention to those little warning signs.

Except this is how good teams ultimately unravel, by failing to pay attention to little details, like say punt-block schemes or offensive-line blocking assignments. Two of Dallas' best players are injured as a result of this lax attitude.

"I think at times, man, it seems like the last couple of weeks it's like you haven't seen the intensity and the passion on the sidelines," Patrick Crayton said. "We have to get that back."

This included Romo until his injury.

Watch Romo, right after Nick Folk made the game-tying field goal, and he was sitting on the sideline looking whipped. There was no fist pump, no hugging out of his teammates. A guy who is all about heart and emotion had become a shell of his former self.

"I was like 'Dude, we're going to overtime bro,'" Crayton said, recounting his conversation with Romo. "I don't know, man. I don't know what's going on."

Romo has four weeks to get his head right.

Until then, welcome to life with backup Brad "Checkdown" Johnson as he has been dubbed in Dallas. And for everybody bagging on Romo, prepare to beg forgiveness. This may be ugly.

If Romo has trouble with ball security when being blindsided and pummeled, what will happen to poor Brad? He's 40 and not even slightly mobile. Lucky for him, I guess, that Flo says "we did all right."

Dallas Cowboys owner Jerry Jones (left) and head coach Wade Phillips (right) have to deal with the injury to quarterback Tony Romo and the suspension of cornerback Adam Jones. Both will be out indefinitely.

Childress situation draws comparisons

BY MARK CRAIG
(MINNEAPOLIS STAR TRIBUNE)

An embattled third-year coach goes to .500 on the season and 18-24 overall as angry fans begin chanting for his ouster in the second half.

The masses leave the stadium and pour themselves into local sports talk radio. They gripe. They scream. They vomit.

I'm talking about Sunday at the Metrodome, right?

Wrong.

This was Nov. 21, 1993. The only thing missing was the vulgarity of the Internet.

So who was this wretched, gawdawful coach who needed to be fired ASAP 15 years ago?

William Stephen Belichick.

Congratulations, Brad Childress. You now have something in common with one of the best head coaches in NFL history. An angry mob that wants your head on the next flight out of town. Whether the rest of you follows is purely optional.

I was in Cleveland Stadium on Nov. 21, 1993 when Browns fans aligned against Bill Belichick. I was at the Metrodome on Sunday when Vikings fans gurgled up on Childress as he was improving to .500 on the year and 17-21 in his third NFL season as a head coach.

Childress said Monday that Vikings fans are becoming "more like Philadelphia fans, I suppose, a little bit more mean-spirited." I won't question him on that one. After all, they don't mine them any meaner than the folks in Philly.

But the "Fire Childress!" chants that grew throughout the second half of Sunday's 12-10 victory over the Lions can't compare to the venom released by Browns fans chanting "Hill Must Go!" back on Nov. 21, 1993.

The logistics of dumpy old Cleveland Stadium added to the intensity of the situation. Fans knew Belichick's only route from the Browns' locker room to the interview room was a short walk through the concourse. So hundreds of them camped out, waiting for Belichick to make that walk in plain view.

Belichick had done more to these people than go 6-10 in 1991, 7-9 in 1992 and lose three consecutive games to fall to 5-5 in 1993. Two weeks earlier, he had cut quarterback/local hero Bernie Kosar. The wound was fresh and this was the first home game since Kosar's release.

Belichick was escorted to the interview room by stadium security. Fans went berserk. They chanted "Hill Must Go!", "Bernie! Bernie!" and "We Want Belichick," although not in a good way. They yelled unprintable words about Bill's mother. They beat on metal garbage cans.

Belichick never flinched. He stepped on the platform and began to mumble on about the five turnovers that day.

He raised his voice when it became obvious that few if any of the reporters in the room could hear him above the fans just outside the door. When one of us asked Belichick what he thought about the fans going nuts, he just smiled.

"To quote Buddy Ryan, 'If you listen to the fans, you will be up there with them,' Belichick said. "I have to do what I think is right, and I've been doing that. I know this team is headed in the right direction. I am confident in the long run we are going to be OK."

Belichick and his posse of security personnel made their way back past the fans and into the locker room.

The Browns finished 7-9 that season. They went 11-5 and made the playoffs in 1994. They went 5-11 in 1995, moved to Baltimore and became the Ravens.

So to recap, two years after fans chanted "Bill Must Go!", the Browns moved because of an awful stadium situation. Hey, speaking of awful stadiums, it isn't the Vikings lease with the Metrodome expire soon, as in 2011? And aren't the local and state politicians doing, well, nothing?

Dainton still injured

group, but over the weekend they showed their ability to move the puck around and create opportunities in the offensive zone. But with their age they still have a lot to improve on.

"[The second power-play unit] threw the puck around intermittently well at times. But there is a whole rhythm factor in terms of getting the loose pucks. They had some looks," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "That group has the potential to be ok. The first group has the potential to be very good. They have to be a little more thorough on finishing and getting pucks to the net."

The penalty-killing units include the combinations of Davis and Watson or Quirk and Berry and rotate through some defenders – typically Nolet and Braun starting out on the ice. The older, more experienced skaters are used on the penalty kill. They made crucial clears over the weekend but struggled against the Fighting Sioux, the UMass penalty kill allowed one goal off of 14 shots in seven penalties. The Minutemen allowed five shots and one goal on Friday against Michigan State.

INJURY UPDATE

Last weekend goaltender Dan Meyers was in net for both games due to the injury of sophomore goalie Paul Dainton, who is out indefinitely. It is likely Cahoon would have given both goalies playing time in the tournament.

Sophomore Chase Langeraap and senior John Wessbecker have yet to see ice time this season because they are both recovering from surgeries. Langeraap is out for an undisclosed amount of time, while Wessbecker may be back in a game in a few weeks.

Bevis was taking it day-by-day last week. But he did see ice time in both of UMass' games because freshman Matt Irwin was out after being injured in practice the week before. Bevis returned strong, though, scoring the first goal for the Minutemen in their 3-2 win over North Dakota, going plus-1 for the weekend.

ON, MEYERS

Goaltender Dan Meyers was named the Hockey East Pure Hockey Defensive Player of the Week after his success last weekend against North Dakota in the Ice Breaker Invitational.

"I just take it one shot at a time. Break it down; take it five minutes at a time. I don't look for the result. I don't have control of that," Meyers said after Saturday's game. "The guys played the front like they did and we'll get a result like [Saturday's]."

In the tournament, Meyers made 53 saves, including a career-high 40 saves against the Fighting Sioux. He had a 2.51 goals-against average and a .914 save percentage.

Meyers showed what he was capable of on Saturday as he gave up far fewer rebounds and handled more shots compared to Friday's 3-1 loss to No. 11 Michigan State (MSU had 16 shots on Friday).

"The goaltending was superb [on Saturday]. I thought Danny was ok [on Friday], but he was superb [in Saturday's game]," Cahoon said.

MOVING UP

UMass remains unranked in the USCHO.com/CBS College Sports XXL Division I Men's Poll, but received 44 votes this week. Of the teams outside of the Top 20, UMass received the sixth-most votes last week, but this week the Minutemen were the third team to receive votes, behind Northeastern (1-0-1) and Air Force (2-0-0).

The top three positions remain the same as last week. No. 1 Boston College, No. 2 Michigan and No. 3 Colorado College.

North Dakota was ranked No. 5 going into last weekend, but after losing to Boston University on Friday and UMass on Saturday, it moved down to No. 13. Michigan State (another UMass opponent from the weekend) remains at No. 11.

No. 5 Boston University moved up four spots from last week's poll, the highest upward ranking of any team. BU makes the second Hockey East team to break the Top 5 for this week's rankings.

ICE SHAVINGS

Last year UMass was 14-3-2 when scoring at least three goals in a game. After the win over UND the Minutemen are 1-0 when scoring at least three goals. When they scored fewer than three goals they were 0-13-4. ... With his two power-play goals against UND, Marcou has already surpassed last year's total of one. ... Last year UMass was 1-0 against the WCHA, currently they are 1-0 after the victory against North Dakota. The last time UMass defeated a Top 5 team was last season at Colorado College (No. 4 at that point in the season). Bevis scored his first goal of the season against North Dakota at Agganis Arena. The only goal he scored last season was on Nov. 9 against Boston University, also at Agganis Arena. ... Berry had a career-high three assists against the Fighting Sioux.

Sophomore forward Shawn Saunders was one of many young UMass players to see ice team this past weekend. With injuries to Paul Dainton, Chase Langeraap and John Wessbecker, more players are needed in the lineup.

UMass back in Top 10

Currently Nelson ranks first in the CAA in rushing, averaging 123.5 yards per game.

SURE HANDS AND STEADY PASSING

Quarterback Liam Coen's numbers might be impressive, but he wouldn't have the numbers that he does without his sure-handed wide receivers.

The question marks that once loomed over their heads have disappeared.

Victor Cruz, Jeremy Horne and Julian Talley have propelled themselves as some of the top wide receivers in the conference.

Cruz leads the UMass receivers with 48 catches and 620 yards. He has two touchdowns and ranks second in the CAA with 6.33 receptions per game.

Horne has 27 catches for 411 yards and a team-leading four receiving touchdowns.

Talley has grabbed 13 balls for 177 yards and is still looking for his first touchdown on the season.

Coen, despite some recent struggles, still manages the Minutemen offense quite efficiently.

The senior has thrown for 1,464 yards, which ranks third in the CAA. Coen is also ranked No. 6 in passing efficiency (144.6) and fourth in total offense with 1,472 total yards.

JENNINGS TO THE RESCUE

The Minutemen have looked to find a true defensive leader all year long. But after the struggles on defense passed, Josh Jennings has emerged.

Jennings has registered 56 tackles, which is good for the team lead. This season the redshirt junior also tallied his first career interception.

Jennings is tied for the team lead with one sack and has added five tackles for loss – which also leads the team. Jennings has been chosen for the CAA Defensive Player of the Week Award twice this year (Aug. 31, Oct. 6).

He ranks second in the CAA in tackles per game with 9.3 and that total is good for 33rd in the NCAA.

Jennings has led UMass with 10-plus tackles three times this season.

UP AND DOWN

Coming into this weekend the Minutemen are ranked No. 10 in the Football Championship Subdivision.

UMass was ranked as high as No. 3 in the third week of the season when it faced off against James Madison.

At the Minutemen's lowest point in the season they were ranked No. 18 after the team's loss to No. 11 Texas Tech, 56-14, on Sept. 20.

UMass bounced back from its loss to the Red Raiders to defeat both the Blue Hens and the Huskies to once again crack the Top 10.

Ryan Fleming can be reached at rfleming@student.umass.edu

Junior running back Tony Nelson has been terrific this season, leading the Colonial Athletic Association with 123.5 rushing yards per game. He has 741 yards on the ground this year, including seven total touchdowns.

Offensive woes continue for UM

Minutemen mired in scoring slump, no goals in four games

By Scott Feldman
Collegian Staff

It has been same old story for the Massachusetts men's soccer team. The defense plays well, but the offense can't put the ball in the net.

The Minutemen (2-6-2, 0-1-0 Atlantic 10) are mired in a brutal scoring slump that has the entire team frustrated and trying to figure out how to snap this streak. UMass has been shutout in four straight games, most recently in 1-0 loss to conference foe Rhode Island.

The last goal the Minutemen scored was by Mike DeSantis in the 26th minute of a 2-1 loss to New Hampshire back on Sept. 20. They have taken 46 shots and earned 16 corner kicks over their last four games without notching a single goal, totaling nearly seven hours of scoreless soccer over the course of four weeks.

UMass is a team that relies heavily on creating chances on set pieces such as corner kicks and free kicks, but so far they have come up empty on all their opportunities.

"We've got to put our set pieces away and we haven't done it, and that's what we will work on all week," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

UMass Soccer

Stepping up

One pleasant surprise that has been lost among the team's worries about scoring goals is the performance of freshman defender Andrew Henshaw. An injury to defenseman Tony Bassett has given Henshaw the chance to start over the last four games, and he has risen to the occasion.

Teams have been targeting his side of the field more often, preferring to challenge a freshman defenseman instead of senior captain Chris Brown, so Henshaw has seen plenty of action. In the Minutemen's match against Rhode Island, the Rams spent most of the first 30 minutes trying to attack Henshaw, but he was up to the challenge, forcing the Ram's forwards into bad shots or poor passes.

It is unclear whether he will remain the starter when Bassett returns to full strength, but it is encouraging for Koch to know he has depth at a vital position.

Seeing yellow

All soccer games are physical, but players bring an extra level of intensity to conference matches. Sometimes, the team can go overboard. Four yellow cards were issued in the final 10 minutes of last Sunday's game and the penalties were critical.

URI got a free kick from a yellow card on Bryant Craft, which was turned into a game-winning goal for the Rams.

Rhode Island actually received three yellow cards to UMass' two, but ultimately, a very competitive game was decided by which team could capitalize on the other team's blunder. It will be important for the Minutemen not to allow foolish penalties to cost them any more games.

Homesick Minutemen

The schedule makers did not do UMass any favors this season as the Maroon and White are in the midst of a four-game stretch of road games that started with Wake Forest and Rhode Island last week and will continue with upcoming road matches against St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

Nine of the first 12 matches for UMass are scheduled as road games and the Minutemen do not have a home-stand longer than two games for the rest of the season.

Scott Feldman can be reached at sfeldman@student.umass.edu.

Prince Oliwu has played in all 10 games this season for the Minutemen. He is the spark plug off the bench for UMass, but has only scored two goals this season – both of which came against Boston University on Aug. 31.

Sophomore midfielder Stuart Amick has not registered a point this season as UMass' offensive problems continue. The Minutemen have only scored seven goals this season in 12 contests.

Bullpen collapses for Dodgers

Wade, Broxton serve up home runs in Game 3, LA in hole

By Mark Whicker
(The Orange County Register)

LOS ANGELES — This one was like an antique vase falling in slow motion to the linoleum, as arms flailed to save it.

Actually that was the problem for the Dodgers in Game 4 on Monday night. Too many arms, not enough saves.

A bullpen that has carried the Blue into the yonder of a National League Championship Series got torched for five Philadelphia runs, including the four in the eighth inning that downed the Dodgers, 7-5.

They trail, 3-1, and they meet Cole Hamels, Philly's finest, in Game 5 on Wednesday. Their sails lost all available wind when Shane Victorino and Matt Stairs slammed two-run home runs in the eighth inning.

"Victorino's was a great piece of hitting," catcher Russell Martin said. "Cory (Wade) gave him a curveball, which is his best pitch, and I didn't think he left it up. Shane just golfed it out of there."

Stairs turned around a 3-1 fastball by Jonathan Broxton, who was working one inning earlier than normal. It was the first Dodger Stadium homer off Broxton in 2008.

"I'm sure Jonathan didn't get it where he wanted to," Martin said.

"He's a good fastball hitter and I put it right where he was swinging," Broxton said. "But I got behind in the count and he cashed in."

Eventually the Dodgers learned the subtle problem with asking your starter to perform with three days' rest when that isn't his pattern. It had nothing to do with Derek Lowe himself, because his five innings were fine. What it did was force Joe Torre to open his bullpen gate too early, and gradually the Game 4 loss came tumbling out.

The Dodgers had just seized a 3-2 lead for Lowe, who threw just 74 pitches. He was just feeling good enough to look forward to the 75th and beyond.

"I finally had a 1-2-3 inning," Lowe said. "That's what I'd been looking for. I came back into the clubhouse, went to the men's room, came back up (to the dugout) and they said, 'You're done.'

"I mean, I'm not going to pull a hissy-fit in that situation. Joe is the manager and he's made decisions like that all year. But I was just starting to feel good."

Clayton Kershaw, not a reliever by nature, came in and began the sixth by walking Ryan Howard. Chan Ho Park then came in and wild-pitched the tying run home.

"Obviously that's not what you want to do," Kershaw said. "It wasn't nerves. I just couldn't get my breaking ball to stay up, couldn't throw it for a strike."

Hong-chih Kuo overpowered the Phillies in the seventh and struck out Chase Utley at 97 mph. But then Kuo gave up a leadoff single to Howard in the eighth, and he disappeared in favor of Wade.

That was the one move that cocked your eyebrow. But Torre is mindful of Kuo's lifelong arm problems, and Wade had a 1.06 ERA in September and had given up one run in five postseason games.

In the Phillies' bullpen, Lidge told rookie J.A. Happ that Victorino was about to drive one down the right-field line. He wound up almost catching it.

Then Stairs, 40, teed off on Broxton. He has hashed 254 homers in a serpentine career that has taken him to 11 major league teams. But none was as important or majestic as this, which landed more than halfway up the right-field pavilion and created the 7-5 lead.

It also put the Phillies into the land of Lidge, who has not blown a save this season and was not going to start here, even though he surrendered the ritual double by Manny Ramirez and watched his strike three to Martin become a wild pitch. He ended it when former Houston teammate Jeff Kent lined to third baseman Pedro Feliz.

Looking back through the wreckage, two quiet defensive plays kept the Phillies in range.

In the first, Victorino barehanded Loney's drive off the center-field wall, and combined with Utley on a blurry relay that kept Dodgers at second and third. When Joe Blanton retired Blake DeWitt, it stopped the Dodgers at one run.

In the sixth, the Dodgers went up by two when Casey Blake homered and Ryan Howard made one of his oafish throws while fielding Rafael Furcal's bunt. With one out and the bases loaded, DeWitt scalded a low liner, but second baseman Utley dived for it and then handwalked furiously to tag second and double up Furcal.

"Chase makes a lot of diving plays like that," said Davey Lopes, the old Dodger second baseman who is now a Phillies coach.

"And that kind of play keeps the inning from snowballing. It keeps us close, and we come off the field knowing we're still in the ballgame."

The Dodgers are, too, but they're a little shattered right now, like a vase and a ballgame they can't replace.

Jones acquires WR Williams in trade

By Jean-Jacques Taylor
(Dallas Morning News)

IRVING, Texas — Some days, you wonder whether Jerry Jones is the smartest owner in professional sports. Other days, you wonder whether he's the dumbest.

But you never wonder if he's doing everything within his power to win his fourth Super Bowl.

Ever.

Jerry is the only owner in sports who could defuse the public butt kicking he was going to get over Adam Jones' indefinite suspension Tuesday by acquiring a top tier receiver like former Texas star Roy Williams from Detroit for a package of draft picks, including a No. 1 in April.

Unbelievable.

Ultimately, though, that's what you have to love about Jerry, if you're a Cowboys' fan. Trust me, it's not like that in every city with a pro franchise.

Do you think Bill Bidwill has done everything possible to make the Arizona Cardinals a winner? Nope. What about Donald Sterling, who owns the NBA's Los Angeles Clippers? Of course not.

Too many owners keep their teams as investments. If they win, then that's a bonus.

Don't get me wrong, Jerry adores money as much as anyone. That's why he's been a maverick when it comes to creating revenue from marketing. And that's why the price for the personal seat licenses at the new stadium are obscene.

But the Cowboys have never lost a single player because Jerry didn't want to spend the money. They never will.

To Jerry, the Lombardi Trophy is priceless. He will spend whatever it takes to win the sixth in franchise history.

He proved it Tuesday by acquiring Williams.

It has been a tough week for the Cowboys, ranging from Adam Jones' altercation with his bodyguard to the embarrassing loss to Arizona to Tony Romo's broken pinkie to Felix Jones' partially torn hamstring to Mat McBriar's broken right foot to Adam Jones' indefinite suspension.

Adding Williams changes all that.

Now, it's about this underachieving team trying to win enough games over the next 11 weeks to make the playoffs and find a rhythm because no one is going to want to deal with their offense in the postseason.

Not when Tony Romo gets back.

The Cowboys already had one of the league's best offenses before adding Williams, who adds speed and athleticism.

He gives Dallas a better chance to win a Super Bowl than it had on Monday. I know I said yesterday that I was officially ending all Super Bowl conversation, but this represents a one-time exception.

Williams, who caught 64 passes for 838 yards and five touchdowns last season, has 17 catches for 232 yards and a touchdown this season.

Just two years ago, he caught a career-high 82 passes for 1,310 yards and seven touchdowns. Let's be real, he's never played with a quarterback remotely close to being as good as Romo, when he's right.

Jon Kitna is just a guy.

As Detroit's No.1 receiver, Williams has been the recipient of double coverage and schemes designed to slow him. Now, teams have a choice: double cover Terrell Owens or Jason Witten or Williams.

You can't double cover everyone. Someone is going to get single coverage. Then it will be Brad Johnson and Romo's responsibility to find them.

The addition of Williams also makes Patrick Crayton and Miles Austin more dangerous. Crayton can return to being a slot receiver, where he excels, and Austin will get to attack third and fourth corners.

But this deal is about more than this season. It's about improving the Cowboys' long-term future. It's the kind of forward-thinking move that separates Jerry from some owners.

T.O., who's 34, has two years remaining on the three-year deal he signed in the off-season. While he remains an elite player, we may be starting to see the beginning of his decline.

Williams gives the Cowboys a 26-year-old talent who should be an elite player for the next five or six years.

The price was high, but that's never bothered Jerry. He's only interested in the return.

Horne, Cruz give QB Coen elite targets

Offense solid all-around as Nelson, receivers produce

BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Just two weeks ago, the Massachusetts football team was struggling defensively. In the first four games of the season the Minutemen exhibited defenses that UMass coach Don Brown is not exactly noted for.

The Minutemen (4-2, 2-1 Colonial Athletic Association) proved that their defense is still something to take notice of in their 17-7 victory over Delaware. They struggled some in Saturday's 28-24 win over Northeastern, but this upcoming weekend they have the chance to prove to the rest of the CAA that the UMass defense is anything but a pushover.

No. 9 Richmond visits McGuirk Alumni Stadium for homecoming. The Spiders boast one of the strongest offenses — and defenses — in the conference.

UMass Football

ON HIS BACK

Starting running back Tony Nelson never has a dull game.

Nelson registered his seventh touchdown of the year on a 1-yard rush against Northeastern. Aside from scoring, Nelson was also very busy. He rushed for a career-high 37 times and ran for 175 yards — his highest total of the season.

With that total Nelson now has tallied five 100-yard rushing games in his career — four coming this season.

Nelson isn't only a running threat, he has dependable hands that UMass quarterback Liam Coen has called upon 11 times. Nelson has totaled 84 yards and one touchdown.

See FOOTBALL on page 9

Junior wide receiver Jeremy Horne ranks second on the Minutemen with 27 catches and 411 yards. Along with junior Victor Cruz (48 catches, 620 yards), Horne helps provide quarterback Liam Coen with reliable targets down the field.

Mass Attack off to good start

Meyers honored, special-teams units inconsistent early on

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The opening weekend of the Massachusetts men's hockey team's season has shown how a team can change overnight.

Last Friday, the Minutemen struggled scoring on Michigan State's goaltender Jeff Lerg, but they impressed Spartan's coach Rick Comley with their speed. UMass (1-1) didn't finish plays and had issues breaking the puck out of the defensive zone.

But on Saturday, all of the problems from the night before faded away. Scoring was no longer an issue and goaltending was solid. The Minutemen defeated then No. 5 North Dakota, 4-2.

UMass Hockey

Playing against elite hockey teams, like Michigan State and North Dakota, benefits the Minutemen. As the program grows, UMass continues to work towards being one of those elite teams. This past weekend allowed UMass to measure itself against some of the best teams in the nation.

Younger skaters saw ice time, giving them the opportunity to benefit their growth and development when skating with some of the best players in college hockey.

SPECIAL TEAMS

The Minutemen's special teams made a drastic improvement from one game to the next. On Friday UMass' power play went 0-for-6 and had trouble maintaining control of the puck. But against higher-ranked North Dakota, UMass' power-play unit capitalized on two of its four power-play opportunities.

The first power-play unit (Justin Braun, Alex Berry, James Marcou, Cory Quirk and Chris Davis) had two shots on North Dakota goaltender Aaron Walski. Marcou scored on both of them. The combination of older players has made it easier for the Minutemen to move the puck around the ice, screen the goaltender and create more looks on offense.

The second power-play unit (usually including Topher Bevis, Martin Nolet, Brett Watson and Michael Lecomte) is a younger

See HOCKEY on page 9

Senior captain Cory Quirk has two assists in two games this season for the Minutemen. He had 11 goals and 18 assists last year.

The Mass Attack finished last weekend with one win and one loss during the Ice Breaker Tournament at Agganis Arena in Boston. Next up for UMass is Rensselaer in Troy, N.Y. on Oct. 21.

New men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg has landed four high school recruits in the past few weeks. Javon Farrell and Raphiael Putney recently committed to the Minutemen for the 2010 and 2011 seasons, respectively.

Kellogg adds two recruits

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

College basketball kicks off on campuses throughout the country Friday for the annual "Midnight Madness." The Massachusetts men's basketball team is no exception, as the Minutemen will host "Klub Kellogg" in the Curry Hicks Cage at 7 p.m. to show off the new-look roster and new coach Derek Kellogg.

But in the past few days it's been less about the immediate future and more about the 2010 and 2011 seasons, as Kellogg has received two more commitments from high school players.

Javon Farrell (Upper Marlboro, Md.) and Raphiael Putney (Woodbridge, Va.) have committed to UMass. Farrell, a senior, is a 6-foot-5 guard and Putney, a junior, is a 6-foot-9 forward.

Farrell and Putney join Max Esho (6-foot-7 junior forward from Baltimore) and Freddie Riley (6-foot-5 guard from Oscala, Fla.) to the list of committed recruits.

CROSS COUNTRY

Andrew Mulvaney helped the men's cross country team finish in fifth place (out of 47 teams) in the New England Championships.

Mulvaney's personal ninth-place finish out of 316 runners in the 8K course (finishing time of 25 minutes) resulted in an Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week Award.

Sean Duncan crossed the line 20 seconds behind, finishing in 31st overall. Sean Carle placed 43rd.

TENNIS

The UMass tennis team will play its first and only dual match of the fall season today against Connecticut in Storrs.

The match was originally scheduled for Oct. 1 but had to be pushed back two weeks because of weather concerns.

The Minutewomen last played from Sept. 26-28 in the Eastern Collegiate Invitational in West Point, N.Y. UMass had an impressive showing in the event, as Laura Danai and Maude Leclerc-Savoie won the second doubles flight and Candyonce Boney and Tanisha Hodgson won their respective singles consolation brackets.

UMass' fall schedule ends with the Big Green Invitational from Nov. 7-9. After a two month layoff, the Minutewomen return to action on Feb. 1 against Long Island in Amherst.

LACROSSE

In fall action, the men's lacrosse team participated in the Catamount Classic for a Cure Event to help raise money for the Dana Farber Cancer Institute.

The first-time event, which was held in Braintree, Mass., helped raise close to $30,000.

In addition to UMass, Brown, Bryant, Dartmouth, Holy Cross, Fairfield, Providence and Vermont all participated.

The Minutemen were 2-0-1 in the tournament, besting the Crusaders and the Catamounts and trying the Big Green.

Spousal hiring causes controversy in HTM

BY LISA DEBENEDICTIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The recent hiring of Professor Haemoon Oh as the department head of the Hospitality and Tourism Management department at the University of Massachusetts has caused some debate on campus.

The contention is over the University's choice to also hire Oh's wife, Professor Miyoung Jeong, as an associate professor in the same department.

While spousal hiring, or the hiring of professors as couples, is fairly common in universities, the hiring of Oh and Jeong aroused some concern because of his position as department head, making him his wife's boss.

Dr. Robert Griffin, a professor in the Hospitality and Tourism department at UMass, said in an e-mail to the HTM faculty as received by the Daily Collegian that "if it [spousal hiring] involves an administrator and a subordinate, that's nepotism [favoritism based on a family relationship] and that's just wrong."

Griffin also insisted that the hire was actually illegal, citing the Massachusetts Conflict of Interest Law for the Public Officials and Public Employees No. 268A, that, according to Griffin, "[…] prohibit[s] the hiring of an administrator in conjunction with a subordinate spouse."

According to the administration's response, the hiring is in fact legal, as long as the faculty are able to "cure the conflict of interest."

Griffin responded in the e-mail that "the best way to 'cure the conflict' is to simply not create the conflict."

Griffin additionally contacted Professor Oh and Professor Jeong, Chancellor Cole and the State Ethics Commission via e-mail, stating his opposition to the hiring.

However, not all of the professors in the HTM department are opposed to the hiring.

"I am excited to have both of them here," said Professor Christopher Roberts, another professor in the HTM department. "I see no problem with having them here. We as a faculty are an open group, and if there was a problem with the hiring, we would not hesitate to let the administration know."

Roberts also said that the administration was careful to make certain that the HTM faculty was comfortable with the hiring, both providing them with Jeong's credentials to look over and setting up a presentation for her to give to the department over the summer.

"I see Dr. Griffin's concern, but I think that it [the hiring of the couple] will have the opposite effect for the department. I think it is a healthy thing […] The cost of getting a husband and wife team is worth getting them on the department," said Roberts.

The University has decided to hire the couple, who will be joining the HTM department in January of 2009 from Iowa State University, where they are both currently associate professors.

"Professor Haemoon Oh was hired as a professor and department head of HTM following a nationwide search," said University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski.

"Miyoung Jeong was hired as an associate professor in HTM. This is a straightforward case, common throughout higher education, in which the University offered a faculty position to a highly qualified spouse in order to recruit an outstanding faculty member, in this case a department chair," he explained.

In response to the accusations of nepotism, Blaguszewski responded

Play honors loved one

Fiancé remembers UMass alum

BY CAITLIN QUINN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One young man is spreading his message through a unique medium in honor of a deceased friend and fiancé.

Jonas Toutant, originally from Palmer, Mass., will be holding a benefit "magical play" entitled, "It Happened Just the Other Day: A True Story," in memorial of deceased fiancé and University of Massachusetts alumna Stephanie Parker.

Parker, also originally of Palmer, received a Bachelor's Degree in Women's Studies from UMass in 2004 and was teaching autistic children in the Bloomfield, Conn. public school system when she died suddenly in her sleep last September at the age of 26.

"She had a blood clot in her lung," Toutant said. "She had no idea anything was wrong."

Toutant, currently living in Indian Orchard, Mass., met Parker when they were both attending Palmer High School.

"We became best friends," Toutant said. "When she went off to college we lost touch for four or five years. When we found each other, we picked up right where we left off. I was in love with her, and she knew it."

The two friends became a couple last year and were engaged shortly afterward.

"My spark for life died when she died," Toutant said, adding that he had been "living in the past" during the months after her death. In July of this year, he began to deal with his grief by forming the show's script, which uses magic tricks as a metaphor to explain the life lesson Parker taught him.

"The idea is that life is too short, and 'now' is all that we truly have. It's all about how we choose to respond to the experiences life gives us," he said.

Toutant quotes Parker in the show saying, "Just live in the moment and enjoy."

One act of the play begins with Toutant's initial reaction to the news of Parker's death. He felt numb and a stabbing sensation.

In the play, he performs a needle-swallowing trick.

"I refuse to let feelings like that define me," he said.

Later in the show, which features only Toutant and one assistant, he puts a metaphoric twist on another classic trick. "The straitjacket represents limitations we put on ourselves. We have social and economic reasons why we're not happy," he said.

The Stephanie Parker Foundation, which will be a non-profit as of November, consists of a board of seven of Parker's closest family members and friends.

Toutant said the goal of the foundation is to help people get the money and resources to accomplish their dreams.

"Stephanie was always dreaming and truly wanted to do it all," Toutant said. "The foundation could help someone trying to start a business, a single parent trying to give a child a good Christmas or a couple trying to buy their first home."

Half the proceeds from the Nov. 1 show at Springfield's Blake Theatre at City Stage will go towards the Stephanie Parker Foundation.

Toutant wants to create a Web site with an online application for the foundation. The foundation will first donate a scholarship for a Palmer High School graduating senior this spring.

Another fundamental goal of the foundation, Toutant said, is "to create health awareness regarding family history and medication side effects."

These factors may have contributed to Parker's blood clot. Her only communicated symptom was shortness of breath for a period just prior to her death.

Toutant's eventually wants to perform in other local theaters this January and on Broadway. Proceeds will continue to go towards the foundation.

"The show asks people to dream, and the foundation provides people the solution to allow dreams to come true," Toutant said.

"It Happened Just the Other Day: A True Story" will be on Sat. Nov. 1st at the Blake Theatre at City Stage in Springfield at 8 p.m. Tickets are $25 and $30 each and are on sale through Ticketmaster and the City Stage Box Office.

Astronomer raises questions about extraterrestrial beings

BY STEPHANIE MCPHERSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

What do you get from 100 billion galaxies, each made up of about 100 billion stars, when half to three-quarters of each star is home to at least one planet?

You get life, and a lot of it, according to Seth Shostak of the SETI institute. Shostak gave a lecture titled "When Will We Find the Extraterrestrials? (And What Will We Do When We Find Them?)" last night as part of the Interdisciplinary Seminar for Humanities and Arts lecture series.

As a senior astronomer at SETI, Shostak has authored a number of articles and books, worked on documentaries, podcasts and has been a consultant on science-fiction movies.

The acronym SETI stands for the Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence. Given the staggering number of stars in the universe, life, never mind intelligence, is extremely difficult to find, Shostak said.

"This has been likened to looking for a needle in a haystack," he said. "You know how big the haystack is, we know how fast we're looking, what we don't know is how many needles there are, if any."

The near infinite amount of stars make the search for life seem daunting, gives confidence to the members of SETI. Given that there about one hundred sextillion stars that are visible to us on Earth, it seems impossible that Earth occupies the singular unique place in the universe that allows life to exist, according to Shostak.

"You have to admire that point of view. It's audacious. It makes you special" he said.

That's not to say all life in the universe will have reached the level of intelligence achieved by humans. It is possible that even planets or moons on our own solar system are supporting or supported microbial life.

Shostak and the other scientists working at SETI aren't interested in microbial life. They are focused on beings that have reached at least the brain power of humans, life forms capable of interstellar communication.

Shostak discussed the different methods of detecting extraterrestrial

New York teachers sue over political paraphernalia ban

BY BEN WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In the latest clash of this hotly debated election, teachers in New York are suing over their right to wear political paraphernalia while on duty.

Coming on the heels of the University's own debate about teachers' involvement with political campaigns, this newest dispute takes the issue of first amendment rights.

The New York City teachers' union filed the lawsuit against a policy banning political pins and signs in schools, according to the New York Times.

The New York Department of Education sent a memo to principals weeks ago directing them to enforce a policy of neutrality while on duty.

Randi Weingarten, president of the United Federation of Teachers, said the policy is rarely enforced and that teachers have long "[balanced] their obligations as professionals and their responsibilities as citizens," according to the Times.

Nevertheless, the Department of Education contests that courts have ruled teachers do not have an "unfettered right to express their personal views at school."

According to the Times, Normal Siegel, a civil liberties lawyer involved with the case said some courts have also ruled in favor of teachers' expressing political views so long as it did not interfere with learning.

UMass journalism professor Steve Fox said he doesn't recommend banning expression, but it is a difficult area.

"My advice [to journalism students and professors] is not to wear political paraphernalia or be involved with advocacy groups, but that's always a suggestion not a ban."

He said this was slightly different from the UMass employee who earlier this month attempted to give credit for participating in political campaigns because it wasn't a case of state funds being used to promote a candidate.

"We are just weeks away from a landmark presidential elevation that is being discussed in classrooms and at dinner table across the nation […] students can only benefit from being exposed to and engaged in a dialogue about current events," said Weingarten at a press conference last Friday.

The Massachusetts Department of Education could not be contacted in time for publication.

Grant funds pacemaker safety

BY DOMENIC POLI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University of Massachusetts assistant professor, Kevin E. Fu, who earlier this year explained that implantable heart defibrillators are vulnerable to hacking, received a grant to advance his work of increasing future security in implanted cardiac devices without risking safety and effectiveness.

The National Science Foundation (NSF) plans to fund $449,000 over three years of Fu's research. He is an assistant professor of Computer Science aiming to create stronger designs that can be wirelessly programmed and relay patients' data to doctors via the Internet. But some warn securing patients' privacy and security is nearly impossible.

"With medical devices, we don't have the luxury to fix security after the fact. This is where our research comes in," Fu said. "We're getting in early enough to influence the design and provide cyber trust."

He hopes to design and test zero-power technology and low-power cryptographic protocols for implantable medical devices as the first element of his two-part study.

Zero-power means the device will run without draining the batteries.

Cryptographic protocols are ones that perform a security-related function and use methods of hidden information and numbers.

The second part of the study will include interviews with patients receiving new implanted cardiac rhythm management devices, such as pacemakers, at the Electrophysiology Laboratory at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston.

"Any time a professor receives a grant of that amount, focused on that sort of innovative research, we're very pleased and believe that's a strong indication of the strength of Kevin's work," University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski said.

Fu, along with colleagues at the University of Washington and Beth Israel, displayed how a hacker can reset a defibrillator to deliver a fatal shock. The frequency with which doctors and patients interact in secure settings makes technical manipulation admittedly unlikely, but bringing the Internet into the equation or allowing wireless re-programming introduces another level of concern.

The team of researchers wants to work out any kinks and get feedback from patients who will be asked about their expectations for security, privacy of their medical information and how much trust they place in the devices.

According to a University statement, the lives of millions of Americans are improved due to devices such as implantable heart defibrillators. It noted that 600,000 patients in the United States have defibrillators, and an estimated 2.5 million overall have devices of varied types, such as insulin pumps, neurostimulators for chronic back pain and vagus nerve stimulators for intractable epilepsy and major depression.

But Fu and his colleagues learned that some devices can be compromised, either accidentally or deliberately, when they started this line of research by "reverse engineering" an implanted cardiac device to cause malfunctions.

Fu earned his doctorate in electrical engineering and computer science from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 2005. He joined the UMass Department of Computer Science as an assistant professor later that year.

Cheney hospitalized with heart problems

By Dan Eggen
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON D.C. — Vice President Dick Cheney, who has a history of heart problems, is experiencing an "abnormal" heart rhythm and will be taken to George Washington University Hospital for an outpatient procedure this afternoon, Cheney's office said Wednesday.

"During a visit with his doctors this morning, it was discovered that the vice president is experiencing a recurrence of atrial fibrillation, an abnormal rhythm involving the upper chambers of the heart," spokeswoman Megan Mitchell said in a statement.

Cheney will visit GWU Hospital for an "outpatient procedure" to restore normal rhythm to his heart, Mitchell said.

Cheney, 67, has suffered four heart attacks since the age of 37 and has had quadruple bypass surgery, two angioplasties and an operation to implant a defibrillator device to monitor his heartbeat. An electric shock was administered to his heart at GWU last November to restore his heart rhythm.

Cheney canceled an appearance at a fundraiser Wednesday in Illinois for GOP congressional candidate Marty Ozinga.

Cheney had the defibrillator implanted in 2001 to regulate his heartbeat, and doctors replaced the device last year when its battery began to reach the end of its life. Cheney also had surgery in 2005 to treat aneurysms behind his knees, was treated in 2006 after he felt short of breath, and developed a blood clot in his leg after a long trip to Asia in early 2007.

Last year was the first time that Cheney's doctors had detected atrial fibrillation, which causes the heart's upper chambers to beat too quickly, creating the risk of a clot that could eventually become lodged in the brain and cause a stroke.

Mitchell said in an interview that Cheney arrived in the office at his normal time of around 7:30 a.m. and asked to see a White House physician. She said she did not know what symptom prompted the request.

During Cheney's last episode of atrial fibrillation, he had sought treatment for a persistent cough. Cheney is expected to undergo the same low-risk electrical shock treatment as he did last time, Mitchell said.

Motivational anxiety

UCLA studies stress benefits

By Selva Tervyan
Daily Bruin (UCLA)

LOS ANGELES — The university environment can fill the life of a student with multiple stressors ranging from worries about grades and test performance to a more general fear about what the future holds in store.

"Feeling anxiety, especially about life after college, is natural," said Andrea Niles, UCLA psychology researcher. "It is actually even beneficial and a motivating force to feel some form of fear," she added.

"It becomes an anxiety disorder when a higher level of fear than that which is adaptive occurs," Niles said. "Those who suffer from it and experience enough fear will engage in avoidance behaviors which perpetuate the disorder."

To address this issue, researchers at UCLA are diving in to get a full understanding of the many different types of anxiety to develop more effective treatments and to get the word out to the public that anxiety exists but can be minimized to improve one's quality of life.

The newest project coming out of the UCLA Anxiety Disorders Research Clinic is a study assessing the differences between two forms of treatment: cognitive behavioral therapy as well as the new application of mindfulness meditation as therapy to treat anxiety.

The study uses a functional MRI brain imaging tool to assess the changes in brain activation after patients received one of the two treatments during a 12-week period, Niles said.

The study will be done of people suffering from social anxiety, the fear of being severely judged in social situations, and general anxiety disorder, which is the excessive worrying about areas of life that can be trivial and out of one's actual control.

While in the fMRI brain scanner, participants will be exposed to their fear, which will be intrusive images such as a crowded room, said Michelle Craske, professor of clinical psychology at UCLA.

Limited research in the past has found the activation of the amygdala, an area of the brain responsible for emotion and fear regulation, gets dampened after cognitive behavioral therapy (CBT), which teaches the patient alternative ways of thinking and acting, Craske said.

In addition, the prefrontal cortex, responsible for higher order thinking and planning, is activated more after the treatment, allowing the person to override their emotions with rational thought, she added.

The big questions will be to see whether the mindfulness therapy, termed acceptance and commitment therapy, will cause the same pattern of brain activation in participants.

Mindfulness meditation is a form of mental training where the mind acquires skills that teach one to become fully of aware of their own experiences and live in the now, said Lobsang Rapgay, professor in the Department of Psychiatry and Biobehavioral Science at UCLA.

"There are many treatments already in place for anxiety, such as CBT, which is highly effective. But there is still room for improvement," Rapgay said.

People who are overly anxious have been shown to talk to themselves excessively, Rapgay said. CBT may inadvertently increase self-verbalization and as a result maintain the anxiety in the long run.

In fact, Rapgay said that those who suffer from anxiety disorder usually suffer the most when they are alone with their thoughts, in the early morning and late at night.

With mindfulness, patients are thought to become aware of themselves in the present moment and observe their experiences in a more detached way in order to get a more objective moment-to-moment perspective, Rapgay said.

"This helps to replace the habit many have of coloring the present with unresolved issues from the past which bias experiences," Rapgay said.

Anxiety disorders, at their deepest core, are formed due to misinterpretations of experiences in life.

Mindfulness teaches one to become aware and understand the moment without coming up with possibilities that have no evidential backing.

"If you hear a sound of a car, mindfulness teaches you to learn to experience the sound of the car rather than immediately think that an accident has occurred," Rapgay said. "Only when you attain real access to the event can you form a conclusion."

Rapgay believes that a hybrid of both the psychotherapeutical CBT and the mindfulness therapy will be the most impactful in treating anxiety, with CBT focused on teaching an alternative way of thinking and mindfulness bringing the person back to the present moment when the mind begins to stray and worry.

Rapgay said that for students, all of whom experience some form of anxiety at some point, practicing the skill of mindfulness could help in the management of everyday stressors.

It is not a clinical therapy, but a meditation that anyone can learn. But, just like any other skill, mindfulness requires practice; up to 20 minutes each day for three months. However, the perks of increased attention and awareness of the present moment are well worth the work, Rapgay said.

Movie quotes studied

By Tyler Sharp
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN, Kan. – Researchers at Kansas State University are trying to determine why and how people quote movies during everyday conversation.

Richard Harris, K-State professor of psychology, examined these questions in a study, "Social Movie Quoting: What, Why and How?," which was published in the August edition of Ciencias Psicologicas.

The study – the first of its kind – found that 100 percent of those surveyed had quoted a movie in conversation before.

According to the study, lines were quoted almost accurately or completely accurately about 90 percent of the time.

Those surveyed also said they most often quoted comedies, primarily to amuse themselves and others.

Harris' subjects were college students in introductory-level psychology courses.

Chris Garlow, junior in business administration, said he and his older sister often quoted movies when they were younger, just to make each other and their friends laugh.

"I have latched onto that, and it has become ingrained in me," Garlow said. "It was a great way to express myself and have a good time and be goofy."

Harris said he had the idea for the study after a research meeting revealed no one had investigated the behavior of quoting movies.

So Harris, a cognitive psychologist who focuses on how people learn from the media, decided to study this behavior.

"The first thing we did is a very qualitative study of asking people if they had quoted a movie in a conversation," Harris said. "It told us a couple things.

"No one ever said, 'We don't do that.' It also gave us some ideas for categories to use on a study that would be quantitative.

Subsequent studies occurred in February 2006 and January 2007. Harris said recent movies were quoted most.

In 2004, "Napoleon Dynamite," was the most commonly quoted movie. Harris said the movie did not appear as often in later studies.

According to the study, the top three quoted movies, accounting for 24 percent of quoted lines, were "Dumb and Dumber," "Anchorman" and "Napoleon Dynamite."

While Harris studied college students for all three of his research projects, he said he would like to study the same habits in older adults.

He said studies that compare movie-quoting to other social behaviors are in the future.

Subjects will receive four similar stories all ending with a different movie quote and will be asked questions like, "Do you like the people better?" and "Do you enjoy it more?"

"When we quote movie lines in conversation, it's kind of a joke," Harris said. "We're going to try to compare those two a little more."

Columbia professor found guilty of plagiarizing students

By Jon Resnovitis
Columbia Daily Spectator

NEW YORK – After running out of options at Columbia University to reverse being fired, Teachers College professor Madonna Constantine filed a lawsuit against the school with the New York Supreme Court on Friday.

Constantine, a tenured professor of counseling and clinical psychology, gained notoriety last October when a noose was found on her office door and sparked a national debate about racism in academia. Police have not found the perpetrator.

In February, Columbia announced that Constantine had been found guilty of plagiarizing passages from the work of three former students and colleagues. After Constantine appealed the decision, the college found her guilty once again and raised the penalty from undefined sanctions to termination pending appeal.

The law firm of Paul Giacomo will argue Constantine's case under an Article 78 proceeding of New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules, which allows Constantine to challenge the process by which Teachers College decided to fire her as being "arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable" under state law. This means that the New York Supreme Court will use Columbia's own rules to evaluate the process of Constantine's termination.

Article 78 is a blurry area of law because it appeals an internal procedure to state court. The court will judge the case based on Columbia's internal procedures, which can be vague.

Constantine has said that she feels her "due process" was violated and is thus extending the process beyond the university.

Marcia Horowitz, of press relations firm Rubenstein Associates, who Teachers College appointed to speak about Constantine on its behalf, declined to comment because she said the school had not seen a copy of the lawsuit by Sunday evening.

Over the weekend, several news sources reported that Constantine was suing Columbia. In fact, Constantine is suing Teachers College, Columbia's affiliate. The case comes after several internal appeals to faculty committees. In a previous statement, Giacomo said that Constantine could seek payment for "job actions taken against her" under federal and state employment law.

Though Teachers College's Faculty Advisory Committee had already rejected an appeal of sanctions imposed on her based on plagiarism charges, this summer Constantine appealed the committee's recommendation. The appeal, announced in a letter addressed to college President Susan Fuhrman from Giacomo's office, claimed that Constantine's termination was retaliation for Constantine's appeal of the first decision. The letter demanded a "de novo" or brand new investigation of all plagiarism charges and called for the removal of professor Barry Farber from the faculty committee due to a conflict of interests.

Giacomo, who was out of town this weekend, argued in the summer appeal letter that Teachers College should not use statements by Constantine condemning the institution as grounds for her termination. He claimed that this violates her First Amendment rights.

"The vague reference you make to a document submitted to the media ... cannot provide a pretext for my client's termination," the letter said.

Specifically, Giacomo condemned the "secret" nature of the investigation, the circulation of documents among the Faculty Advisory Committee and trustees, and "attempted blackmail" of Constantine to provoke her resignation.

In the original decision against Constantine in February, independent firm Hughes, Hubbard & Reed found that Constantine had used "strikingly similar language" to some of her students' in her work. The decision named three individuals who had complained about Constantine's plagiarism – former professor Christine Yeh and students Tracy Julaio and Karen Cort. Teachers College paid for their legal indemnity, or insurance for legal consequences the revelation of their names might cause.

Since that verdict, Spectator has learned that several other individuals have leveled charges against Constantine, but they were not granted the same legal privileges and thus kept their names hidden. Sources have also said the ordeal dates back to years before Fuhrman's presidency and includes allegations of misused departmental funds.

The Faculty Advisory Committee dismissed Constantine's earlier appeal, saying that her evidence was not verifiable. Representatives from Giacomo's firm said they went to great pains to verify evidence – submission letters from editors that seem to prove that Constantine wrote the passages in question first – and circulated a spreadsheet detailing evidence of Constantine's alleged innocence for each allegation of plagiarism.

Constantine is still listed in Columbia's faculty directory and on the Teachers College Web site as a professor of psychology and education.

Alien contact anticipated by 2026

intelligence. The first method is to look for artifacts. He addressed crop circles, saying it is highly unlikely they were caused by aliens.

"These things tend to pop up overnight…and over the weekends," he said. "Maybe [the aliens] have strange labor laws." He outlined an extraterrestrial senate's elaborate plan to come to Earth and "carve graffiti in their wheat," highlighting the ridiculousness of the charge. He chalked it up to students who get too bored on the weekends.

It is possible to detect life by looking for signs of astro-engineering, or means of travel through space. Because the age of the universe, (about 13.7 billion years) is so much older than the age of our solar system (about 4.6 billion years), it's feasible that other planets had billions of years longer than us to create life said Shostak.

"Plenty of time for societies to be literally billions of years ahead of us," he said.

The most plausible way of detecting life, however, seems to be looking for a radio broadcast from other worlds. No matter what alien beings might be doing in their day to day life, they could be broadcasting, much like we have been for decades.

He showed a photo of a large detector set up in Puerto Rico that can see one third of the sky and can detect a few thousand watts. This detector looks for a narrow band signal, or small disturbances in radio waves that are not accounted for in earthly routines. According to Shostak, we need to "find the 'on the air' sign."

Shostak believes they will be detected within 24 years. He cited numbers provided by three prominent astronomers, Carl Sagan, Isaac Asimov and Frank Drake. The three predicted extraterrestrial intelligence will be detected between 2015 and 2026.

"I feel moderately strong this is correct," Shostak said. "I bet you a Starbucks coffee. Unless there is something fundamentally wrong with our calculations we will have made contact by the year 2026," he said.

But who's to say the aliens haven't already arrived? According to statistics offered by Shostak, pulled from a poll conducted by CNN, 65 percent of Americans indicated they believe there was a UFO crash in Roswell, N.M., while 80 percent say the government is hiding information about aliens.

Shostak is very skeptical about this saying that aliens crashing in Roswell would mean they successfully navigated billions of light years, then "make a navigational error over the deserts of New Mexico."

And aliens would have to travel billions of light years. Unless aliens were out, perusing the galaxy for planets rife with life, they would be unable to detect planet Earth until relatively recently.

All light travels at exactly 300,000 kilometers per second. A light year is the how far light travels in 31,556,926 seconds, which turns out to be a little more than 9 trillion kilometers.

Earth started broadcasting its location about 60 years ago with television and radio. These signals have only been able to travel 60 light years in that time.

"If they're here now, they can't be [living] more than 30 light years away," Shostak said.

Since nothing can move faster than the speed of light, it would take 30 light years for the information to reach the aliens, then 30 light years for them to reach Earth. Because there are only a couple thousand stars in that radius from Earth, it seems unlikely that this is the case said Shostak.

Aliens probably aren't here on Earth, and we are another couple of decades away from detecting their signals. This gives Shostak and other SETI scientists time to reflect on what they will do when they finally make contact.

"The first thing that would happen," Shostak said, "We would open the bottle of the champagne that is sitting in the refrigerator."

The astronomers can also imagine what the extraterrestrials would look like, or what they would do to the planet. Right now, they don't have too many ideas.

"Fortunately, Hollywood does," he joked. "They're either here to trash the planet or abduct you."

As for the bulbous head and black, almond shaped eyes? "This is just a representation of what we think we're going to become," he said. Shostak believes, with the exponential rate at which technology evolves, any contact with aliens will be contact with artificial intelligence, the remnants of a highly evolved civilization.

One major question Shostak asked is "If we ever do make contact, will we even understand what we are hearing?"

"If we pick up a signal not meant for us, we may never figure it out," he said.

This leads to a question that was inevitably asked during the Q&A session at the end of the lecture – "why even bother?"

"I think [we] do this because of curiosity," he said "It comes from a need to know whether life here on Earth is special or is this something as common as cheap motels?"

that, "To ensure the integrity of this process, the University only makes spousal appointments if the appointing department concludes that the spouse is fully qualified, and we take steps to eliminate any conflict of interest by ensuring that no one is involved in making personnel decisions about a spouse."

Blaguszewski added that in situations such as this, the school would not allow Oh to be in charge of some aspects of Jeong's career, to prevent potential conflicts of interest as outlined in the Massachusetts State Ethics Laws.

"For instance, in this case, Associate Dean Jay Gladden would make any decisions regarding compensation and promotion for Miyoung Jeong. In all such cases, the University complies with Massachusetts law and the University's own conflict of interest policies," said Blaguszewski.

In an e-mail response to Griffin, Professor Oh himself also stated that he and his wife intend to have "separate lines of reports, supervision, performance evaluations, promotion decisions and decisions related to other issues on employment conditions for each of us […] More than anyone else, I have no desire to become a boss of my wife."

"I am a student of Dr Griffin. He spoke to our class for about 20 minutes about this issue, during which he showed us some of the correspondence," said UMass student and HTM major Steven Graves. "I am in the HTM major and, based on the information presented by Dr. Griffin, I feel that this could have a negative impact on the students in that major. I also feel that it is an ethical issue for the entire college."

Blaguszewski defended the hiring of Oh and Jeong as a means to the acquisition of two excellent professors for both the department and the University.

"No University can compete nationally for the best faculty to teach its students unless it has the ability to make such appointments, and UMass Amherst has made a number of similar hires in the past," he said.

Motion picture 'Bradley effect'

By John Horn
Los Angeles Times

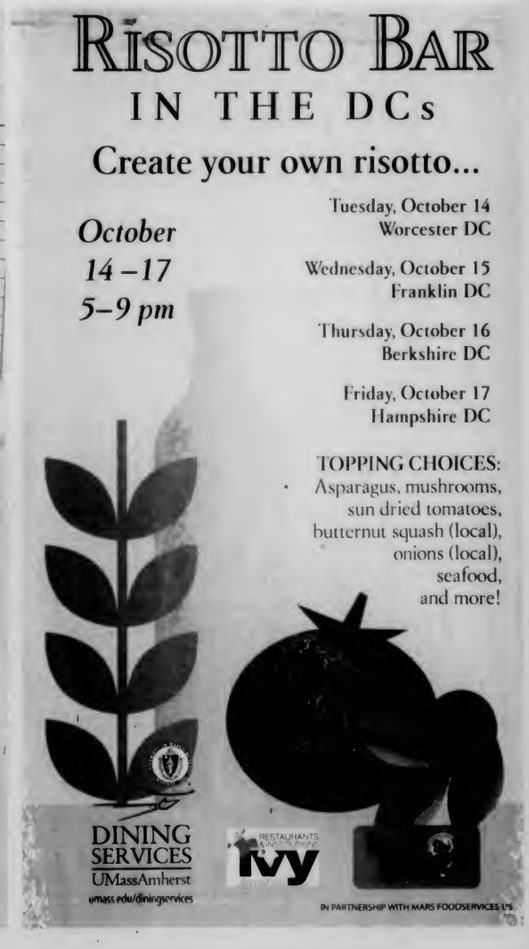
HOLLYWOOD When DreamWorks was about to release "Amistad" 11 years ago, white moviegoers told pollsters they planned to see Steven Spielberg's epic slavery drama. But when the film actually arrived at theaters, Caucasian ticket buyers mostly stayed away. "Amistad" is Spielberg's lowest-grossing movie over the last two decades.

More recently, 2004's musical biography "Ray" was greeted with approving reviews and two Academy Award wins. Despite all the acclaim and the fact that white adults not only collect Ray Charles records and CDs but also attended his concerts in droves – the film's ultimate audience was overwhelmingly black, about 7% percent of all admissions.

Pundits and election strategists have been deliberating feverishly whether white voters who tell interviewers they intend to vote for Sen. Barack Obama for president will really do so once they enter the polling booth. While the discrepancy known as "the Bradley effect" (named after former L.A. mayor Tom Bradley's 1982 loss in the California gubernatorial election, in which he consistently led in polling) may prove to be a minor factor in this year's presidential race, it is still a prominent concern within Hollywood, as movies made by and with blacks often struggle to attract white supporters – both at the box office and within the studio's executive offices.

Friday's "The Secret Life of Bees" provides a perfect test case on the mainstream appeal of a high-brow movie partially anchored by top black stars. Starring Queen Latifah, Jennifer Hudson, Alicia Keys and Sophie Okonedo (with Dakota Fanning in the lead role of Lily Owens), "The Secret Life of Bees" – adapted from the 2001 novel by Sue Monk Kidd. In part because its primary story unfolds in the home of three black sisters and is set in 1964, the movie took seven years to get made, its makers say.

"It was a concern around town, absolutely … a period piece with African American women," says producer Lauren Shuler Donner, who optioned the novel's film rights before it became a runaway bestseller.



But that kind of narrow thinking … Focus Features put "Bees" in turnaround, and other studios passed on the project before Fox Searchlight and Will Smith's Overbrook Entertainment stepped up to produce it … might prove to be more scaredy cat-cautious than post-racially prescient.

While 20th Century Fox's "Max Payne" is poised to win the weekend box-office race, "Bees" is showing strong appeal among a swath of female moviegoers, and not only blacks.

According to a recent audience survey conducted by the National Research Group, 56 percent of black moviegoers expressed "definite interest" in "Bees," while nearly a quarter of those surveyed said the film would be their first choice this weekend.

In part because so few white men are interested in the film, the "Bees" numbers among Caucasian audiences are significantly lower, with 34 percent of white audiences showing definite interest, and 6 percent naming "Bees" as their first moviegoing choice (When Fox Searchlight tested the movie, it scored equally well with white and black audiences.)

Around Campus

Nobody's false prophet

S.P. Sullivan

This was supposed to be a column about religious tolerance.

Michael Woroniecki, the transient self-ordained minister of John Edwards stock (that's "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God" John Edwards, not thousand dollar haircut John Edwards) found his way to the University of Massachusetts campus last Wednesday. Woroniecki travels the country – and sometimes the globe – with his wife, Rachel, and their six children.

They all seem very nice.

Woroniecki looks like a football dad – and actually was a college football player – and Rachel looks like she could've been his high school sweetheart. Their daughters Ruth and Elizabeth speak several languages and can recite biblical verse at will. They told me that they just wanted to talk about how great God was but that very few people on this campus would behave civilly towards them, let alone listen.

They said they just wanted people to listen. I happen to be a very good listener.

"I'm not one of your typical right-wing Republican evangelicals," Woroniecki said in an interview. "Those George Bush Christians," which he called "the work of the devil."

At this point we were on the same page.

And the reaction from passersby: the sneers, the mockery, the cynicism, were everything I've come to hate from my fellow nonbelievers when dealing with devout Christians.

OK, maybe they're wrong, but you're a jerk. Woroniecki seemed to handle it all with grace, supplying appropriate verses from John, Ch. 3 and Luke, Ch. 12 to justify his cause. He went to Fuller Theological Seminary, one of the toughest seminary schools in the country, so he definitely knows his stuff. He took it all in stride, too.

"Rejection, hatred, scorn – that's Jesus," he said.

"I'm just the postman that brings the mail. People don't hate the mailman, but they hate me," he said.

"—Just like they hated Jesus!" interjected his daughter, Ruth.

Like who? I don't think the United States Post Office would appreciate Woroniecki's comparison, let alone Jesus Christ.

A Google search satisfied any remaining curiosity about the Woroniecki family. Everything he said about his past – that he was a football star in college who made a deal with the Lord after a series of injuries; that he travels the world with his family, stopping at every major college, university and crowd of three or more to yell at them about Jesus; that he has been beaten, yelled at, spit on and arrested for his behavior. But he left a lot out.

He left out his hobby of going to various college campuses and calling his detractors "fags," which isn't something I think Jesus would do. He left out that one of the Woroniecki favorite haunts is Brigham Young University, where the "Mormon scumbags" hang out.

He left out Andrea Yates, the woman from Texas who killed her five children to save them from being condemned to hell in 2002. Yates and the Woronieckis had been exchanging letters, in which Michael Woroniecki was telling her all sorts of things Jesus wouldn't have said. While the court of public opinion has convicted Woroniecki for Yates' mental breakdown, I'll suspend judgment. Jesus would prefer it that way.

He left out his hobby of going to various college campuses and calling his detractors "fags," which isn't something I think Jesus would do.

But Mike Woroniecki is no Jesus. Everything Woroniecki said in the interview rang pretty true. He was critical of the half-assed religiosity that given many Americans a rigid belief system they know very little about. He described the traditional American church scene as: "Alice on the organ, fat cat Bob the priest – pass the hat around and they're home for kick-off."

And he's got a point. But the Church of Woroniecki has "fat cat Bob" driving an RV, Rachel subservient taking care of the six children in the back and half the family is brought up on charges for harassing Mormons at BYU.

I took Woroniecki as an old school, nomadic man of God type preacher. I can dig the fire and brimstone approach, even if I don't buy it.

But he's just another false prophet.

At a time when religion is permeating public policy, underlying the "clash of civilizations" going on between the West and Middle East and still – after thousands of years of subdividing and hair-splitting – causing war and strife, the last thing anyone needs is another hypocrite telling them they're going to hell.

"The people that hate us and persecute us," Woroniecki said. "Most of them are the so-called Christians that get angry and reveal their hypocrisy."

Well, bad Christians have a tendency to do that. But it's the good ones that get hurt in the process.

Abolish income tax

John Glaser

A recent New York Times article on the coming Massachusetts ballot initiative to repeal the state income tax quoted the Massachusetts secretary of administration and finance as saying, "These are tough times for everyone as it is, and if Question 1 (the income tax repeal) passes, things will become exponentially more difficult."

This staggeringly foolish argument belies the facts and is based upon the premise that the Mass. state government is the singular reason any citizen is on their feet at all.

It presumes that the state is one of the leaders of the nation in prosperity and progress due only to the beloved, beneficent governing institution presiding over it. The idea that excessive and increasing government revenue is what keeps the citizens of Massachusetts afloat is simply unsupported by the evidence.

The annual revenue from the state income tax is about $12.5 billion and the passing of this initiative would ostensibly eliminate that amount of the annual budget. Many in opposition to this repeal say it would be a devastating loss in essential governmental services, but these claims are far from realistic.

While the official budgetary documents claim the annual budget is currently $28.5 billion, that number is inaccurate. State government expenditures also include non-budgeted spending, capital spending, expendable trust spending and others that are excluded from the statutory budget.

With these taken into account, the budget elevates to about $47.3 billion. The repeal would thus leave $34.8 billion in the annual budget, which is comparable to what it was in 1999 (that chaotic era of medieval anarchy). Which essential governmental services can't be taken care of with $34.8 billion?

On the other hand, the repeal would leave the average Massachusetts taxpayer with an average $3,700 of their own money left in their own pockets; a potentially dramatic difference in yearly income at a time when people are strapped for cash.

But even this is a distraction from the overall point. The notion that higher government spending is a causal factor in a stable and well-serviced public is fundamentally flawed. It can easily be exposed as such with an objective surveillance of the hindrances that excessive government intervention confers on the people.

The budget is not taken up with money spent on essential government services.

With an overly interventionist state government driving the cost of living up with programs like urban rent control, which the overwhelming majority of economists agree is harmful and drives up costs, and the monopolization of the inner-city schools, which leaves the youth in a dreadful state of educational underachievement, cutting spending can only help.

Additionally, a 2007 Census Bureau revealed that between 2000 and 2007 the rate of poverty in Massachusetts remained virtually flat, despite the broader declining economic circumstances on a national scale.

Interestingly, 2000 was the very year that voters approved a reduction in the state income tax from 5.75 percent to five percent (although the state legislature halted it at 5.3 percent). Evidently, a decrease in the state income tax does not correlate with declining conditions of the citizenry and services.

It takes only a brief mention of infamous examples of government waste like the Big Dig, excessive pensions for government employees and the multitude of bloated bureaucracies in the Commonwealth to see how dispensable the state income tax is.

Police details at construction sites (Mass. being the only state in the Union that has deemed this an essential governmental service) cost $94.3 million annually. Cut the fat, and we can comfortably afford the elimination of the income tax.

The budget is not taken up with money spent on essential government services, but rather an impressive amount of pork.

Aside from wasteful spending, a more precise understanding of the system would lead people to realize that the government rarely has "the children" and "the needy" as high priorities.

Rather, government employees, lobbyists, special interests groups and the like subsume the bulk of budget allocation, despite the idea of many that the state government is wholly a manifestation of charitable public endeavors.

Seven other states in the Union have no income tax and two apply the tax only to interest and dividends. And, while the naysayers in Massachusetts would have you believe otherwise, those states are not struggling to get by. Schools, hospitals and police are in the same conditions as before the income levy was eliminated, except, perhaps, with less waste and counterproductive programs. Massachusetts should follow suit this November.

An elimination of the state income tax in Massachusetts is not only the logical, pragmatic thing to aim for, but it is the moral, just thing. Help minimize the adverse effects of the heavy hand of government and give the people back what they earn each year. Vote Yes on No. 1.

Four days, insuffice

Nicholas O'Malley

With the country's current economic quagmire, almost every aspect of living has taken huge hits. From road to jobs to healthcare, everything is suffering.

One of the areas that is doing the worst, though, is our country's education system.

Schools across the nation are forced to make cuts across the board as they scramble to balance their budgets. However, the South Carolina school system a proposed a radical idea – a four-day school schedule.

Such an idea is not unprecedented. The current state of school budgets has forced administrators to examine every possible plan to get them out of their financial hole. South Carolina is merely the first to seriously consider it.

The main challenge for the proposal is the mandate in South Carolina, in which, like other states, schools must be open for 180 days in a year. So, within such a context, the only option for a four day school year would be to cut into school vacations.

This result, though, would not be the worst case scenario.

Let's face it: summer is a romanticized time of year. When we think of summer, we conjure Hollywood images of beaches, baseball fields, pools and parties. But more often than not, summer includes sunburns, tedious jobs and only hanging with the kids who stay in town.

Think about it, kids don't need three months to sit around and complain about having nothing to do. There are only so many things that are actually accomplished during the summer.

You go to the beach, an obligatory family trip, visit distant relatives, go to a summer camp, watch one live sporting event and, if you're unlucky enough, spend the last week doing all of your summer homework at once.

Now, you may be complaining that there are countless little things in the summer that you love to do – which is a valid point. However, with a four-day school week, every week is an extended weekend. How much time in a week do you spend doing things other than hanging out with your friends?

Of course, there are also the financial benefits of such a change. According to a Boston Globe report, savings would include less fuel for buses and less winter heating for classrooms. The fewer number of classes in the winter would also allow for more time to clean up snow on weekends and reduce snow days. A four-day week would reduce the number of holidays that would interrupt school weeks if Mondays were removed from the week.

Academic administrators have also come forth with the proposal that the length of school days be extended. With such a system, the same amount of work could be accomplished in fewer days, reducing transportation costs and maintenance for the days schools are open.

If the number of days in a school week were simply reduced by one, officials estimate that the state of South Carolina would save $10 million from keeping buses off the road.

With the four-day school week, one potential issue would be what to do with the extra free day. It would be optimistic to believe that kids would be productive on such a day.

Kids would be less than enthusiastic to do the extra homework that would be assigned by teachers with more off days. Rather, the shenanigans that high school students get into already would be magnified.

The implementation of a four day system would be a detriment to the contemporary school system.

Therefore, the four-day week presents an opportunity for schools to get infinitely creative with extracurricular activities. Instead of having clubs and sports teams meet every day after classes end, schools could allow for such groups to have extended meetings on the free days.

Schools could even include such a program into the curriculum. Students could, as an elective course, become part of academic clubs or organized intramural sports leagues that would be far more productive than non-required courses.

Reducing the amount of schools days would allow schools to present options outside of the classroom. But with our current education system, which places incredible emphasis on standardized test scores, this seems unlikely.

When it comes down to it, the mere mention of revolutionizing the school week speaks volumes of the current economic troubles. The implementation of a four-day system would be a detriment to the contemporary school system. It would also be a drastic change to the culture of those still in school.

A shift to a four-day school week would not be a remedy to the current funding problems for schools. It may allow for open-ended learning and schools, less spending and more free-time for students, but in our contemporary education system, more funding is the only solution.

Nothing wrong with a third party

Ben Moriarty

What happened to Ron Paul and his overly zealous supporters – the majority being Libertarians and internet nerds?

And that guy Ralph Nader, supported by hippies and liberals alike. And what about Ross Perot? I have no idea who supported him; I was always too fascinated that his surname reminded me of "Parrot."

And George Wallace – he was the guy who wouldn't let the black students into the Alahama school where Forrest Gump picked up the girl's notebook.

This latent racism occurred but a half century ago when it was acceptable. Thankfully his political independency didn't tarnish the immaculate image of the current party that is founded upon Protestant principles and values that really know how to humanize humans.

Phew.

What was the name of that Protestant group that George Wallace fought against again? Is it the Koo Koo Klan or something? The whole intolerance against homosexuals and people of other faiths reminded me of another group I get confused a lot. Nobody's perfect.

I digress. The problem here is the fact that all these brilliant candidates and politicians grew great voter support, but were put down like sick kittens for one reason.

They were not part of the bipedal two-party system which tries to walk forward with its head in a dark and lonely place. They were third-party candidates. Granted Paul isn't, though he should be, considering his stances and that he's now backing Baldwin and not McCain.

It is not a result of candidates' ineptitude that no one thinks third-party candidates can win, but instead they are never given a real chance by the press, debates, and as a result, by people. This psychological plague won't be cured until the press and politicos open up the door to others in this inaptly named greatest democracy.

The lesser-of-two-evils vote is the epitome of this false dichotomy. I would say what the hell is everyone smoking, but ironically, hippies seem to get that they can vote for other candidates.

Really, people need to just start looking around. How many times have you heard people say, "I'm going to vote for the lesser of two evils," or "I'm not going to vote at all because I don't like either candidate."?

A vote for a candidate you truly want to become president is not a wasted vote

All the while, there are many other candidates who share ideals closer to theirs but aren't even considered.

Reports have shown that over 60 percent of people are dissatisfied with the two-party system. So what do we do? We continue to feed it, prolong it and elect people who don't want anything other than the two-party fiesta, because that would mean a decrease in their likelihood of winning.

The Democrats don't sue Nader off the ballot for giggles. This is the greatest democracy.

We continue to believe that a third-party candidate will never win, despite the fact that the majority wishes this wasn't the case. We believe that third-party candidates aren't viable options, despite the fact everyone wishes they didn't have to vote for either that Democratic guy or Republican guy.

Really?

People say you will be wasting your vote. I have yet to understand how voting for someone who you want to be president is wasting your vote, even if you reside in a swing state.

The change you want, be it to alter the Electoral College to help third parties and democracy itself, to select a president, or whatever, is only possible by doing this.

It would also make the winner a candidate who people actually wanted, not just some person who most people preferred over some other guy.

Though, I would love to see that celebration on election night. Cheering and rooting for someone just because you didn't want someone else to win. It's almost sadistic, in a way. The United Sadists of America. Starting a War in a Country Near You.

That's a movie that would win some Oscars. Or it's a documentary that would win some frowns from the United Nations. When it came out on DVD they could throw in some of those yellow ribbon magnets. Show everyone you drive by your patriotism, baby. It ain't no virtue of the vicious. And I digress.

The reason for voting is a purely selfish one. You are voting to elect someone most resembling you. It is absolutely terrifying when people limit themselves to two options, which, unless you are zealous and maniacal, you don't subscribe to fully, and which, by electing them, propagates this narrowing democracy for the future.

A vote for a candidate you truly want to become president is not a wasted vote. A wasted vote is a vote for someone who you don't want to become president.

An inconvenient cup

Melissa Garber

Ever voted by coffee cup? 7-Eleven, or 7-Election if you want to go by what the first 24-hour convenience store morphs into come election season, forces customers to do just that.

7-Election has been operating since the 2000 elections, when its partisan cup purchase results accurately predicted a Bush win within a percentage point.

Last weekend my mom randomly picked a red John McCain cup. Is she a Republican? Is she voting for McCain? That's not the point. Why should her local 7-Eleven cashier be privy to her political whims?

According to 7-Elections national poll results, Obama is ahead of McCain in coffee cup purchases by 18 points. Does that mean 7-Election is in sync with the American public? Or do Obama supporters drink more 7-Eleven coffee? Are McCain supporters Starbucks drinkers?

What if 7-Eleven consumers, in their rush to get their coffee, pick a cup that doesn't reflect their politics? This kind of negligence skews the 7-Election outcome and compromises the integrity of the whole system.

There is always a margin of error, but how high is acceptable before the poll is disregarded as a legitimate gauge of the nation's views?

One million cups of 7-Eleven coffee are sold everyday – those numbers alone make 7-Election cups a viable voting vehicle to determine the next president. How many straw polls can boast those kinds of numbers?

The credibility of 7-Election comes into question when the politics of 7-Eleven store owners is considered. What if a registered Democrat and 7-Eleven supply manager, ordered extra Obama cups?

The results of 7-Election in that precinct should be nullified. Who would tell 7-Eleven headquarters in Dallas? Where, by the way, 7-Eleven could supply every single citizen, every single day, a cup of coffee.

Or worse yet, what if your local 7-Eleven ran out of your political party's cups? When your coffee cup is a political statement, you probably shouldn't make the wrong one.

Not only are your cup decisions registered in an online poll, but the cashier, the person behind you in line, and everyone who catches you red-handed – McCain cup in tow, knows who you're voting for come Election Day.

Some people, like my mother, don't want to vote via their coffee cups. They don't care if their cups coincide with their voter registration card, but the rest of the world is apt to judge them either way.

And just how evenly spread is 7-Eleven in this country? The poll map has grey boxed parts of the south, mid west and New Mexico. Does that mean those states are sans 7-Eleven?

Should those states be taken off the electoral map for the sake of consistency?

It is the only way 7-Election can be reflective of the nation.

The significance of cups in the coffee consumption process has greatly increased since 7-Election was put on the map. It makes sense, coffee has always been a political decision. Fair trade or the best quality 100 percent Arabica beans grown in Central and South America (exclusively sold at 7-Eleven)?

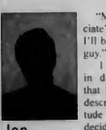
Where you purchase your coffee says a lot about your character. Now it says a lot about your voting record.

That is unless, of course, you are a registered Independent. 7-Election took a strong stand when it left out third party candidates. Your local 7-Eleven does not come equipped with Nader cups.

It is clear 7-Election has no interest in a plural system of government. Nader is on the ballot in 45 states and D.C., more than 7-Eleven can say about its outreach across the country. So where's Ralph?

7-Election may have predicted a Bush win in 2004 that tracked identically with published national election results, but it disenfranchised third party voters and non-coffee drinkers.

How can one participate in 7-Election without an affinity for convenience store coffee? What does that say about the 7-Election voting demographic?



If 7-Election is going to represent the country, as it should with one million partisan cups sold a day, it needs to be more inclusive. And careful, the poll results are unfortunately skewed toward the favor of 7-Eleven employees, cup manufacturers and coffee drinkers.

Maybe in 1789 when there was only one candidate running for the highest office in the country, George Washington, this kind of alienation would fly. But check out the 7-Eleven Web site – it even admits there were none in existence, yet.

Corrupted work

Jon Peterson

"Maybe I'll finish my associate's degree, you know, then I'll be a head up from the other guy."

I could only shake my head in disbelief at the comments that I heard from a friend who described the nonchalant attitude of another student who had decided to take the direct route to success.

They finished an associate's degree to become financially independent. And to be as serious a competitor for a good entry-level position as anyone out there.

Nowhere is it more relevant and noticeable than in the five college area that getting a degree from a four-year university has become the new standard that was once occupied by high schools.

Without discourse, you may get cheated out of, or into deals which work significantly more as a cost to you than a benefit

Even a school as active and dedicated a program as the Isenberg School of Management, which is ranked highly by the Princeton Review, has fewer available positions, which further puts a strain on a school where few top financial shops go.

Fewer positions are open to students at other top management schools. So students will now be looking harder for fewer positions, and may very well be brought in by companies which offer far less in terms of education potential than sheer grunt work.

Seeing College Pro on campus recently brought back memories of my own experiences with the company only this past summer. The certainty of an A.A. in Business Management only recently received had tickled my whiskers and brought me to Boston with the promise of a promising summer position. One which I could become the business man that I knew no one really could become just by attending class.

America could not allow me to fail and almost at once I had received an interview with College Pro, a company which describes its summer interns as "Franchise Managers," who work directly with the company to attend educational seminars, set up regionalized markets and find clients for their house painting services.

Plus, they will payroll each intern four thousand dollars for the summer, plus commissions. There were cases of people making upwards of $10,000 for the summer months – almost enough to fully pay for the other three-fourths of the year at a state school. The theory is ideal, but often enough in business, theory and reality clash in rather unbecoming ways.

The devil is in the details, as usual. Sure enough, when I was told I would be given a "trial by fire," I found through Google the horror stories which dissuaded me from continuing on with them.

A boy working 100 hours a week, pushed by his boss to perform, went into a nervous collapse and was informed at a mental institution. Then he had his pay docked to the extent of two thousand dollars to the company for tools and painting materials.

A young man described himself as the only employee left at the end of the summer of the 11 who were hired. A student at Central Michigan University owed 2,600 dollars in royalty fees to College Pro. This lead to the company being turned down for endorsement by the school, and was banned from on-campus hiring.

Correlation and causation aside, I asked the authority (the man who had offered me the position only hours before) to explain these blogs and reviews. Every company has their own disgruntled former employees, and that may have been the case here, as was explained.

Recanting the work contract details that the CMU student had described, the company's seminar attendance and travel policies of the company, everything may very well have been cleared up in minutes. That the interviewer has not called or e-mailed back in five months, though speaks of something else.

Civil discourse and skepticism are both necessary for a person to five to their full potential. Without discourse, you may get cheated out of, or into deals which work significantly more as a cost to you than a benefit. Without skepticism, one would never consider the possibility that when something sounds too good to be true, it probably is.

Our business students are among the hardest working in the country. No one can rightfully say we at U. Mass are a lazy bunch, but at some points, enough is enough.

When an employee and spokesperson for a company's policies chooses to not talk about its methods, he does more harm than could ever be done by saying anything, even if it is incriminating.

The moral is to stay safe, and for our business people to consider opening their own businesses this coming summer. Many students have done so in the past and landed themselves life long careers, as did College Pro's founder.

As for the friend who saw an associate's degree as the expedient to a good career, I can only give a few words of advice people are getting Masters now. Get a PhD. Then you'll be a head up from the next guy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

FREE SPEECH

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Smear Tactics Gone Too Far," Scott Harris, Editorial, October 14.)

Anyone who has read my letters recently would know that nothing would have pleased me more than to pick apart Ted Rogers' latest column. His misapplication of Ike's "military-industrial complex" farewell address of Jan. 17, 1961, to today's military spending is ripe for an historical critique, but a more ominous train of thought caught my eye, and it demanded an immediate response.

If Scott Harris has his way we might as well redact the Constitution … just cut out the first Amendment, because there will no longer be such a thing as freedom of speech.

Under his legal philosophy, if you are critical of someone for associating with some third person who you don't approve of and a fourth person hears your criticism and then murders the person you criticized, you would be guilty of that crime.

How else can one interpret his statement that: "If … something were to happen to Obama … it would only be appropriate to seek a criminal indictment of [McCain and Palin] … for inciting violence."

By his reckoning, Keith Olberman should be held responsible for the crime of David Kernell, should he be found guilty of the alleged hacking of Sarah Palin's e-mail account, because Olberman was critical of Palin, thus inciting Kernell to break the law.

Just because it is not reported does not mean that there is not an equally high level of vitriol directed at McCain and Palin by Obama's supporters.

If you doubt that there are as many on the left who advocate violence against Republicans then spend some time on the Daily Kos or Huffington Post Web sites. The truth is that, no matter how despicable we might think it to be, neither party can be held responsible for the bile of their most maladjusted proponents.

I can only hope that the editors of The Collegian are as horrified by Harris' line of thinking as I am, because if he gets his wish, someday it could be they who are indicted under "Harris' Law" when some far left cook commits an act of violence against some Republican's person or property.

It is certainly Harris' right to speak out against McCain's and Palin's criticisms of Obama, but to stretch that to the point of legal responsibility for any action that any of their supporters might take is not only ludicrous, it is a threat to the very freedoms upon which our democratic republic relies.

Noam Chomsky was right, for once, when he said: "Freedom of speech is worthless without the freedom of offensive speech." There is nothing worth defending so much as our freedom of expression, and by definition that must include the identical right of those whom each of us finds most offensive.

The Real Cause of Hunger

Dear Editor:

(Re: "Why so wasteful?" Solmaaz Yazdiha, Editorial, October 9)

While I agree that world hunger is a major problem around the world (according to the United Nations World Food Program over 10 million people die a year from hunger-related causes), I disagree on the stated causes in Solmaaz Yazdiha's editorial ("Why so wasteful?" October 9).

The problem behind world hunger is not food waste, but food distribution. According to the United Nations' Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) there is enough grain to give every person on earth 3,500 calories, and food production continues to outpace population growth.

And that only includes the food currently being produced. Meanwhile, 854 million people are undernourished (FAO). Simply put, there is far more than enough food in the world to feed everyone.

The problem is that it is not profitable to give food to people who can't afford it. The drive for profit even causes hunger by discouraging foreign farmers from growing food.

For instance, the flooding of cheap corn to Mexico from U.S. agribusiness in past decades has caused many Mexican farmers to go out of business, making Mexicans dependent on the U.S.

When U.S. food prices subsequently increased, many had trouble affording this corn. U.S. agricultural subsidies are used to actually prevent farmers in the U.S. from growing food, or to buy up food in order to keep food prices, and therefore profits, high.

Furthermore, U.N. food aid only allows the food to come from the U.S., and is used as a tool to compete with foreign agribusinesses, not to feed the hungry.

According to the U.N. Development Program, it would only take 80 billion dollars to provide for unmet basic needs in the world. Compare that to the $700 billion Wall Street bailout, or the well over one trillion dollars spent on the occupations of Iraq and Afghanistan.

If we want to end world hunger, eating less won't change anything. Food must be distributed not for profit, but for human need. Having food should be a right.

Mysterious Masonry

Pioneer Valley provides a home for world's oldest fraternity

BY ANDREW SHERIDAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If you have ever read "The Da Vinci Code" or seen "National Treasure," you have, most likely, heard of the Freemasons.

In recent years, they have become a popular topic among film and print media, having been portrayed historically as iconic and devious.

What many don't realize, however, is that Freemasonry is not simply a mysterious fraternity of ages past.

It is alive and well in Massachusetts, and its real nature of the organization may come as a surprise.

Simply put, Freemasonry is the world's largest fraternity.

It is open to all men over the age of 18, and active lodges can be found on countries, worldwide. Membership is granted regardless of race, religion or socioeconomic status, with the intent of "making good men better."

Masonry, as it is often called, is believed to have originated in Scotland over four hundred years ago, where it began as an association of stonemasons and builders.

Handshakes and passwords were invented to help keep trade secrets within the group, lest they be out of a job. Over time, non-craftsmen were allowed to join, and eventually, the focus on actual construction faded away.

Freemasonry is still named as such because it uses the tools of the craft as symbols, representing the building of a life upon a stone structure. The signs and emblems that many interpret as cryptic messages are actually symbols of morality, honesty and friendship.

The group is best known as a secret society, but that is only half true.

While its meetings are held behind closed doors, little of what goes on is closely guarded.

Over the past two hundred years, the symbols and teachings of the fraternity have become more and more public, and today they aptly refer to themselves as an "open society with secrets."

The "secrets" so often referred to are mainly ceremonial, such as the handshakes and gestures that members use to identify one another.

Members of Greek life may be surprised to learn that many of their rituals and rites are rooted in a Masonic lodge.

ACT presents new musical

BY MICHELLE FREDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Trying to veer away from fatigued renditions of Shakespeare plays and popular musicals, the Arena Civic Theatre (ACT) will present an innovative musical, "In Good Spirits," beginning Oct. 17.

The musical is a comedy about five incompatible ghosts who all died in the same theater. They come from different historical periods and died for various reasons. As a result, the ghosts must haunt the theater where they all perished.

A new group of actors takes over the theater, but they cannot afford to pay their rent.

The bulk of the musical revolves around whether the ghosts will haunt the actors or give them a helping hand.

The contrasting historical backgrounds of the different ghosts and their mismatched natures are meant to bring a comic element to the production.

One ghost is an actor from the period of the Civil War and the second is a 1920s flapper. Two others are high school sweethearts from the 1950s, and the final ghost is a 1990s drag queen named Tequila Mockingbird.

"In Good Spirits" is the brainchild of Howard Odentz, a local author and composer.

Odentz works at MassMutual in Springfield as a communication consultant and enjoys writing musicals in his spare time.

"In Good Spirits" is his first original comedic musical. It debuted in Connecticut in 2004 and was first performed in Massachusetts in 2006.

Auditions for this October's production were held locally this past June at the Jones Library in Amherst as well as Artspace Community Arts Center in Greenfield.

This has given the show a local cast, drawing from different portions of the Pioneer Valley.

Similarly, the roles of the five ghosts will be played by local actors. Steve Woodard, of Leverett, will play ghost Laslo Miller and Northampton resident Dawn Ross will play Edie O'Reiley. Dave Peck will play Tequila Mockingbird (aka Melvin Ira Orenstein) and Don Biard will play Salvador Secconado, both of whom are Greenfield residents. Sarah Kaczmarek, of Sunderland, will play Bunny Hopper.

Director Robert Ducharme has had much experience with the Arena Civic Theatre. He has been working with the company since the summer of 2001, when he directed the renowned comedic play, "You Can't Take It With You."

Ducharme has since directed five other shows for the Arena Civic Theatre, both musical and otherwise, including "Brigadoon," "Arsenic and Old Lace," "Hedda Gabler Has Left the Building," "Tintan's Rainbow" and "The Phantom Tollbooth."

Choreographer Melanie Reneris and musical director Amy Roberts-Crawford collaborated with Ducharme on "The Phantom Tollbooth," and the three are teaming up again for the ACT's fall musical.

Founded in 1970 by Ann Christern, the Arena Civic Theatre is a non-profit community theatre organization that has been producing plays and musicals in a variety of venues for years.

From 1971 to 1987, the company performed at the Franklin County Fairground's Roundhouse, producing a full summer season.

A pioneer for punk

Jonathan Richman will perform at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. Richman has released 23 studio-recorded and live full-lenth albums during his extensive musical career.

BY JAN NELSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Forget the likes of Joe Strummer, Sid Vicious and Joey Ramone. According to rock critic Chris Colin, the true "godfather of punk" was born in Natick.

The Massachusetts native he speaks of is none other that the Modern Lovers' Jonathan Richman, who is set to make an appearance in Northampton at the Pearl Street clubroom tonight with longtime accompanier Tommy Larkins.

Richman's legacy is unique in many ways, though one aspect which stands most noticeably is his prolific back catalog. Including recordings with his Modern Lovers, this year's "Because Her Beauty Is Raw and Wild" solo effort, and everything else in the nearly four decades in between, he has released 23 studio-recorded and live full-lengths, almost one every year-and-a-half.

Richman stands out also because of the complex evolution from his early mid-70s "proto-punk" of the Modern Lovers to his more recent multilingual, acoustic recordings. "Roadrunner," the classic Lovers' tune from their John Cale-produced debut recorded 1973, released 1976), has been praised for its simplicity in the vein of the Velvet Undeground's "Sister Ray" and its few-chord minimalism.

These minimalist tendencies meshed well with the bottled up frustrations of youth to form a raw and streamlined sound which diverged from the gaudy glam rock of the time, going on to influence endless artists including many from the late-70s punk movements in Britain and New York.

Richman was clearly not pleased with these particular ventures, prompting his desire to re-record the demo material which had already been put to tape. In 1974 the original Modern Lovers disbanded.

In 1976, after Richman traveled westward to California a year

Traditional English foods not all bland

BY CHRISTINA FONG
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When people think of good food, home-cooked Italian dishes or posh French cuisine usually comes to mind.

Traditional English food often conjures up images of bland-looking steamed vegetables and mashed potatoes served alongside a prepared meat. English food isn't typically on the top of people's list of favorites.

In fact, the only dish recognizable in America that is well-liked is fish and chips, a meal consisting of battered fish, traditionally cod or haddock, with a side of fries.

Fish and chips shops, also known as "chippies," are fairly easy to find in London. They're considered the British equivalent of the American favorite take-out meal, burgers and fries.

Fish is central to an English diet mainly because Britain is an island nation. Just as beef is fundamental to America with its large population of cows, fish is also essential to Britain because of its availability.

"I order pizza two to three times a week to avoid the monotony of the other items in my diet," said Jonathan Meadows, a junior at the University of New Hampshire. He said he orders pizza mainly to avoid the food served in the school cafeteria.

A few lesser known dishes that are still well received are bangers and mash, a combination of sausages and mashed potatoes, shepherd's pie – made of minced lamb – and vegetables and topped with mashed potatoes and the customary Sunday roast, which is comprised of roast meat, two different types of vegetables and potatoes.

Surprisingly enough, Yorkshire pudding, a dessert course typically served in England, also tops the list.

The traditional English breakfast, which includes eggs, bacon, sausages, fried bread, mushrooms and baked beans, is another meal most American's are familiar with.

"I think their breakfast is vastly superior to our breakfasts," Joshua Buttenhoff said, a freshman from Regent's College. "They have the beans. We just don't have the baked beans in America for breakfast."

"I don't particularly like it. I couldn't have it every day. It's kind of bland, actually," Buttenhoff said of England's cuisine.

Something that has been improved on is the English lunch, with sandwiches made readily available in a variety of food chains, including EAT and Prêt A Manger.

Sandwiches are commonly known as a "butty" or "sarnie" and they can be found on practically every block in London.

"You can get better quality food faster than, say, McDonalds," Hope Goodin said, a junior from Webster University.

Other places that aren't specifically tied to British food culture are Costa Coffee, which Buttenhoff compares to a more quaint and cheaper Starbucks, and Pizza Express, which is a classier and a bit more expensive pizzeria.

Another chain is Nando's, a Portuguese-themed restaurant that originates from South America and specializes in chicken dishes.

For being the cultural epicenter that London is, any type of food can be found in the city.

One type of food that has become increasingly popular recently is Indian food. The great influx of Indians into London has resulted in them being the largest ethnic minority group in the capital.

The Anglo-Indian dish, chicken tikka masala, has been heralded as Britain's national dish.

However, despite the large number of London's Indian restaurants, they aren't truly representative of authentic Indian cuisine.

Some students anticipated the diverse food selection London offers.

"I was expecting a lot of international food, like a lot of Indian food. Stuff from where the British Empire was," Derek Smith said, a junior from Drury University.

In this capital city, a good mixture of traditional and cultural cuisine reflects the general variety that defines London.

'Body of Lies' fails to stand out from crowd

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The third time is not necessarily the charm for the team of director Ridley Scott and Russell Crowe. The pair has teamed up in the recent success "American Gangster," and also in the multi-Oscar award-winning, "Gladiator."

In their latest collaboration, "Body of Lies," Crowe stars alongside Leonardo DiCaprio ("The Departed") and Mark Strong ("Syriana," "Babylon A.D.").

The film, based on the novel by David Ignatius, is set mostly in the Middle East following Roger Ferris (DiCaprio), a CIA operative, as he tries to find Al Qaeda leader Al-Saleem. Back in his hometown, Ed Hoffman (Crowe) instructs Ferris, and watches him from a spy-craft in the sky.

Ferris finds an ally in the form of the head of the Jordanian General Intelligence Department, Hani Salaam (Strong). This bond is ultimately shortlived, as Hoffman begins to operate without informing Ferris.

Russell Crowe, whose career has had its ups and downs, is not at his best during "Body of Lies." His performance as a CIA boss who calls the shots from the luxury of his home in America falls flat when compared to his previous Scott-directed roles.

Hoffman, as portrayed in the novel, is an overweight, stubborn and considerably ignorant man, who has no conception of what it is like to be on the front line of a war.

Crowe, who acquired quite the beer gut for the film,

Unraveling the truth to security deposit law

BY BERNADETTE STARK
SLSO SENIOR STAFF ATTORNEY

Ask the Attorney

Q: I have to pay a security deposit to my landlord when I sign my lease. I've heard a lot of my friends do not get their deposit back when they leave their apartment. Will I get my deposit back at the end of my lease?

A: A security deposit is money that you pay to a landlord, upfront, in case you damage the apartment or leave owing rent. However, under the law, this money is your money and you should expect to get it back when you move out (unless one of the two circumstances above arises). Unfortunately, some landlords may try to keep the security deposit, even though they have no legal right to do so.

In 1975, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) conducted a survey which indicated that many landlords were wrongfully holding on to their tenant's security deposits and forcing them to sue in order to get it back.

Because the law did not provide any penalties to a landlord for doing this, the tenants did not sue because the court fees and attorney's fees were often higher than the security deposit amount.

As a result of this study, the security deposit law (M.G.L. ch. 186 § 15B) was strengthened to protect a tenant's right to the return of their security deposit.

Now, if a landlord wrongfully withholds a tenant's security deposit (or doesn't comply with other provisions of the law), the tenant can sue the landlord for three times the security deposit amount.

Students are often unaware of laws involving security deposits.

In addition, the landlord could be obligated to pay your court costs and attorney's fees. However, there are certain steps that you should take as a tenant to ensure that you can enforce your rights under this law.

A landlord is also obligated to follow certain procedures when they accept a security deposit from a tenant, including:

1. Providing a Statement of Conditions

Within 10 days of payment of the security deposit, the landlord must provide the tenant with a written statement describing the condition of the apartment, signed by the landlord. You should review this list carefully and be sure to go through the apartment and add any damage that the landlord may have omitted. The purpose of this document is to prevent disputes between you and the landlord about the condition of the apartment when you first moved in, so you want to be sure to have all damage documented as early as possible. If the landlord does not provide you with a Statement of Conditions, then you should make your own list of all the damages in the apartment (even small holes in the walls) and send it to the landlord within 15 days of payment of the security deposit. Also, if there is damage to the apartment, taking pictures is also helpful (make sure you write the date on the back).

2. Providing a written receipt for the security deposit

A landlord is obligated to provide a tenant with a written receipt for the security deposit. This receipt must include very specific information including: the date received, amount received and the bank account where the money is located. If the landlord does not provide this information within 30 days, you have the right to demand the return of your security deposit, even though you are still living on the premises.

3. Holding the deposit in a separate account which accrues interest

The security deposit is your money unless and until the landlord has the right to use it under the law. As a result, the landlord must keep your money in a separate account, so that his creditors can't access it. You are also entitled to earn interest on your security deposit, at a rate of five percent per year, or whatever the bank currently pays on it. Your landlord must pay you this interest when he or she returns your security deposit.

Again, if your landlord has not complied with any of the above provisions, you may be entitled to an award of treble damages (three times damages) and attorney's fees and costs.

Debunking the Freemasonry myths

organization in the country, Masonry has served as a template for many other groups, such as Greek frats and sororities, the Elks and the Knights of Columbus.

Despite the myth, Freemasonry is not a religion. While a belief in a higher power is a prerequisite for membership, the group has no religious doctrines of its own. No specific deities are worshiped, and no one faith is ever excluded.

In the past, allegations have been made that the fraternity was formed in opposition to the Catholic Church, but further investigation proves that that is simply not the case.a

They do not try to control the media or the government either. Such claims often show up in texts which conclude that the organization consorts with aliens.

One of the biggest aspects of the organization is charity work, and as a whole, freemasons in North America give over two million dollars to charity every day.

They are the largest single group of blood donors in the U.S., with most lodges hosting blood drives multiple times a year.

Different branches of the fraternity also operate separate charitable funds and institutions.

For example, the Shriners, best known for their fez hats and tiny parade cars, operate a series of specialty hospitals which offer free treatment to burn victims.

Aside from the secrecy and the charity, Masonry is, at its heart, a fraternity.

Much of what they do revolves around the brothers, with such events as state-wide fairs, lodge dinners, and costume parties.

Not many students would recognize Amherst center's Pacific Lodge at first glance, but they should not be surprised if they know one of its brothers. Membership includes UMass professors, staff, and students, as well as several members of the Amherst Police Department and University of Massachusetts Police Department.

"We're very well involved in the Amherst community," said Jacob Descheneaux, a UMass undergraduate and master Mason.

"We host many social functions throughout the year. We do a pig roast in November, and we're expecting a very large crowd for that," Descheneaux said.

"One of the things we are brining back is the Red Cross blood drives that we host down in our big hall," Descheneaux said, adding that their recent resurgence in membership has allowed the lodge to expand and become more active.

This Saturday, Oct. 18 from 10 a.m. until 3 p.m., Pacific Lodge will open its doors in celebration of Square and Compass Day.

Though not an actual holiday, Square and Compass Day is a state-wide event in that lodges across Massachusetts and hosts open houses.

"We will give public tours of the building and public tours of the lodge-room," Descheneaux said. "We'll answer any questions regarding Freemasonry, and we'll have applications available for any potential new members."

Anyone who still believes in myths such that the Freemasons are brainwashing our children and putting kittens into trees should sit down and talk with one. They would probably love to set the record straight, and chances are, you already know one.

DiCaprio impresses, film disappoints

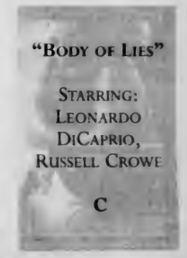
looks the part, but his acting is sub-par for his normal standards. In an attempt to have a Southern, presumably Arkansan accent, Crowe sounds like he is trying to convey a bad Bill Clinton impression.

Crowe's character work has been substantially stronger in previous movies such as the aforementioned "American Gangster" and "Gladiator," as well as in "3:10 to Yuma" and "Cinderella Man." Despite his pedigree, his poor impression-like accents ruing the role for him. It's understood that he is trying to seem cavalier about his job and responsibilities, but the performance comes off as one of his laziest.

In contrast, DiCaprio is remarkable in his role as Roger Ferris, from Romeo to Jack Dawson to Billy Costigan – and now to Ferris. DiCaprio encapsulates audiences with his genuine believability and undeniable talent. Just as he always seems to do, DiCaprio convinces the audience that he is actually Roger Ferris.

Leonardo DiCaprio stars alongside Russell Crowe in "Body of Lies."



Actors such as Robert DeNiro, Ben Affleck and Bruce Willis often impose their own acting styles to every role regardless of the setting. They continue to make films as themselves and people continue to see them, but DiCaprio takes things to a different level. He recreates himself in every role he takes, similar to the late Heath Ledger and Johnny Depp. If anything, "Body of Lies," is worth seeing just for his performance.

Although the title suggests the film is full of lies and deception, it is actually quite subdued when it comes to theatrical plot twists. The basis of the story is not too complicated, but at times the film can seem to drag through long scenes of dialogue.

During the '60s and early '70s, many movies were made focusing directly on the ongoing Vietnam War. Just as today, there is starting to be a heavy flow of Middle-Eastern based action movies (see: "Vantage Point," "Jarhead," "The Kingdom," "Syriana"). This influx of war-time releases illustrates that American movie-goers desire to see war on the big screen. "Body of Lies" is just another film in this tradition.

Looking at the film overall as a typical War on Terror Hollywood rendition, it's pretty run-of-the-mill. Chances are that "Body of Lies" won't break $60 million in the box office, and it is not hard to see why. If war-related action and violence, and the occasional hard-to-watch torture scenes is your thing, then "Body of Lies" is worth a viewing. Otherwise, missing this war-time flick wouldn't be the worst thing to do.

earlier to record his first solo material, he re-created the Modern Lovers, without the involvement of a single original member. This incarnation acted as his backing band, prompting billings as "Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers" and releasing material through the end of the '70s.

After a few years away from the spotlight, Richman emerged as a pop-wielding romantic on 1983's "Jonathan Sings." He reverted back to the 'and the Modern Lovers' moniker for his next few records, embracing a naïve sense of lyricism with mature, introspective songwriting which he hasn't strayed from to this day.

1989's self-titled affair found Richman indulging in covers as well as Spanish- and French-language tracks, while 1990's "Jonathan Goes Country" added twang to select covers as well as re-workings of songs from "Jonathan Sings" before he released seven more records in the '90s.

Richman has never seemed to settle with any form of stardom, even given his formidable resume, as he has continued making intriguing music while keeping up his oft-touted childish persona. He's known to keep things simple, opting for performing solo or with a single accompanying musician.

His new record, released in April on Vapor Records, consists of 14 tracks, mostly world-influenced acoustic pop songs including the mixed Spanish/English of "Es Como el Pan," the French vocal of "Le Printemps Des Amoureux Est Venu" and a cover of Leonard Cohen's "Here It Is."

The album sounds light and airy on the outside, though dark romantic themes lurk within. The second track, "No One Was Like Vermeer," is an ode to Dutch Baroque painter Jan Vermeer, known for his injection of light and rich pigment into the ordinary, creating unreal circumstances for very real subjects.

The title track is a heartfelt song of longing, sporting playful acoustic strums with subtle hand drums, setting the tone for the rest of the record exquisitely. Other standouts include the brooding "When We Refuse To Suffer," which appears as an acoustic ditty on track eight as well as an electric-infused jam on track 12, as well as "Our Party Will Be On The Beach Tonight," some festive, yet restrained and downtrodden 60s California-pop-influenced verses of a covert, youthful pastime.

Richman has stood by a sense of innocence through and through, even into his 57 year. Everyone, young and old, finds solace in nostalgia, while no one, young or old, knows everything: even the experienced are wary of the unknown, and Jonathan Richman acts as one of this sentiment's strongest advocates.

(Richman will perform tonight with featured guest Tommy Larkin and opener Hilton Valentine of The Animals at Pearl Street's clubroom, located on 10 Pearl Street in Northampton. Tickets for the 9 p.m. show are $12.50 in advance and $15 at the door.)

Game makers stress the new

New incentives intended to deflate used video game sales

By Victor Gordinez
The Daily Mississippian

Game publishers and developers have long been frustrated by their inability to get a cut of used game sales at retailers such as GameStop.

Rather than just complain, though, game makers are now starting to provide gamers with incentives to not sell their games at all or, at least, not buy used games.

"Shackness" recently rounded up some of the goodies in upcoming blockbuster games that will only be available to owners of brand new copies of those games.

For example, each copy of Gears of War 2 will ship with a unique, one-time-use code for downloading extra multiplayer levels.

Once the code has been used, subsequent owners of that copy of the game will be unable to download the levels.

And NBA Live 09 will include a similar free, one-time code for accessing daily roster and stat updates.

If you buy a used copy of NBA Live 09 and the previous user has already redeemed the code, you'll have to pay $20 to get the updates.

Game industry experts used to wonder whether downloadable games would undermine brick-and-mortar retailers.

In other words, once publishers start selling their games only as software files that you download directly to the hard drive in your console or PC, there won't be physical copies that you can take in to GameStop to sell.

But an entire game file is now so huge (potentially dozens of gigabytes on a Blu-ray equipped PlayStation 3) that selling that game as a pure download would dissuade all gamers except for those with the fastest Internet connections.

By disabling certain parts of the game for second-hand buyers, the publishers don't have to wait for super-fast Internet connections to spread.

The question now is how gamers will respond.

If game makers now make it standard practice to eliminate some of the features that used game buyers have come to expect, then I expect game sales will simply drop.

That's because the people who buy used games likely don't have a ton of extra cash to spend.

So if a gamer who normally buys discounted used games now decides to buy one new game to get all the features he wants, he'll buy fewer used games.

The makers would probably be happy with that result, since they get some profit from that one new game, whereas they get zero profit from every used game sold.

It's also possible that used game buyers will stop buying used games in protest or buy the used game but do without the disabled features.

All in all, I don't think these efforts by game makers are going to garner much loyalty from gamers, but if they add to the bottom line, the game makers probably won't care.

EA Sport's NBA Live 09 is one of a new breed of video games that offer buyers exclusive bonuses for purchasing new copies of games rather than used ones.

Junior defensive back Jeromy Miles has 34 total tackles this season. Miles and the Minutemen will need to be strong defensively on Saturday against running back Josh Vaughn and the rest of Richmond's aggressive offense.

Spiders strong offensively

Jordan Mitchell (15 passes for 313 yards).

Like many of the teams that the Minutemen have played against this year, the Spiders have multiple options at running backs.

Despite the sharing of touches, Josh Vaughan carries the load. The senior has rushed 119 times recording 570 yards and seven touchdowns. Last week against the Dukes, Vaughan ran for two touchdowns and 94 yards.

"They run the ball fairly well, very physical in the running game and they have three really good wide receivers," Miles said. "We just have to come out, stop the run and stick to everything we do best."

Along with Vaughan, look for Justin Forte, Garrett Wilkins, John Crone and Tyler Kirchoff to get some touches in Saturday's game.

Along with their strong offense, the Spiders also boast a very stingy defense. On the season, Richmond has intercepted 11 passes. Justin Rogers has claim to four of those. Of the four picks, Rogers has returned two of those for touchdowns. Rogers is the Spiders' main kick returner averaging 21.9 yards per return. Derek Hatcher, another Richmond defensive back, has also intercepted a pass this season.

In contrast with their counterpart, the Spiders are very strong up front defensively. Richmond has only 11 sacks thus far on the season, but has stuffed opponents behind the line 46 times.

Amherst High School graduate Collin McConaghy and Michael Ireland are tied for the lead in tackles for Richmond with 45.

Judging by the numbers the Spiders put up defensively, Liam Coen and the UMass offense will have to make as few mistakes as they possibly can. Though the Minutemen defense has played far better than they did in their previous four games, Coen will look to take the early lead against the Spiders to take some weight of the defense's shoulders.

Another key to UMass success will be how it contains the Spiders offense. If the Minutemen can force Richmond to punt then they will have a great chance at favorable field position. The Spiders average only 29.1 net yards per punt and rank second to last in the CAA.

The combination of good field position and solid teamwork could be the game-deciding factor for the Maroon and White.

Coen, Nelson to lead UMass

and second best in points allowed. Per game the Spiders are giving up just 297.4 yards and 19.6 points per game.

But if there was a chink in the Spiders armor it would be their running defense. Compared to its CAA second-best 164.4 yards per game through the air, Richmond gives up 133 yards per game on the ground. The Minutemen's run-game has been the strongest aspect of their offense and will be utilized to attack the Spiders defense.

UMass tailback Tony Nelson had a career day last week against Northeastern when he ran for 175 yards on 37 carries. As the game went on and Nelson took more handoffs, he only seemed to get stronger as he ran for over 100 yards in the fourth quarter alone. Nelson will be expected to carry another big load to help out the passing game against Richmond's strong secondary.

"We got to be able to run the ball to open up the passing lanes and get the play action going," Horne said.

All facets, the running and passing game, of UMass' offense must be sharp, especially in the red zone where it has struggled. The Spiders have allowed 18-of-22 scores when their opponents are in the red zone, but have allowed 11 touchdowns, holding opposing offenses to field goals on seven of those scores.

Forcing field goals aren't the only stops Richmond's defense comes up with in the red zone; they have forced two turnovers as well.

But if history is any indication, UMass quarterback Liam Coen should not continue his trend of throwing interceptions. Coen threw one touchdown two weeks ago against Delaware – his only one since he threw three against James Madison – and has thrown interceptions in his last four games.

Only once in Coen's career at UMass has he had back-to-back games with no touchdowns (Nov. 12, 2005 against Army and Nov. 19, 2005 against Hofstra) and not once in a single season has the signal caller thrown interceptions in five-straight games.

haven't been doing and that's what is most important. We've got to get on the board. Do we have to win two games? No, but we've got to win one of them."

To win, the Minutemen need to keep taking shots and capitalize on set pieces. To have a successful set piece there needs to be a perfect combination of quality service and timed runs. For the Minutemen, the service and runs haven't been very consistent, limiting the scoring opportunities on kicks. But if the Minutemen can get these two things to click they will be very dangerous this weekend.

"We've just got to keep doing what we can do," Koch said. "That's getting the shots off when we have them and do everything we can defensively to close the ball down and win the ball back. And hopefully get good opportunities on counter [attacks] to get more and more shots and shot options."

valuable experience and confidence as a player.

"[His teammates] like him and he's definitely come out of his shell now that he's gotten some playing time. I think he has been a nice addition to the team," Koch said.

Villagomez was a standout forward for Westhill High school in Connecticut, where he started every game in his career, scoring 12 goals along with 28 assists. He decided to join the Minutemen after being impressed by their run to the College Cup, feeling he could contribute to a strong program. It doesn't hurt that UMass is close to his hometown of Stamford, Conn.

"I think anyone would want to come to a final four team, it's not too far away from where I live and it just attracted me that we could win many games this season," Villagomez said.

Villagomez describes himself as technical player with some decent moves. While Koch does not want his players to get too fancy with the ball he believes Villagomez contributes some needed offensive skill. This is especially important for the Minutemen right now as they are in the midst of a four-game scoring slump.

"He gives us something different up top. We haven't been scoring goals so we have to try some different things. He's very good with the ball, he's got good speed, he's crafty, and I think he's going to be a very, very good player. He's worked his tail off so I felt he deserved some time," Koch said.

Koch feels it is too early to tell whether Villagomez has exceeded expectations, saying that while he is a good player, he has not reached his peak. Villagomez feels the same way, and has high hopes for the future of himself and the Minutemen.

"I'd like to see myself contending for a national championship, making the final four again, winning the A-10 conference, being on the A-10 team, just a lot of good things," Villagomez said.

Junior forward Christina Adams has one assist and one goal this season. The Minutewomen look to win this weekend to increase their chances of a berth into the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Minutewomen hope to earn points on road

Success at home helps secure postseason opportunities

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After upsetting previously undefeated Dayton, the Massachusetts women's soccer team retained its unbeaten streak at home dating back to last season's Nov. 2 win over Richmond.

The Minutewomen (6-4-3, 3-2-1 Atlantic 10) have a five-game winning streak at home after tying New Hampshire in the home opener on Sept. 4, 2-2. That streak has allowed UMass to put itself in position for the A-10 Tournament.

"This has finally become our home, and it's nice because there's a consistency here that when we go away we don't get," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The last time the Minutewomen qualified for the post season was in 2004. Back then, they made the tournament despite having a losing conference record (5-6-0).

UMass wins at home are especially important if it wants to keep its A-10 hopes alive. However, it is the away games that the Minutewomen must turn their attention to now, considering they have one win in five matches away from Rudd Field.

In the previous three-game road stretch, UMass went scoreless while giving up three goals.

The trip wasn't necessarily troublesome all-around as some conditions, such as the weather against Temple, made it difficult for the Minutewomen to score. In fact, the only half that didn't go well was the first half against George Washington where they were limited to one shot.

Rudy and Co. will get another chance at improving its road record when it begins the second and final slate of games away from Amherst, starting with Rhode Island today before heading to La Salle and Fordham next weekend. This time, the stretch has potential playoff implications.

The Minutewomen will clinch a berth to the postseason regardless of what else happens if they get 20 points, however, they will likely get in with 18 points if it comes down to that. They currently have 10.

In order for UMass to reach 18 points, it must finish with a record of 3-1-1 to assure its way into the tournament. Last season, the A-10 went back to an 11-game conference schedule and Richmond made it with 19 points.

The Minutewomen can reach that amount with either three wins or two wins and three ties. At the beginning of the season, it would appear that they would have to take care of those three victories all on the road.

But with St. Louis struggling and the success of UMass at home, it can still make a strong push towards November with victories in two of the next three games. Rhode Island and La Salle have had a rough start to the season as both have one conference win.

Despite the Rams' (3-7-2, 0-3-2 A-10) record, Rudy believes they are better than their record indicates. After the win over Dayton on Sunday, the Minutewomen know better than anyone not to underestimate their opponent.

At some point, Rudy figures that URI will break out and become a team that just missed qualifying for the A-10 tournament. Even if UMass pulls off a win, it will be with its defense, which has five shut-outs.

"When you're only averaging one goal per game, you're reachable by every team," Rudy said.

Winning on the road is a top priority for Rudy. Due to the variety of fields in the A-10, road victories have come at a premium.

"Anytime you can get points away from home, it's important," Rudy said.

Even with a three-game scoreless streak and two losses, the previous road trip could become irrelevant if this one goes better. However, a winless stretch could extend UMass' drought of missing the tournament for its fourth straight season.

Without a winning record in its road contests, it would be almost impossible for the Minutewomen to make the A-10 tournament without defeating the Billikens and Charlotte.

The 49ers are the conference's best team and average 5.20 goals per game. That kind of average is the last offense Rudy would have an interest in beating in order to make the tournament.

UMass looks for win at Rhode Island

Lima leads UM's offense coming off recent victory

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After back-to-back wins last weekend, the Massachusetts women's soccer team looks to continue its two-game unbeaten streak and get its first victory over Rhode Island since 2003, as they take on the Rams tonight at 7 p.m.

"It's a tremendously important game for us to try to get some points for qualification in the Atlantic 10 tournament," UMass coach Jim Rudy said.

The Maroon and White currently sit in a three-way tie at third with Dayton and Duquesne with 10 points in the conference standings (Charlotte is first in the standings (15 points) and Fordham is second (12 points).

The Minutewomen, (6-4-3, 3-2-1 A-10), will play their first night game of the 2008 season. The last time UMass traveled to Kingston was during the 2005 season, where URI defeated the Minutewomen, 2-1.

UMass holds a 14-6 overall record against the Rams (5-9-0, 1-5-0 A-10), but have lost the past four contests, three being by one goal.

"Rhode Island is a very dangerous opponent that you wouldn't know with a 1-5 record in the conference," Rudy said.

Last season, the Minutewomen lost more than a 3-2 overtime game against the Rams. Junior forward Sydney Stoll and Meghan Gould both left the game with injuries, and are out for the 2008 season.

"We were really doing well and then out of the blue, they score one in overtime and beat us, which was a shame because we deserved at least a tie in that game," Rudy said. "That was the best we played against them in sometime."

Despite the injuries to two of UMass' main offensive threats, junior forward Christina Adams was impressive, recording one goal and one assist. After a solid weekend as a reserve against Xavier and Dayton, Rudy feels that Adams will be able to have an impact against URI.

"She had a great weekend and is beating that offside line pretty well now. This one is going to be higher and harder to beat because its flatter," Rudy said.

The Minutewomen had one of its biggest conference victories in recent memory, defeating Dayton on Sunday, 1-0.

It was the first win over the Flyers since 1998, as redshirt senior midfielder Vanessa Lima scored the lone goal in the first half.

Lima had been suffering from a hamstring injury and had seen sporadic play in the past few games for the Minutewomen.

"That was a great moment for her, and therefore for me," Rudy said. "All of her successes are good stuff."

The Rams have lost four of its first five conference games, registering its first A-10 win last Sunday against Xavier.

Freshman Stephanie Santos scored in the first half against the Musketeers, which went on to be the game winner for URI.

The Rams dominated offensively, out-shooting Xavier 18-7 while holding an advantage in corner kicks, 9-1.

"They have not done well on the road but they are .500 at home; it's a fairly young team," Rudy said.

Throughout the season, the Rams are 1-5-1 while playing away from the URI Soccer Complex with a roster including 10 freshman and just six upperclassmen.

Even without an impressive record, Rudy feels that URI is a fundamental team that should not be taken lightly, especially at home.

"They are loaded with talent and they don't have any unskillful players. They have speed up front and have some big players who can win balls as well," Rudy said.

Sophomore forward Lischke Ruhe leads the Rams offense with four goals and three assists, while Santos and junior forward Kassandra Spitler registering three goals and one assist.

Rudy feels that his team must play a complete game while on the road today and get out to an early lead to avoid any late-game heroics by the home team.

"We find ways to be in every game, and I expect it to be the same way today," Rudy said.

UMass hosts No. 9 Spiders

Large crowd expected Saturday

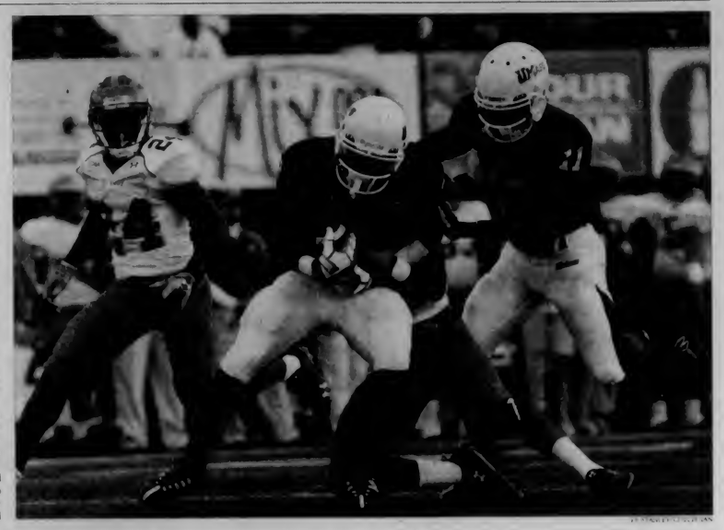
BY RYAN FLEMING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend's game against No. 9 Richmond will sure be an entertaining weekend not just for the No. 10 Massachusetts football team (4-2, 2-1 Collegiate Athletic Association), but for the fans as well.

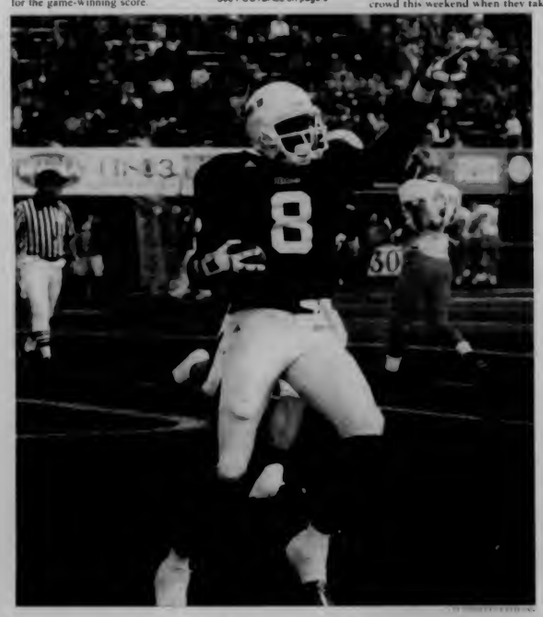
"It's a big time game, the stadium is going to be packed, and it's homecoming," UMass defensive back Jeromy Miles said. "This is going to be a real emotional game. We're going to be playing on a big time stage so we're going to have to perform."

Saturday marks the annual UMass homecoming weekend game. Part of the pregame festivities will honor the 1998 National Championship team.



The Spiders (4-3, 2-2 CAA), who were ranked No. 5 last week, come into town having recently lost a last-second defeat to No. 1 James Madison. With one second remaining in the game, Scotty McGee returned a punt 69 yards for the game-winning score.

Richmond boasts a high-octane offense that is captained by an efficient quarterback in Eric Ward. Ward has started all seven games for the Spiders and has completed 66 percent of his passes (110-for-166 passing), throwing for nine touchdowns and only two interceptions.



The 6-foot-3-inch, 213 pound junior holds the Richmond record for completion percentage with 60.6. Ward prefers to scramble out of the pocket when necessary. The redshirt junior, much like UMass quarterback Liam Coen, has three main targets that pick up the vast majority of the passing yards.

Richmond wide receiver Kevin Grayson is Ward's top target. The six-foot-three-inch redshirt sophomore proves to be a big target for Ward. Grayson has caught 31 balls this year for 436 yards and one touchdown. Ward's other two receiving threats are Tre Gray (25 passes for 346 yards) and Redshirt junior Victor Cruz (center), sophomore Ke'Mon Bailey (right) and the rest of the Minutemen hope to please the homecoming crowd this weekend when they take on Richmond. Cruz has two touchdowns this season.

Junior wide receiver Jeremy Horne has four touchdowns and 383 receiving yards this season. Horne and the Minutemen hope to extend their CAA record to 3-1 this weekend.

Expectations not met with UM's offense

Running, passing game crucial in homecoming matchup

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the first three games of the season, the problem for the Massachusetts football team was the defense not playing up to its potential.

Now, it's the offense that is not playing to its potential.

The offense has scored and moved the ball well, especially on the ground, and the team has gone 2-1 in the last three games (the lone loss to Football Bowl Subdivision No. 7 Texas Tech), but mistakes on the offensive side of the ball have nearly made the No. 10 Minutemen 0-3 in those games.

Criticizing an offense that is scoring 28.3 points per game (fifth in the Colonial Athletic Association) and averaging over 400 yards of total offense (third in the CAA) may seem like nitpicking, but when you have the conference's leading rusher, arguably the best quarterback in school history, and the first and fourth best wide receivers in reception yards per game in the conference, expectations are high.

Mistakes deep in the opponent's territory have prevented UMass (4-2, 2-1 CAA) from being as prolific of a scoring offense as it can be. Of the 14 turnovers the Minutemen have had on the season (seven interceptions, three fumbles and four turnovers on downs), 12 have been in the opponent's territory. Seven of those turnovers occurred in the end zone, while three happened while UMass was in the red zone.

During the team's practice on Monday, the offense spent time working on being more efficient when they reached the opponents 20-yard line. On the season, UMass is 17-of-22 in the red zone but four of the miscues have come in the past two weeks.

"We just have to try to get on the right page, run better routes, throw the ball better and catch the ball better," wide out Jeremy Horne said.

This weekend when No. 9 Richmond comes to McGuirk Alumni Stadium, the Minutemen better hope they have improved on all three of those.

The Spider defense has preyed all year on the opposition's mistakes. Through seven games, Richmond (4-3, 2-2 CAA) has caused the second-most turnovers (four fumbles and 11 interceptions) in the conference and is tied for first with a turnover margin of plus-eight.

Redshirt sophomore Justin Rogers has led Richmond's defense to become a scoring threat. Through seven games, Richmond has five touchdowns on defense. As for Rogers, he has three of those scores, two on interception returns (68-yard and 37-yard returns) and a fumble recovery (41-yard return).

The cornerback has made a name for himself early this season with his four interceptions, second to Northeastern's Nate Theilen who picked off Coen last week and had eight passes defended (tied for first in CAA).

But Rogers is not the only threat that UMass' offense will have to deal with when it takes the field opposite the "aggressive defense" of the Spiders, as Horne described them. Richmond has been successful this year getting to the quarterback with 11 sacks.

Of the top 18 sack leaders in the CAA, four are on the Spiders defensive line. Lawrence Sidbury Jr. (tied for eighth with three), Sherman Logan, Pierre Turner and Martin Parker (all with two).

Richmond is known for getting at the offense behind the line of scrimmage. Sidbury Jr. (8.5), Logan (6) and Turner (5.5) are all in the top eight in the CAA in tackles for a loss and Derek Hatcher (4.5) is 14th.

The fight between the Minutemen's offensive line and the Spider's defensive line will be a key match up in the game, and a hard fought one, with UMass bringing the top offensive line in sacks against with four.

Overall, Richmond boasts the top defense yardage wise in the CAA.

Minutemen hope to score on road

BY MELISSA TURTINEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With two road games this weekend, the Massachusetts men's soccer team hopes to end its four-game scoring slump and come out with at least one win in its Atlantic 10 schedule.

The Minutemen (2-6-2, 0-1-0 A-10) will play St. Bonaventure on Friday and Duquesne on Sunday.

"I'm nervous about St. Bonaventure because that is the next game. If you worry about Duquesne before you take on St. Bonaventure you are just asking for trouble. There is one thing on my mind and that is St. Bonaventure," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

Koch hasn't seen either team play this season, but remembering prior seasons, he knows that The Bonnies (2-3-4, 0-1-1 A-10) will bring tough competition.

"I think when we play St. Bonaventure, it's always a dog fight. They are a hard working team. They are playing at home and it's a tough field to play on," Koch said. "It's going to be a pretty even game and they are at home so that gives them a little bit of an edge, but we are playing better and I think it's going to be a good game, but it can go either way."

The Bonnies have scored eight goals this season on 101 shots, similar to UMass' seven goals off of 124 shots. The Dukes (5-4-3, 1-1-0 A-10) have scored 16 goals on 181 shots. Six of the goals come from leading scorer Ben Horner. To be successful this weekend, Koch and Co. needs to end its scoreless streak.

Although the Minutemen are not concentrating on Sunday's game until after they face St. Bonaventure, traveling to Duquesne will be beneficial because it is hosting the Atlantic 10 tournament. The Dukes' field is tough because it is used for a variety of sports – football and intramurals – so there are extra lines on it, as well as being located on top of a hill so on windy days, it can change the course of the ball while in the air.

"Two wins is a lot better than no wins," Koch said. "You've got to be realistic. We have got to score goals and that's what we

Senior attack Prince Ofosu is the Minutemen's leading scorer with two goals. UMass has not scored a goal in four games.

Villagomez added to new lineup

Freshman saw action vs. undefeated Wake Forest

Imagine this situation for a moment. The team you're on is playing the No. 1 ranked team in the country, but you've never been put into the game. You are just watching the game and cheering the team on. Suddenly, the coach looks over, calls your number and you're seeing action for the first time with over 1,000 screaming fans watching your every move.

Welcome to the big time.

That is exactly what Massachusetts men's soccer team (2-6-2, 0-1-0 Atlantic 10), freshman forward Jason Villagomez experienced Oct. 7, when he checked in for the Minutemen when they faced top-ranked Wake Forest.

"I wouldn't say I was nervous, I would say excited. I was just waiting for a time to get in there and show my stuff. I thought I played all right, could have done better," Villagomez said. "I'm still young and have a lot of things to improve on, but it was a great experience."

After sitting out the first eight games of the season while learning the offense and getting used to the routine of college athletics, Villagomez has earned his way into the rotation by impressing UMass coach Sam Koch with his dedication in practice.

"I think if you work hard, there are a lot of things that a coach would notice. So obviously it comes natural, that if you work hard on the practice field and on training days, they will see you paying your dues," Villagomez said.

Villagomez also saw action in UMass' last game against Rhode Island on Sunday. While he hasn't seen a great deal of playing time yet (18 minutes total), or made a major impact on the stat sheet, he is getting

Homecoming Kicks Off

BY KEVIN KOUZWARA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"This coming weekend, homecoming weekend, here at the University of Massachusetts looks to be an absolutely tremendous weekend" said Jason Yellin, Associate Athletic Director. Homecoming weekend hopes to be an accumulation of different on-campus groups putting on different activities for every student's taste. Whether it's poetry jams, 5K road races, dunk contests, dance parties, football games and tailgates, or dinners and reunions, there's something for everyone this weekend on campus.

Club Kellogg is a chance for the students at UMass to get to know their men's and women's basketball teams. It's also a chance for the students to see what skills the players have, and what they can do athletically. Whether it's a dunk contest or a 3-point shooting contest, it'll be an opportunity for players to showcase their talents to the student body in the intimate atmosphere brought on by the size of the Curry Hicks Cage.

The name of the event came about because after last year's surprising season, the former UMass coach Travis Ford left for different pastures at Oklahoma State, and Derek Kellogg, an alumnus of UMass, was hired.

Kellogg spent the last eight years as a key member of the coaching staff of the University of Memphis Tigers basketball team. Under former UMass and New Jersey Nets head coach John Calipari, Kellogg developed into a great recruiter and coach.

Kellogg played guard at UMass from 1992 to 1995 and helped the team make it to the NCAA Tournament. Tonight will mark an opening for the basketball season for him and the men's team.

Yellin hopes "to have a huge showing and pack the Cage" tonight not only for the

A cross-campus debate

BY LISA DIMATTEO AND S.P. SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Walking into The Harp pub on Wednesday, Oct. 15 felt like any other night.

Typically, sports games play on the televisions and the bar stools are filled with men and women drinking beers and snacking on the signature Irish nachos. English football jerseys lined the walls of the dimly lit bar, along with rugby balls and posters sporting pictures of "the children of Ireland."

One would expect nothing less than football hooligans and eccentric sports fans to be crowding the booths, screaming at the television screens as their respective teams played to the death. On this night, however, what was playing on TV was far from the world of sports.

This Wednesday, the third and final presidential debate, held at Hofstra University in New York, was playing at this local bar.

Three different televisions, as well as a large projection screen on the bar's deck, were all tuned in to this last of three epic showdowns between Senator Barack Obama and Senator John McCain.

Harpo, the owner of The Harp, said he had shown the previous presidential debates as well as the vice presidential debate at his bar.

"This is a community place and [these are] community issues; it's important for people to gather when they want to react to these things together," said Harpo.

"The traditional 'Irish pub' is multigenerational and is a place where politics and religion are discussed and not burned," Harpo continued. "These are the kinds of issues that people who regularly patronize the place are concerned with."

Congregating around the wooden crate coffee tables, drinking everything from red wine to cheap local beers, many Barack Obama supporters watched in earnest as the candidates took the stage.

"Some things on TV, like the Super Bowl and Red Sox playoffs, are more than TV, they are social events where everyone has a stake," said Jude Nowicki, a local Amherst resident. "I'm here because I like community and I like people and I like to watch everyone's reactions. It's part of the whole experience."

When asked why he chose to come to The Harp to watch the debate, Tucker Harpin, a 28-year-old former UMass student said, "I knew it would be on all the TVs and I knew the clientele would be focused on listening rather than shouting out at it [the TV]."

And that certainly proved to be the case as the debate earned the viewers' rapt attention. Reactions were minimal, ranging from head nods and murmurs of agreement to eye rolls and sighs of exasperation after many a John McCain promise.

Only once, after McCain said he was "proud of [his] supporters" in response to a claim by Obama that Republican supporters had been inappropriate and made death threats, did the bar erupt in laughter, sarcastic cheering and comments like "There go the independent voters!"

After the debate ended, many people stuck around to

Many UMass students gathered to watch the debate at the Blue Wall in the campus center, before engaging in a panel discussion about the upcoming election.

Who said what?

On the Economy:

"Americans are hurting right now, and they're angry. They're hurting, and they're angry. They're innocent victims of greed and excess on Wall Street as well as Washington, D.C. And they're angry, they have every reason to be angry."
-McCain

"Let's help families right away by providing them a tax cut – a middle-class tax cut for people making less than $200,000, and let's allow them to access their IRA accounts without penalty if they're experiencing a crisis."-Obama

On Health Care:

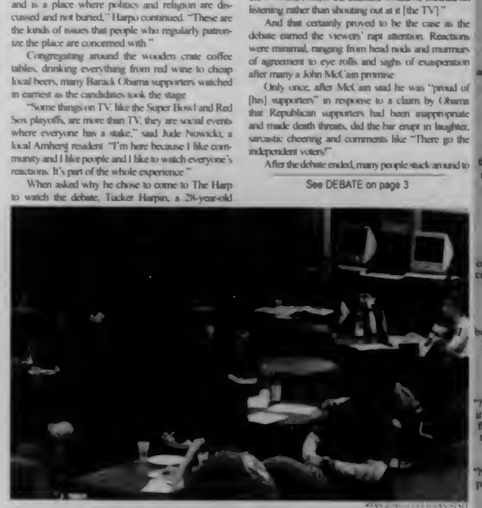
"If you're out there, my friend, and you've got employees, and you've got kids, adopt the health care plan that Sen. Obama mandates, he's going to fine you."-McCain



"If you don't have health insurance, then what we're going to do is provide you the option of buying into the same kind of federal pool that both Sen. McCain and I enjoy as federal employees,"-Obama

On Education:

"Now as far as No Child Left Behind is concerned, it was a great first beginning in my view. It had its flaws and its problems the first time we looked at the issue of education in America from a nation-wide perspective."-McCain have another drink and discuss the candidate's views, positions and their performance.

"This was definitely the most direct and confrontational of all the debates," Harpin said when asked what he thought of the whole experience. "The atmosphere [in the bar] was respectful and enjoyable because people were involved but not offensive about it."

Peter Kuusisto, a UMass senior and co-coordinator of Amherst for Obama agreed.

"Campaigns don't need to be solely about calling to voters but [about] having fun, sitting in your local bar, and connecting with the community on the most basic level," he added.

On the other side of Amherst, UMass alumnus and independent television producer Fred Oberg-Ampofo brought his show "Fred Is Signal" back to the Blue Wall for pre- and post-presidential debate coverage.

Oberg-Ampofo, who graduated last spring with a degree in journalism and social thought and political economy, returned "Fred Is Signal" to the UMass campus for his election special, "UMass is Independent," inviting UMass students across the ideological spectrum to be on an impromptu panel to discuss their expectations for the debate and general election.

Oberg-Ampofo said he wanted to do an election show to encourage the youth vote.

"This'll be the first time many of us are eligible to vote," he said. "I want UMass students to vote because I know their vote counts."

Student Government Association senator and UMass student Derek Khanna said Wednesday's debate was done-for John McCain's candidacy.

"The question tonight is going to be: Is McCain going to dominate on the economy issue? If he doesn't, it's game, set and match," said Khanna before the debate.

Ben Nicoletta, a UMass student and member of the Ralph Nader/Matt Gonzalez campaign, which did not take part in the debate, was critical of the two-party system that has left Nader out of the debates.

"Nader's influence was tied up when both parties moved away from having accessibility and towards being more bought [by corporate interest], and having more bought candidates," said Nicoletta. "So he had to bring these issues to a national platform."

The debate was followed with another panel discussion, which was cut short when the Blue Wall closed at roughly 12:15 p.m.

Over at Goodell Hall, student journalists from Amherstwire.com and members of Commonwealth College hosted their own night of political commentary.

Amherstwire.com conducted an online radio show prior to the debate from the Commonwealth College lounge and hosted a panel discussion afterwards. The public was invited, but journalism professor Steve Fox said they were unlikely to leave without first being asked for their reaction to it.

Jackie Hui, an editor at Amherstwire.com said the site looks to localize nation and international issues.

"People say college students live in a bubble. This was a great way to get them to interact with the world outside of it," said Hui.

Restaurants hit by economy

BY SAIHE TROMBETTA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the country facing an economic crisis, households, schools and even restaurants are beginning to feeling the pressure.

According to Restaurant.org, total retail sales have declined 1.2 percent from August to September of this year. Restaurant sales are included in this statistic. These have dropped 0.5 percent in the last month alone.

All different kinds of restaurants, from chains to independently-owned operations, are losing money due to the economic state of our country. While consumers are finally getting a break in gas prices, the price of groceries have steadily increased from 0.3 percent to 1.5 percent monthly.

This rise in prices takes a toll on all aspects of the restaurant business, even that of the chain restaurants in Amherst and Hadley.

When asked if business has slowed at all, UMass junior Hilary Wallace, who has waitressed at Chili's since 2006, said "Yes, it has. Not as many people go out to eat."

Chain restaurants, such as the Chili's located on Route 9, are now faced with raising the prices on their menus to keep up with the rising costs of food.

While many restaurants are struggling, each is taking different approaches to stay afloat. The large chains who can afford it are cutting back prices. Places like the International House of Pancakes (IHOP) are beginning deals such as the "all you can eat pancake meal for just $4.99." Ruby Tuesday is lowering beer and drink prices by at least $0.25.

The Chili's chain, however, is raising its prices in hopes to earn more money and combat the predicted 15 to 25 percent earnings decrease. Restaurant owners are feeling the strain, but so are the waitresses and patrons.

"A lot of people tip less," said Wallace. "We are raising our prices."

Waitresses, who only get paid an average of $3 an hour, are struggling to survive on smaller tips.

Consumers now tend to order less expensive meals, get water instead of a soft drink or alcoholic beverage, split entrees and skip dessert. On average, overall bills are less, thus the 15 to 20 percent tip allotted to waitresses is much lower than before.

While large chains are struggling to accommodate this crisis, many independent restaurants are being forced to close down. Without the support of a corporation, small independently-owned establishments can't compete with the rising prices of groceries, and the often cheaper meals offered at chain restaurants.

Officials predict an even bleaker outcome for the winter season, while grocery prices continue to soar and consumers struggle to get by on the necessities.

Dining out is slowly becoming a luxury not many people can afford.

US tops QS charts as top universities

BY DINAH GORELIK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Quacquarelli Symonds (QS) World University Rankings, an indicator of the world's most renowned and leading academic universities, was released for the 2008 year on Thursday, Oct. 9.

Among the top 100 universities, 42 were in North America, 36 in Europe, and 22 in Asia-Pacific. Israel was also represented for the first time in the rankings, with one of the top 100 institutions.

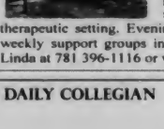
Our own University of Massachusetts placed 191st, a decrease of 16 places from 175th in 2007.

"I am very surprised and impressed that my university is ranked 191st on a global scale," said UMass student Gaby Shapiro.

The rankings were published by the Times Higher Education, a London-based publication centered on higher education. Although Times Higher Education magazine first came out in 1971, the rankings began being published in 2004.

Universities were broken down by country and five ranking factors: peer review scores, recruiter review, international faculty score, international student score, faculty/student score and citations/faculty score. The scores are scaled so that the top university has 100 points and the rest of the institutions are then ranked in proportion to that score.

The top 200 institutions were led by Harvard, the number one university in the world since 2004. Of these 200 universities, 58 are from the United States and six stand impressively in the top 10. Following Harvard was Yale, the University of Cambridge, Oxford, California Institute of Technology, Imperial College London, University College London, the University of Chicago, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Columbia.



Although the purpose of the ranking is to measure the quality of various universities from an international standpoint, there have been numerous dilemmas surrounding its composition. Many say the underlying goals are business-orientated and have to do with the commercialization of education. Other readers say the rankings actually favor British universities, since it is published in London.

The recent rankings have stirred up worries that the United Kingdom's prominence is weakening because its rankings went down. Only 17 of their universities made the top 100, two less than last year.

The general director of the Russell Group of research universities, Wendy Piatt, said that, "The Times Higher Education league table reflects the growing strength of our major competitors – particularly the U.S. institutions – who benefit from much higher levels of investment than U.K. universities."

UMass makes efforts to be more 'green'

By Frank Goldsbo
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has unofficially joined the green movement sweeping the nation. Evidence is everywhere – from the abundance of local produce at the dining commons to the recycling bins in each dorm. The efforts are capturing attention both locally and nationally.

Within the past month, Ken Toong, director of Dining Services, received both the state's Faces of Agriculture Award and the 2008 Blue Ribbon Award for his contributions and support of local farmers and agriculture. According to Toong, less than 10 percent of produce at the Dining Commons came from local farmers in 2002. This year, that figure has risen to 23 percent.

For years, Dining Services has led in sustainability efforts at UMass. They buy local produce, dairy, and meat from local farmers whenever possible, and serve only sustainable seafood. They compost food waste, use OS1 – a certified green cleaning program, offers the Small Plate, Big Flavor program to help reduce food waste, and even recycle grease. This semester they helped kick off the fall semester with an all-green barbecue, featuring biodegradable products and local foods.

"Everything was green, from the milk to even the beef," said Toong, describing the barbecue. "We want to promote UMass being green as much as possible because there's great opportunity, especially with new students."

Although UMass received an overall grade of a "C+" in a report issued by the Sustainable Endowments Institute – one of its highest marks was in the food and recycling category. The institute looks at college campuses and issues a report card each year rating campuses on their commitments to sustainability.

When mentioning food and recycling, it's important to mention the collaboration of Dining Services and the Office of Waste Management. Together, they ensure that hundreds of tons of food waste are diverted from landfills every year.

For the past 17 years, UMass has utilized a recycling program. According to John Pepi, director of the Office of Waste Management, just about every office, lab, classroom and dormitory in each residence hall has the necessary resources to recycle.

Pepi credits the state's recycling facility in Springfield for much of the Office of Waste Management's success. The facility allows materials to be collected while mingled, so people don't have to waste time sorting.

Pepi advises students that the easiest way to help the environment is by recycling.

"When we see ourselves as part of a larger community doing our share to reduce global warming and greenhouse gas emissions, and conserve energy, recycling is the best choice," Pepi said.

One of the biggest problems Pepi faces is making students more aware of recycling practices.

Fortunately, the Eco-Rep program may just be the solution Pepi needs. The Environmental Sustainability and Energy Conservation Campaign officially introduced a pilot version of the Eco-Rep program in eight residence halls on campus in which students teach other students about the environment. Josh Stoffell and Suzanne Hale, student representatives for the Environmental Performance Advisory Committee, oversee the program and choose talking points for the eco-reps.

Stoffell, who helped launch the campaign, is also the acting president and founder of Students for Environmental Awareness and Action (SEAA). He suggests that UMass hire a sustainability director for the campus to improve the organization of green initiative efforts.

"Dining Services is doing one thing, SEAA is doing another, Auxiliary Services is doing another – and they're all doing good things, but it's all very disjointed. What we need is someone who can assemble all this into one solid effort," he said.

Such green initiatives have administrators taking a closer look at the reasoning behind the movement such as saving money. The new state-of-the-art Studio Arts Building is one of the most efficient buildings on campus.

The $26.5 million project was built using sustainable building materials, uses a natural ventilation system, and employs several measures to conserve energy and water.

According to Simi Hoque, an assistant professor in Green Building, there are currently no green certified buildings on campus.

Hoque suggests that UMass have full energy audits for all its buildings on campus. She says this would mean all the windows and ventilation, lighting systems, air qualities and pollutants, and insulation would be reported in evaluations describing the building's total environmental performance. Then these would be measured against performance standards set by a green certification program by Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) for existing buildings. All the university would have to do is the necessary renovations suggested by the program.

Building energy efficient buildings could be this nation's first step towards energy independence, said Hoque.

"A major problem buildings have on the environment is that they consume 40 percent of the energy produced in this country. If we were to become more cognizant of the fact that buildings could become more energy efficient, we'd be well on our way towards a more energy independent nation," Hoque said.

Despite the significant amount of resources UMass has invested in concerning the advancement of environmental action and research, we scored lower in the Sustainable Endowment's green report card than any of the other Five Colleges.

However, this doesn't mean UMass is a lost cause at trying to improve its grade for next year's report. According to Mark Orlowski, executive director of the institute, UMass scored highest in more visual categories while overlooking endowment transparency and shareholder engagement.

"There are lots of reasons for colleges to go green," he said. "Before students even step onto a college campus, many applicants are interested in whether a school is sustainable or not. From the admissions side, it encourages more students to apply," Orlowski said.

As environmental research advances, it's inevitable UMass will have a more active role in helping the environment. Progress is well underway for the university, and some larger projects are slated for the future.

The UMass Bursar's Office is one of many departments on campus making efforts in going green this semester. The Bursar's Office has eliminated its paper system and is exclusively offering online billing to help eliminate paper waste.

The Campus Consciousness Tour is coming to UMass on Nov. 18. The music group O.A.R. has just announced a partnership with the environmental group Reverb for a tour offering an environmental concert event at several college campuses. The tour will make its first stop at UMass, and one feature of the tour will be an Amherst Town Hall meeting in the Campus Center where different ideas of easier ways to become sustainable will be discussed.

"I think for a band like O.A.R. to talk about these issues instead of somebody like me to say it carries a little more weight," said Stoffell, the SEAA president.

Other news indicating UMass is furthering its green efforts include some plans by Dining Services. Ken Toong revealed his latest plans to continue supporting local agriculture. He hopes to increase the intake of local produce to 25 percent by 2010. Toong also says plans to renovate Worcester Dining Commons to become a more energy efficient building are scheduled for 2010.

The University could have its first green certified building by the summer of 2010. This green initiative involves the new campus police station that is still in planning mode. The Facilities and Planning Department is hoping to make the new police station a LEED certified gold standard building.

UHS Mental Health falls short for some

Students' mental health issues seem small on UMass's big campus

By Liz Wahlman
Collegian Correspondent

University Health Services (UHS) prides itself on the diverse range of services they offer. Residence halls have "wellness floors" for students who want to live in substance-free housing. UMass Transit buses display signs about alcohol abuse and social norms. There's even a theater troupe dedicated to informing students about safe-sex practices. While information and advice about these topics is distributed freely across campus, the issue of student mental health is rarely talked about.

Many students have, or know someone with, a mental illness or mood disorder. There are also students who deliberately harm themselves in an attempt to relieve their mental anguish. Last year, a UMass student chose to end his life by jumping from his window in one of the Southwest towers. These issues are circulating around UMass, yet the topic of mental health remains one that students have to research on their own, leaving many feeling isolated.

It can be difficult to distinguish "the blues" from clinical depression. Comparing the two is like comparing the common cold to pneumonia. Feelings of sadness after a breakup or a major disappointment will certainly last for a short period of time. For someone diagnosed with clinical depression, they'll feel sad for months or even years at a time. These feelings of intense sadness may not even have a particular cause.

Many students are afraid to talk about their emotional health or seek help when they may truly need it. Often, students feel as if they are alone. This is something that UHS Mental Health is trying to change. Located at 127 Hills North, directly in front of the Gorman residence hall, UHS Mental Health operates through a triage system. If a student calls in to make an appointment with a counselor, they're given a 15-minute phone appointment the next day with a senior clinician for an evaluation. This is used to determine how urgently an appointment is needed. If the situation is considered an emergency, an appointment will be made in the next 24 to 48 hours.

"We have a Web site that is linked to UHS," said Lynette Bloise, Associate Director of UHS Mental Health. "Whenever we are running groups, we put out flyers. Freshmen are informed in their classes on how to access us. We have a very strong presence on campus. It's a different way of making things available."

Many students believe that the services UHS Mental Health provides are not meeting their needs. A group of former UHS Mental Health patients all expressed dis%satisfaction with their experiences.

"Something that frequently bothered these students was the level of experience their therapists have, or lack thereof. A therapist is generally a licensed social worker or someone with a master's degree in mental health, social work, nursing, professional counseling or family therapy. When asked to see a therapist at UHS Mental Health, many students are usually referred to a graduate student working towards a master's degree or doctorate in psychology.

"Every year, we have five new interns for training in psychology and social work," said Ms. Bloise.

However, because these providers are still learning, some students feel their therapists don't know how to handle their emotional problems.

Another issue is the overall size of UMass. There's a small number of staff members available, and an extremely large student population in comparison. There are not enough staff members or time to accommodate all of the students who need weekly appointments.

"They said they could only fit me in every three weeks. When I would call to try and schedule something, they wouldn't call me back," said Caroline Cassidy, a UMass junior and English major. "It was extremely frustrating, and I got nowhere. Now I see someone off campus. It's a little out of the way, but it's worth it."

Bloise does not believe UHS Mental Health is understaffed.

"We have three psychiatrists, a nurse practitioner, five social workers, five psychologists and one fellow. We recently hired two new social workers, and one psychologist. UMass has been quite responsive in advancing our staff," Bloise said.

When patients can't schedule weekly appointments, they're often referred to group therapy sessions where they're encouraged to share their experiences with other students with somewhat similar problems. These group sessions can be very uncomfortable for students struggling with emotional illnesses.

"UHS Mental Health tries, I think, but it's small and there are over 20,000 students on campus. It is very difficult to treat everyone for everything and while it's nice to have someplace to go, it's also very inconvenient," said senior theater major Andrea Mountain.

Students have reported feeling as if their problems were not significant in the eyes of the UHS Mental Health staff. UHS Mental Health staff members not returning phone calls is a common complaint among former patients. This leads student patients to believe their problems are not that serious.

"We have a system in place where students leave their information with a receptionist, and the students can call back the next day for an appointment," said Ms. Bloise. "But we have a big flow of clients."

Depression, anxiety, suicide and other mental health issues are extremely common on college campuses. According to the American Psychiatric Association, suicide is the third leading cause of death for people aged 15 to 24. It's the second leading cause of death among college students, the first being accidental deaths. Statistics also show that 95 percent of college student suicides are related to depression and other mental illnesses. According to a 2004 survey by the American College Health Association, nearly half of all college students reported feeling so depressed at some point that they can't function. The survey also reported that 10 percent of students have seriously considered suicide at least once during their college career.

Still, the topic of depression and mental illness remains swept under the rug. National Depression Screening Day was on Oct. 10, and no word was made about it on campus. However, there were depression screenings at Psychological Services in Tobin Hall.

Many students say they feel awkward around their friends who are dealing with these issues. They feel they don't know how to help their friends who are clearly suffering, or fear that if they say the wrong thing it will make their friend's condition worse. These feelings are common, and emotional illnesses are difficult to talk about. If you or someone you know has any of the symptoms of depression or suicide, convince them to get help as soon as possible.

Symptoms of depression include persistent sadness, anxiousness, irritability and empty mood. More specific symptoms include: a loss of interest or pleasure in activities that were once enjoyed, trouble sleeping or sleeping too much, a significant change in appetite or weight fluctuations, difficulty thinking, concentrating, remembering and making decisions, feeling tired, rundown and a loss of energy, feelings of restless or agitation, feelings of guilt, worthlessness, hopelessness, helplessness and emptiness, recurring thoughts of death or suicide and attempts at suicide. This list of symptoms is available on the American Psychiatric Association's Web site, Healthyminds.org.

Issues of mental health among college students need to be taken seriously. UHS Mental Health provides services to students in need; many also take the initiative to seek help outside of UMass. UHS Mental Health will refer you to someone off campus after a face-to-face interview. You can also contact your insurance company for a list of mental health professionals in the western Massachusetts area. If it's an emergency, please call 1-800-SUICIDE (1-800-784-2433) for immediate assistance.

ACORN woes

Alana Goodman

No election season would be complete without some fresh voter registration fraud committed by the Association of Community Organizers for Reform Now, also known as ACORN.

ACORN, a left-wing lobbyist group with ties to Senator Barack Obama, often comes under fire for illegal practices at their voter registration drives. In previous elections, the organization famously filled out voter applications with the names of deceased people and random members of the Dallas Cowboys.

This year, investigators have once again caught the criminal masterminds at ACORN submitting thousands of counterfeit registration forms – including one from a seven-year-old girl in Connecticut and another from a fictional Disney character in Florida.

An Ohio teenager named Freddie Johnson has testified in court this week that workers from ACORN's "Get Out the Vote" campaign duped him into registering to vote 72 times – often by bribing him with sleazy gifts.

"Sometimes, they come up and bribe me with a cigarette, or they'll give me a dollar to sign up," Johnson told the New York Post.

Johnson claims ACORN workers knowingly encouraged him to illegally register multiple times, an allegation echoed by other witnesses as well.

Some Republicans worry that ACORN may take advantage of voting loopholes to swing the results in Obama's favor.

"Even if you tell them 'I've already registered,' they'll be like 'well, just sign your name, and give us the last four digits of your [social security number] and we'll do the rest,'" said Latesha Goins, a Cleveland woman who was surprised to find out ACORN registered her to vote under multiple addresses.

"It happens to everybody," Goins told Fox News. "If you go to downtown Cleveland and get off the bus and walk down the street, there are maybe 15 people – who will try to register you to vote, and they all work for ACORN."

However, Ohio isn't the only place affected by ACORN's registration fraud. Authorities in at least a dozen states, including the battlegrounds of Florida, Pennsylvania, Nevada, Indiana and North Carolina, are currently investigating thousands of bogus voter forms submitted by the group.

While most of these phony registrations are discarded by government officials and unlikely to affect the outcome of the election, some Republicans are worried that ACORN may take advantage of voting loopholes to swing the results in Obama's favor.

According to the Cleveland Leader, "[Where] the major risk of fraud in large canvassing efforts such as ACORN's comes into play is the possibility of ineligible voters filing absentee ballots, and then avoiding checks at polling places."

The most dangerous thing about ACORN isn't their illegal practices during elections however – it's the group's radical, anti-Capitalist agenda.

Founded by a socialist named Wade Rathke in 1970, the Chicago-based ACORN has since gained tremendous power in left-leaning cities across the country.

The group's socialist bend is evident in the policies they lobby for. Their signature "Living Wage" legislation requires businesses in dozens of cities to pay employees more than the national minimum wage requires. Because this law is beginning to drive businesses out of participating cities, ACORN wants to force them to acquire "an exit visa from the community board signifying that the company has adequately compensated all its employees and the community at large for losses due to relocation."

ACORN, whose goal is to "[C]ontinue our fight … until we have shared the wealth, until we have won our freedom," has often teamed up with the Communist Party of America and the Young Communist Party to achieve its mission of wealth distribution.

The taxpayer-funded ACORN adamantly insists it's a "non-partisan" social justice group. That claim is phonier than the addresses on its voter registration forms. In fact, the organization has publicly endorsed Barack Obama for president and even campaigned door-to-door for the candidate.

Earlier this month, ACORN members took a break from scouring Chicago graveyards for voters and formed a protest in front of Senator John McCain's campaign office. A videotape shows the group donning "Obama for President" hats and shouting, "We're ACORN, and we're going to beat McCain down!"

Obama certainly gives ACORN a reason to support him. While the Illinois senator has been quietly scrubbing his Web site in an attempt to distance himself from the organization, CNN reported this week that the Obama campaign paid an ACORN subsidiary more than $800,000 to supplement their current "Get Out the Vote" registration drives. Also, during Obama's 1997-2002 tenure on the Board of Directors for the Woods Foundation, he granted ACORN nearly $200,000.

But Obama's relationship with the activist group is much deeper than simple quid pro quo. According to ACORN leader Tora Foulkes, Obama defended the organization in a 1995 lawsuit and led yearly leadership training sessions for them. He even partnered up with the association to organize "Project Vote" in 1992.

Obama's monetary contributions to ACORN's "Get Out the Vote" campaign, which has been convicted of voter registration fraud every year since 2004, illustrates either extreme ignorance or a serious lapse in judgment. Additionally, his decade-spanning involvement with yet another radical, anti-Capitalist pillar of Chicago corruption provides us with a frightening glimpse into Obama's true character.

Challenging the pot-smokers

Heather McCormack

In response to some of the recent editorials presented regarding Question 2 and the Cannabis Reform Coalition (CRC), I think it's important to challenge the problematic and frankly, offensive insinuations.

The first challenge is in regards to commentary that the CRC and others working for drug reform are only interested in smoking pot, huffing dread wax and buying $40 drug rugs at Trade Roots. Most insidiously, it's important to challenge remarks claiming that decriminalization – and drug law reform in general – is somehow "not important" or a "non-issue" with little effect on the larger political climate.

Despite the scathingly clever and intellectually consistent social commentary in which the writers seem to simultaneously support and detest our ability to energize and activate the student populace, marijuana decriminalization is a much larger issue than just marijuana. It is also coincidently much larger than just this campus and this state on Nov. 4.

Marijuana decriminalization is, in fact, a social justice issue. It's the largest contributor to arrests in the nationwide – and increasingly globalized – war on drugs.

It's a war – like the War on Terror – which is, by nature, unwinnable and unaccountable to its stated goals of "eradicating drug use." Marijuana prohibition is an issue stretching much greater than its stated intent. In fact, it provides excellent insight into a variety of intersecting social problems in our criminal justice system.

According to Massachusetts' Drug Policy Alliance (Drugpolicy.org), 50 percent of the prison population consists of people of color. This is not because people of color do drugs at a higher frequency than whites. Instead, it's because of disparities in arrests, booking, access to lawyers and sentencing. People of color are incarcerated at a far higher level than whites who have committed similar crimes.

This is true across the country. Minorities and low-income individuals are particularly at a disadvantage when it comes to crime and punishment – contributing to the stereotype that "all (fill in the blank minority) are dangerous criminals."

Not only that, but felons are not allowed to vote, which means a large percentage of potential minority voters are deliberately silenced. In this case, individuals – many of whom are young – can reasonably say that "my vote doesn't count."

Under current state law, being simply convicted of possessing a single joint can create a stain on one's record – specifically, the CORI criminal background report – which bars that individual from access to financial aid, public housing, adopting children, serving as a foster parent and can make that individual lose or be prevented from obtaining employment.

By imposing such draconian punishments on simple possession, punishments are statistically unevenly distributed according to race and class. We are, in fact, ensuring that these "criminals" – only such because possession is defined as a crime – have no options but to continue to be criminals. If they can't get a legitimate job or state assistance for housing and are already at a disadvantage economically or socially, why wouldn't they try to make money as a drug dealer?

This is how the war on drugs mistakenly justifies itself – by calling people criminals.

We can make it possible to enact a legitimately sensible drug policy which does not oppress or impoverish communities and individuals in the name of a "war" we simply cannot win.

This makes it legitimate to continue to fight the crime they've invented no matter how many millions of dollars or individual liberties are wasted along the way. Decriminalization, though it still labels the act of smoking or possessing up to one ounce a crime, would effectively deprioritize marijuana to a lesser crime on the totem pole – not to mention one which will not eliminate access to social programs and civil rights.

Inevitably, if we and other states continue to speak our mind about marijuana reform and drug war reform in general, we can make it possible to enact a legitimately sensible drug policy which does not oppress or impoverish communities and individuals in the name of a "war" we simply cannot win. On a related note, to somehow also insinuate that the CRC is made up of apolitical stoners whose only causes are scrounging up the next blunt or bag of chips is an offensive, low-brow stereotyped attack. Notwithstanding, the fact is we actually have an unusually diverse spectrum of political views and beliefs within our rapidly expanding ranks.

Time to get curious about the world

Michael Phillis

In 1780, John Adams fathered the Massachusetts Constitution. Being a man of books and intellectual curiosity, he understood the importance of a well-informed American public. The Massachusetts Constitution is unique, however.

It's unique from every other state's constitution because it includes wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue. Massachusetts is diffused generally among a body of people necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties. These rights depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in various parts of the country.

Why is this important today? This small principal, stated uniquely in the Massachusetts Constitution, guarantees that the government has the responsibility to insure the intellectual strength of the American population.

In consequence, Massachusetts (arguably) has the reputation for being the state with the best education system in the country.

This principle of education was not included in the U.S. Constitution. This result is seen in today's politicians, as they are increasingly hostile towards intellectual debate.

In American history, events ranging from the Lincoln-Douglas debates to Franklin Roosevelt's fireside chats during the Depression have successfully created a productive national dialogue. Today, this is not happening.

Political combat, while more civilized than it was years before, has still not started the substantive discussion that is needed. The lowest common denominator of thought has become the norm.

This election's cycle of presidential debates is the best example of this phenomenon.

Glenn Thrush of Politico.com wrote about how the non-partisan commission that sets the rules of the Presidential debates has failed. According to Thrush, the debates are turning into two-minute segments of stump speeches instead of an actual discussion of the issues.

Another article from last week's Washington Post commented on how newspapers are finding it increasingly harder to justify the costly travel expenses for reporters to follow the candidates around the country. Apparently, the candidates don't talk to journalists as much anymore.

Political combat, while being more civilized than it was years before, has still not started the substantive discussion that is needed.

A discussion on the uneducated American public would not be complete without mention of McCain and his campaign's refusal to condemn the shouts of violence against Barack Obama at their campaign events. This has been the most vivid example of playing off people's irrational ideologies and fears. However, Obama fans – your guy has not been entirely innocent either.

For example, Obama has not been answering questions from his press pool lately. I can only assume this is an attempt to keep possibly embarrassing or negative stories out of the daily media cycle.

So here, in a small town in western Massachusetts, why should we care? We're in college, at a higher education and degree-granting institution that'll supply us with a career jump-starting diploma upon graduation. Isn't that enough?

It seems to me at least, that curiosity is lacking. Every once in a while during your daily onslaught of college work and what I'm sure is a social life more stressful than relaxing, take some time to understand what's going on around you.

Yes, there are a large number of people who I've talked to that feel alienated about what's going on. But the truth is – in some way, shape or form – these issues will affect everyone. What's the first way to realize this? Just ask your parents how their retirement is doing and don't be surprised if a third of it is gone.

We're both blessed and plagued in this country by how well off we are. This comfortable lifestyle has caused people to stop caring.

Analysts have long said a population in a democracy gets the leaders they deserve, no better, no worse.

So, as preachy as this may sound, now would be the time to talk to that political science major down the hall. Read a book about something. Pick up on anything going on in the world – whether at home or abroad – and try your best to read more than just the front section of a major national newspaper.

We should always be curious about what happens around us, but if you aren't – right now would be a good time to at least give it a try.

Obama: an improved phoenix out of Clinton's ashes?

Yasmine Farah

Everyone is talking about presidential candidate Barack Obama, and praising him as the one who will bring change to the United States. But the truth is that Obama is still a politician who is more likely to follow his predecessors such as Bill Clinton.

Obama is in the mouth of a shark. The change he talks about will not impact the people who really need it – such as the minorities who live in the forgotten slums and ghettoes of America. When did Bill Clinton ever care about the sad state of the minority population in urban cities?

The media and some African Americans label Clinton as "the black Democrat," but seriously folks – lets speak truth to power. Clinton always put on an act in front of the media just like all the other politicians. He never cared about the state of minorities or went as far as to apologize for slavery.

An apology would never make everything from the past go away. It would only make African Americans feel even more different than ever before. Writer and intellect Toni Morrison even went as far as to call Clinton "our first black president."

It's true that Bill Clinton possesses some qualities of the diverse African American community. He's from a working class family and is an amazing saxophone player. Nevertheless, Clinton is far from helping or even relating to the people presently living the way Jim Crow intended.

It's also true that Bill Clinton was a more straight-laced president than the crooked presidents before him and worked endlessly to keep minorities in their place of ignorant bliss. It's been a task of many leaders to discredit positive community-driven groups since the birth of civil rights – such as labeling the Black Panthers as a terrorist or anti-white group. In many schools, students are taught that the Black Panthers were individuals who hated white people.

The truth is that the Black Panthers never hated whites, or any other race. Their motto was "power to the people." They were a group consisting of black as well as white members. They would come together to empower the community by providing educational programs and free meals to school children every morning – things the government should have been doing.

Bill Clinton is like Ted Bundy in the sense that he buttered people up before he destroyed them. All the other presidents that came before him were all Hannibal Lector. They skipped the buttering up and went straight for destruction.

The truth is that during Bill Clinton's presidency, he was and still is a great con artist. He has pimped out the citizens of America like prostitutes for his financial gain of power.

When Pastor Jeremiah Wright from the Trinity Church of Chicago accused Clinton of taking advantage of the African American people, saying "Bill was riding us dirty," he was not far from the truth. During his second election year, he promised to reform welfare. Welfare was meant to act as an aid to benefit poverty-stricken single families from the government.

In August 1996, Bill Clinton signed the Personal Responsibility and Work Act. This act was supposed to take people off welfare and put them into the work force. Nevertheless, this act left many financially poor minority communities homeless and hungry. Many of the single families on welfare could not work due to having children but no babysitters.

Bill Clinton is like Ted Bundy in the sense that he buttered people up before he destroyed them.

Clinton didn't consider the children of these single families. Some of these communities involved people working to pay bills and only receiving welfare to pay for food. Clinton didn't consider the effect these reforms would have on the poor, underprivileged communities. He had forgotten that he, too, belonged to this community when he was growing up in Little Rock, Ark. However, money and power has been known to change a person's memories.

Clinton did not stop there. On Jan. 3, 1996, he signed into law the Telecommunications Act, which gave monopolies to corporate phone companies. These corporate phone companies illuminated any competition options and set a flat rate for everyone.

The other families not in shelters and struggling from paycheck to paycheck were left without phone service because they couldn't afford it. With democratic leaders like Bill Clinton surrounding Barack Obama, it's hard to determine if Obama will do the right thing for the people of America.

Compared to past presidents with names such as George and John, Barack shines because he is different. His name alone is something that has never been heard of in the history of presidency in America. Barack Obama's slogan, "change we can believe in," gives people the sense of hope for a better future.

Obama may be surrounded by lethal politicians who only care about their own personal financial growth, yet his record so far has proven that he is a man who seems to care a lot about the minority citizens of America. That alone is a good reason for people to consider the change he provides.

Why have you been sipping on your Dunkin Donuts iced coffee for 3 hours?

ARTS & LIVING

Mark Wahlberg stars as a police officer who is out for revenge in "Max Payne." Mila Kunis had to get use to handling and shooting guns in order to play a Russian mobster in the film. Chris "Ludacris" Bridges, who also stars, plays an interal affairs detective.

Video game gets Hollywood treatment

By Brittany Bell Daffhond
Collegian Correspondent

When "Max Payne" debuted in 2001, the video game was greeted with praise for its film-noir influences and cinematic nature.

Producer Julie Yorn said, "The 'Max Payne' videogame was developed by people who were passionate about film. From the noir-style cinematography to its characters and dialogue, the game had major cinematic influences and the material transcended the typical videogame experience."

This Friday, 21st Century Fox Studios is releasing a movie adaptation of the video game to theatres. The film stars Mark Wahlberg as Max Payne. Joining Wahlberg are Mila Kunis as Russian mobster and assassin, Mona Sax, and Chris "Ludacris" Bridges as Internal Affairs Detective, Jim Bravura.

This past Friday, the Daily Collegian had the opportunity to join other college journalists across the nation in a conference call with three stars of the film. The stars spoke about their feeling on the film, their characters, and what Mark Wahlberg thought of the recent Saturday Night Live (SNL) skit "Mark Wahlberg Talks to Animals."

Question [Directed to Mark Wahlberg]: When you were looking over the script, what attracted you to the role of Max?

MW: Well, I'd been looking to do something with some action, some energy, some intensity. After doing "The Lovely Bones" and doing M Night's movie "The Happening," I definitely wanted to do something where I could really go off. And I read the script before I realized it was based on a video game, and I just thought it was a nice fit for me.

Q: Do you think the movie will appeal to fans of the game and people who don't play video games at all?

MW: Well, first and foremost we wanted to satisfy the diehard game fans, and hopefully it'll draw a lot of other people to the film based on the images that they see in the spots, and you know, maybe they'll go and watch and play the game after...I'd love them to watch the movie before they play the game.

Q: What are your feelings on the "SNL" sketch from last week, "Mark Wahlberg Talks to Animals?"

MW: Well, it certainly wasn't as funny as Tina Fey doing Sarah Palin. It was okay. It was kind of funny. It was funnier than that movie he [Adam Samberg] did, "Hot Rods."

Q: Is that the kind of thing that comes out of nowhere, or did you have any idea it was airing?

MW: No, but tell that guy I said "Say hi to your mother for me."

Q: You've recently done a lot of cop films, "The Departed," "We Own the Night," now "Max Payne." What draws you to play these types of characters?

MW: Well, they're the only offers that I get. They're the only movies that they're offering me ... either a crook or a cop. That's why when I get offered to play a science teacher or an astronaut, even though I'm not well-suited for those roles, I jump at the opportunity. So look for me playing a tax attorney sometime soon!

Q [Directed at Chris "Ludacris" Bridges]: What drew you to the role of Jim? He seems like such a contrast to Ludacris the rapper everybody knows.

CB: Exactly. That's the exact reason why I choose roles like that, to get away from the persona, Ludacris. Ludacris is a character all within itself. When I'm acting, I don't want anyone to think I'm Ludacris, and that's the exact reason why I do that. So, just trying to not only surprise myself, but surprise everyone else and continue to choose these diverse roles that let you know that I obviously must be acting because it's nothing like what the persona of Ludacris is.

Q [Directed at Mila Kunis]: Is the Russian mobster character a stretch for you or do you enjoy playing a badass?

MK: Well, it's amazing. When I was in the KGB, in my youth, they taught me a lot. I got to really play off my personal experiences with Putin. He really taught me well back in the mother country. No! I mean, of course it's a stretch! Just because I'm from the country does not mean...Yes, it was a stretch. Absolutely. Not speaking the language, but shooting guns.

Q: What was it like to work with a unique director like John Moore with his background being diverse from family films like "Flight of the Phoenix" to horror films like "The Omen?" What did he bring to the table for you?

MK: He is by far one of the most passionate, enthusiastic directors I've ever had the pleasure of working with. You know very well the second you finish speaking if the take is good or bad, because the second the last word comes out of your mouth you either hear a groan or a very loud scream. I mean, literally, take for take John would get so excited and/or not, but you definitely knew if you nailed it.

Buckingham radiates Calvin

Lindsay Buckingham played at the Calvin on Wednesday, showing off his talents as a solo artist while mixing in Fleetwood Mac classics.

"Beverly Hills Chihuahua" holds on to its top spot as the highest grossing film of this past weekend for the second weekend in a row.

'Mac' guitarist mixes old and new tunes

By Heather Waxman
Collegian Staff

Lindsey Buckingham is a walking adrenaline machine. The 59-year-old master guitarist, celebrated as the front man of legendary 1970s rock band Fleetwood Mac, graced Northampton's Calvin Theatre on Tuesday evening for a solo two-hour performance in promotion of his latest solo release, "Gift of Screws."

10 years in the making, the album – which features cameos by old band mates John McVie and Mick Fleetwood – was finally released last month, and gave way to newsworthy reviews.

With his second stop at the Calvin in the past year, Buckingham appears to be reveling in his solo endeavors before hitting the road again in 2009 for another scheduled Fleetwood Mac reunion.

The crowd became impatient staring at the abandoned instruments as the stage's blue lights absorbed a dramatic wash of faux smoke.

They started chanting long before Buckingham's silhouette emerged, clapping wildly and shouting his name.

The lights finally began to dim in reply, and upon a drunken "woo hoo," a thin frame in the form of Lindsey Buckingham took center stage.

Buckingham was accompanied by a talented entourage: Neale Haywood on guitar, Brett Tuggle on guitar, bass and keyboard, and drummer Walfredo Reyes Jr., who, halfway through the show, gave a comically entertaining performance on his drum kit using only his bare hands.

Buckingham's material was diverse, as he took material from all five of his solo releases, in addition to a handful of Fleetwood Mac classics.

Adorned in a black leather jacket and dark denim, the rock phenom kicked off his 20-song set with "Great Day," the up-tempo first track off of "Gift of Screws," which was co-written with his then-8-year-old son, Will.

Two verses deep, Buckingham ripped out an awe-inspiring guitar solo, heeding an outbreak of cheers and applause.

"We are here in support of a new album," he said upon the song's closing. "Thanks for coming out. Hope you enjoy it."

By the fourth number, "Go Insane," Buckingham had already switched guitars three times. To some disappointment, he played the 1984 version instead of the more intricate, acoustic adaptation fans came to love via the 1997 Fleetwood Mac reunion tour.

Despite three decades of performing, his passion remains impeccably organic. His love affair with music is evident and radiates throughout his live set.

Buckingham's down-to-earth nature made the concert seem more like a coffee house, as he placed one hand on his heart and took a modest bow.

His crystalline, husky voice echoed through the rafters on Fleetwood Mac's hit "Never Going Back Again," off of their notorious 1977 album, "Rumours."

He prefaced "Big Love" with an intimate, heartfelt introduction, saying, "This was the first single from the last of the Fleetwood Mac albums before I left in the 1980s to sort of get my sanity back."

Buckingham has certainly come a long way from the crazy life of rock 'n' roll, and he made sure to note that the song now takes on a different, more profound meaning.

"It ["Big Love"] does give it a certain irony," he said.

At that point, he abandoned the electric guitar for a mini acoustic set, including "Under the Skin" and "It Was You," creeping his way to the front of the stage with every guitar solo.

Buckingham's energy was contagious. It came as no surprise when the crowd leapt to their feet for the sixth standing ovation at the close of "Go Your Own Way."

He took the stage again for a three-song encore, cohesively wrapping the night up with "Treason," the final track off of "Gift of Screws."

According to Buckingham, the song entails "the kind of lies we can tell each other ... implying that there is a better way."

He took a final, die-hard groupie's request for "Bleed to Love Her" before exiting stage left, appreciating the crowd's enthusiasm by uttering a closing statement. "It has been a pleasure...truly."

Happy times at the cinema

People across the country look for an escape from poor economic conditions at theatre

By Mara Cabo
Collegian Correspondent

When the economy goes to the dogs, moviegoers follow.

That's the apparent message of "Beverly Hills Chihuahua's" weekend box office triumph over the explosive, topical thriller "Body of Lies."

"Body of Lies" came in boasting three-time Oscar nominee, "Titanic" star Leonardo DiCaprio, Oscar winner Russell Crowe and Ridley Scott, who directed Crowe in "Gladiator" and last year's hit "American Gangster." Yet the big names and bigger action-film marketing were no match for Disney's pint-sized pooches with Mexican accents, even though "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" already had been out for a week.

According to Monday's final numbers, "Chihuahua" grossed $17.5 million over the weekend, and "Body of Lies" pulled in $12.9 million, leaving it in third place behind the low-wattage horror film "Quarantine" ($14.2 million).

These numbers are being cited as inevitable signs of the times. Last week, after all, was Wall Street's worst ever, and the general population was diagnosed with a case of high anxiety.

Did they choose to relieve their pain by seeing a mega-star thriller about the War on Terror? Nope. They went with the talking pooches.

"Movies that reflect what's going on in society in a realistic way may be a tough sell right now," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of the box office tallying company Media By Numbers. "With 'Chihuahua,' when you're sitting at that movie, how can you be thinking about your pocket book or your bank accounts or mortgage or your stocks and bonds?"

Of course, the PG-rated "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" and the R-rated torture-depicting "Body of Lies" aren't exactly apples and oranges, they're more like apples and buzz saws. Although Disney is touting the appeal of "Chihuahua" beyond parents and kids, those seeking a family-friendly comedy have few other options.

"This is 'Chihuahua' by default," said Neal Gabler, author of "Life: The Movie" and "Walt Disney." "It's not that America has said, 'Oh, we have to see "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" because the economy is melting down.'"

Gabler also debunked the "myth" that the nation flocks to escapist movies in dire times. During the Great Depression, he said, movie attendance actually dipped, and studios didn't stop releasing socially relevant dramas in addition to the era's hit comedies and musicals.

"That notion that America whiled away its troubles at the movie theater is not true," Gabler said.

While "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" evoked fond memories of Taco Bell commercials, "Body of Lies" arrived schlepping the baggage of other recent Middle East-themed films that have sputtered. "In the Valley of Elah," "A Mighty Heart," "Rendition," "Lions for Lambs," "The Kingdom," "Grace Is Gone" and this year's "Stop-Loss" and "The Lucky Ones."

Should the new movie's apparent failure be interpreted as a continuation of audiences' studious avoidance of this topic? Or was the problem that "Body of Lies" has an unfun title, got so-so reviews and didn't give potential viewers the impression that they'd be seeing anything new?

One might note that the year's most popular movie is also about the War on Terror: "The Dark Knight." Darkness is just more fun with capes, face paint and killer filmmaking.

Homecoming offers up a mixed bag of fun

Yellin hopes "to have a huge showing and pack the Cage" tonight not only for the basketball programs, but also because the University Programming Council (UPC) has put together a dance for all UMass and Five College students.

"I think this campus needs a lot more just-for-fun activities that all students can enjoy, and a dance party is really an excellent way to bring students together," said DeYandre Thaxton, Executive Director of UPC. She helped bring the event together and is expecting a big turn-out due to it following Club Kellogg and because of the reputations of the DJs UPC is bringing in.

Groove Boston was hired to bring a club-like atmosphere to the Cage after Club Kellogg. The group works from the ground up, creating the desired atmosphere for the event.

"They [Boston Groove] were able to transform a conference room in a hotel into a club atmosphere. That is their aim. They can transform any space into a club space. They bring sound lights. The Cage isn't going to be the Cage on Friday. They offer a possibility to request songs ahead of time. There's the Web site Umass grooveboston.com, and at any point before the event, students can go online to requests their songs and they will be played at the event," said Alex Gomberg of UPC, who is responsible for directing and organizing the dance.

"We're hoping it's close to 1,000 people that can make it to the event [Club U]. And we worked a lot with UMass Athletics because Club Kellogg: Midnight Madness, is the event right before it," said Thaxton about UPC's aspirations for the night.

The Black Student Union and Center for Student Development will be putting on a poetry jam Friday night at 7:30 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom. The jam will be featuring slam poet and actor Darian Dauchan whose unique style and performance skills will hope to bring crowds in from outside and around campus. This is the second year the poetry jam is being held. Along with Dauchan, Ed Manchavez, another professional poet, will be reading aloud to the crowd at the Student Union Ballroom. Student poets will also be on display during the night.

Saturday hopes to be a day full of reunions, racing, food and football

At 8 a.m., students, community members and alumni can register for the 3rd running of the Annual Homecoming 5k Road Race put on by the Center for Student Development with the hopes of raising funds for the General Scholarship Fund.

"The race was started by the Center for Student Development as a new campus tradition meant to bring alumni, students and community together during Homecoming Weekend. It's a way to exercise, get outside and enjoy New England's beautiful fall foliage," said Dorsey Spencer, coordinator of the race.

The race will begin at 9 a.m. at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Runners will run through campus and Amherst, finishing at McGuirk. Top runners will be awarded prizes from the UStore and food will be provided by UMass Dining.

At 1:30 p.m., the Alumni Tent will open up to students, alumni and friends for a tailgate before the football game. The tent is a place for students and past graduates to meet up, eat food, reminisce and make connections. The tent is sponsored by the Alumni Association which also sponsors McGuirk Stadium and the Maroon Platoon.

"We typically have about 250 people that come through the tent at each game. For homecoming, it will be more like 450," said Norma Heim, Director of Marketing for the UMass Alumni Association.

The tent opens two hours prior to the football game between No.10 UMass and No.9 Richmond. The homecoming game will be just that for the 1998 championship team as they will be honored at halftime.

"We are celebrating the 1998 championship team. We have brought back 50 or so players from that 1998 team, including Marcel Shipp, who is one of the all-time greatest players in UMass history," said Yellin.

Former head coach Mark Whipple is taking time out of his schedule as an assistant coach for the Philadelphia Eagles, who have a bye week, to show up for the event. Captains Todd Bankhead (quarterback) and Kole Ayi (linebacker) will be on hand with Shipp and wide-receiver Adrian Zullo will attend the half-time ceremony.

Saturday night looks to be a very different experience

The Muslim Student Association is putting on a special dinner in celebration of Ramadan. "The Eid dinner is the culmination of the 30 days of fasting of Ramadan," says Subhan Tariq, president of the Muslim Student Association's.

The event is being held to help people understand Islam as a religion. "Whoever attends can expect to have an experience that will change their outlook on Muslims. Muslims in this country are seen as something negative. Just a few days ago at a campaign rally for John McCain a woman accused Barack Obama of being Muslim. What if he was Muslim? That doesn't necessarily disqualify him from holding the highest position in the world. We are helping to dispel rumors about Islam.

"We'll have a brief show including performances from Muslim and non-Muslim students as well as a keynote address by Dr. Lazzouni who is a respected leader in the Muslim community. Once the keynote is over, we will have dinner as well as more performances and a gift presentation for our Halal food chef, Emma," said Tariq.

Homecoming weekend this year is full of more student orientated activities

Directors of the activities are hoping to bring the UMass campus together and have a little fun along the way. Thaxton sums it up best: "The sky is the limit for next year. Hopefully the departments on this campus will get involved more with homecoming and it can be a much bigger event next year. We're working from the foundation up."

"Because it's AWESOME"

ABC hopes 'Stone' can stay strong for another season

By Rick Bentley
McClatchy Newspapers

LOS ANGELES – "Eli Stone," the ABC comedy/drama/fantasy/musical returns Tuesday for a second season.

Last year's midseason series about a lawyer who has musical visions ended with a cliffhanger questioning whether the visions were real or the result of a brain tumor. Surgery to remove the tumor at the end of the season would suggest the series creators will need to make a decision about the source of Stone's gift.

One thing is certain. If the visions go away there'll be a lot less singing and dancing for the cast. Stone's visions can range from solo performances by rocker George Michael to elaborate production numbers by the entire cast.

Some of the show's cast members came to the series better equipped than others to handle the musical numbers. Jonny Lee Miller, who plays Eli Stone, didn't have to do much singing or dancing in the films "Trainspotting" or "Aeon Flux." And Natasha Henstridge never broke into song in either "Species" or "Species II."

The producers were just looking for good actors. It was a bonus that cast members like Loretta Devine, who appeared on stage in "Dreamgirls," could carry a tune.

Victor Garber might be best known to television viewers for his work on "Alias," but he's a seasoned veteran of musical theater. When he was cast, the producers told him there might be a chance later in the season to use his musical skills.

"Then, cut to second episode. I was singing a George Michael song," Garber says during an interview at the Beverly Hilton Hotel.

But the musical elements were not the main appeal for Garber. He was attracted to the series because there was a positive feeling about the character of Eli Stone. He was touched by that.

Once filming started, the cast realized the demands that are created doing a weekly series with so many musical numbers. There aren't weeks to practice dance moves or prepare for the vocals.

Garber panicked when he learned he had to sing the George Michael version of "Don't Let the Sun Go Down on Me." He spent nine hours with the show's musical director, Blake Neely, working on the song one line at a time.

"On television, you have to work fast. The choreography, you just have to sort of go by the seat of your pants," Garber says.

All that song and dance jazz has not been a problem for Devine. She says she has not seen the show as hard work but more as a fun way to make a living.

"When I auditioned, they didn't tell me I'd be singing. So it was like a wonderful surprise to be a part of this. So I really love it. I'm begging for more," Devine says.

Sam Jaeger, whose resume includes roles on non-musical TV shows such as "ER," "CSI" and "NYPD Blue," has a positive outlook when it comes to having to stretch himself for the musical numbers.

"Any job is wonderful. But I'm thankful I'm not on a crime show just lifting up evidence and putting it back down 40 times. Every week is a new challenge, a new experience for us as actors, and we're all really thankful for that," Jaeger says.

Henstridge adds, "We can barely carry a tune, but it gets us by."

No one escapes the musical numbers. Katie Holmes is scheduled to guest-star this season, and Mrs. Tom Cruise will be tapping and crooning with the rest of the cast.

ABC hopes that their experimental, genre jumping show "Eli Stone" can continue to keep audiences in its second show. Jonny Lee Miller returns as the title character.

Actors explore new roles

Q [for Chris and Mila]: What was the most challenging part of your roles?

CB: This is my first time playing on that side of the law and being an Internal Affairs agent. So, instead of being a bad guy, I'm a good guy. And with that being said, I just had to put myself in the mindset of the PO-lice! So that was pretty much the most challenging part for me. And because I knew the role was written, like I said, for a 60-year-old white man, I felt like I was kind of young, so I had to be as mature as possible and make sure I was 100 percent aggressive with that role.

MK: Guns, I think, for me. Being comfortable holding a gun was pretty challenging. But I think I did it!

Q: What aspects of the character did you guys bring out that will please fans of the game?

MK: Her badassness? Her ability to kick some ass and not care to take names.

Q: And what part of the film do you think will please the fans of the game?

CB: There are parts that people who used to play the video game, as far as how it looks and the direction of it, he [director John Moore] kind of puts a lot of those elements in the movie. And one part of the movie which I really enjoy is that kind of circular motion where the camera is right in front of Mark Wahlberg's face and he's kind of on an axis, the same way you can play the video game sometimes. He does that in the movie. He takes a lot of the elements of the video game and puts them in the movie.

"Max Payne" is in theatres everywhere today.

as well.

"Maybe we'll throw in a Ricky Harris or Anthony Gurley, someone like that to let the guards have a shot at it," Kellogg said.

The Minutemen will finish off the agenda with a lay-up line to give the crowd a glimpse of some things they can look forward to this coming season. After the basketball festivities conclude, the Cage will then be turned into a dance club for the crowd to enjoy the rest of the night.

Kellogg hopes what he sees Friday night and over the upcoming season when his team takes the floor will not be much different from his memories as a player.

"Thinking back to when I played in the Cage, you couldn't find a seat in the place. It was so jammed in the place, if someone got sick or had to go to the bathroom they almost had to pass the person over the top because there was no walking room," Kellogg said. "That is my memory of the Cage or the Mullins Center, and I don't know any different. So if its not filled or sold out that's kind of going to be bothersome to me."

URI scores lone goal in second half

"Really, considering some of the other things that went on during the game, we thought it was really good. She just made a statement," Rudy said. "It was just odd that this one would be called."

The Minutewomen will need help from the top of the A-10 in order to minimize the playoff implications from tonight's loss. UMass will from the standings after this weekend, but cershurt.

It will need two wins from Charlotte, Fordham and Dayton to keep the rest of the conference from moving ahead in the standings. On Sunday, the Minutewomen will have to hope for some upsets from St. Bonaventure and La Salle to stay on par with making the A-10 Tournament.

The best situation would land the Maroon and White in a tie with any number of teams for seventh place where a win would put them back in contention for a spot in the post-season.

Although Rudy will not look forward to the Minutewomen falling from the standings, the upside is that they will have eight days off. The next game isn't until Oct. 24 against La Salle.

The break should give UMass plenty of time for many of its starters to get some rest.

Redshirt senior Vanessa Lima is still not at full strength, despite playing on a high hamstring injury. The Minutewomen suffered another set-back on Wednesday when forward Vanessa Patry came down awkwardly in the last 30 seconds of practice and twisted her ankle.

The injury didn't keep her from playing, as she came in for 55 minutes, but had to come out late in the second half as her ankle began to bother her.

Patry came back nearly 56 minutes into the game after warming up on the bench.

Rudy said the senior is currently playing between 65 and 70 percent of full strength, but should recover from not competing for a full week.

The Minutewomen will do some light conditioning today to help heal some of the injuries and then have two days off.

"We haven't had two days off in awhile," Rudy said.

Minutemen to hold free public skate

The Massachusetts hockey team is hosting the annual Skate with the Minutemen on Sunday at 2 p.m. at the Mullins Center practice rink during their weekend off.

The event will feature an hour of open skating, hot chocolate and other light refreshments.

After there will be an autograph session with free posters featuring each skater and a schedule for the 2008-09 season. Each poster will be autographed by UMass coach Don Cahoon and the rest of the Mass Attack.

UMass will play Rensselaer on the road Tuesday in Troy, N.Y. and the Minutemen return home to play Providence on Oct. 31.

Returnees important Veterans return

UMass to face La Salle, West Chester

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team looks to remain undefeated in the Atlantic 10 as it heads into weekend games at La Salle and at West Chester.

The No. 17 Minutewomen (10-3, 2-0 A-10) are coming off consecutive wins against conference foes Richmond and Siena. The Maroon and White beat both teams to scores of 3-1 and 5-0, respectively.

Both wins, impressively, occurred while UMass was without two starters, junior forward Cher King and freshman goalkeeper Alesha Widdall. The two will be returning to the lineup this weekend after competing at the Pan American games in Mexico City for the past two weeks.

Coach Justine Sowry, though, does not expect much of a change in her team's play.

"It should have absolutely no effect whatsoever," Sowry said. "Yesterday, they integrated back into practice very well. Cher is probably quite tired. [Alesha] looked quite sharp yesterday and we're looking quite forward to their return."

While King was gone, the team's front line of senior Katelyn Orlando, junior Jill Powers and sophomore Katie Kelly had outstanding performances. With King returning, Sowry is now tasked with finding playing time for each player.

"It's great that we have a lot of flexibility now," Sowry said. "It's good because we can adjust on the fly and I believe we're comfortable with whoever we put in there."

"Both of UMass' games this weekend will be against teams with losing records and with no conference wins."

The Explorers (5-8, 0-2 A-10) have lost four games in a row, but still present a challenge as a conference opponent. La Salle boasts one of the better defenses that the Minutewomen have faced this season. The Explorers have surrendered only 1.92 goals per game this season and posted three consecutive shutouts earlier this season.

In addition, La Salle presents challenges beyond those from the Explorers' the playing surface.

"It's a different surface. La Salle," coach Sowry said. "It's field turf, so the ball can play differently. Your footwork can be a little bit different."

Hank DeVincent's unique field surface has been an advantage for the Explorers this season. La Salle is currently 4-3 at home while going a mere 1-5 on the road.

With five goals and no assists, Junior Colleen Lechner is the offensive leader on a team that's been less than prolific so far this season with 1.54 goals per game.

After Friday's game at La Salle, the Minutewomen will then travel to Pennsylvania to take on the Golden Rams (5-8, 0-2 A-10).

West Chester's field hockey program is the pride of the University's Athletics department. The Golden Rams' athletic programs are all in division three, except in field hockey.

"Over the course of the years, they have great tradition, and coached by someone I admire and respect, Kathy Krannebitter," Sowry said. She's been around for a long time, she's a good coach and she's well respected in the coaching community."

"She prepares her team well. They're a Philly team, they're hard nosed and they would die for each other. So I'm expecting a pretty tough game."

Though they hold identical records, the Golden Rams have not performed as well statistically as the Explorers. West Chester has been outscored by the opponents 38-21 this season while La Salle has only been outscored 26-20.

The team's offense is carried my sophomore midfielder Brittany Colak. She currently leads the team with nine goals and three assists. Her 21 points on the season is currently second in the A-10.

Meanwhile, West Chester Junior goalkeeper Joelle Zarefoss is the conference leader in saves with 109 in 13 games. The combination of freshman Alesha Widdall and junior Sarah Williams in goal has only produced 43 saves for the Minutewomen.

King and Widdall return to boost team

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

After sweeping both opponents in its first week of Atlantic 10 Conference play, the No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team gains added firepower with the return of forward Cher King and starting goalie Alesha Widdall.

UMass (10-3, 2-0 A-10) has been without both Widdall and King while both players participated in the 2008 Junior Pan Am Games. Widdall started in goal for the United States, while King captained the Barbados team.

"They integrated back into practice really well," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "Cher is probably quite tired, she played five games in seven days and pretty much played every minute. Alesha has no side-effects whatsoever. She looked quite sharp [in practice] and we're all looking forward to their return."

The U.S. team went 4-0-1 to win the gold medal, qualifying them for the World Cup in Boston in the summer of 2009. Arguably, Widdall's best game came against Bermuda, whom the U.S. shutout, 21-0. In two games in goal, Widdall went 2-0, allowing one goal.

Sowry is undecided on whether or not she will platoon Widdall with junior Sarah Williams in the Minutewomen's games this weekend against La Salle (5-10, 0-2 A-10) and Westchester (5-8, 0-2) A-10).

Barbados went 1-4, with its only win coming against Bermuda, winning 4-0. King scored two goals in the tournament as her team took seventh place.

Outcomes aside, the experience both players gained in the tournament is invaluable as the Maroon and White enter the final two weeks of the regular season.

The final four games could make or break UMass' season. Coming into this weekend, the Minutewomen are tied with Saint Joseph's (10-4, 2-0 A-10) and Temple (6-8, 2-0 A-10) for the top spot in the conference.

"I played a lot of hockey in the past two weeks," King said of the experience that she's gained in the past two weeks. "Playing in games at that level, [the feeling] is still on you and you feel the intensity and you bring it into games here."

"Here," will be on the road for both games this weekend and time will tell if either Widdall or King is affected by the constant traveling.

Now that Sowry has had a chance to review the entire team this week, she's undecided as to how she wants to play both players. With King playing in all games for Barbados in their entirety, Sowry could ease her off the bench and start junior Jill Powers, whose seven goals rank second on the team.

The UMass forward line is very deep and experienced this season, giving Sowry a lot to work with when deciding matchups for upcoming games.

Widdall's experience in the Pan Am Games, including the gold-medal game that went into overtime will bolster the young defense, which has been suspect at different points of the season.

She improved her leadership capabilities and her knowledge of formations, which will benefit the Minutewomen in many situations, especially penalty corners, a weakness of the Minutewomen.

"I think I'm energized to finish off the season," Widdall said of the workout she got at the Pan American Games. "Mexico was a release but I'm ready to come back and get down to business."

Swimming and diving to start

Minutemen and Minutewomen to take on Boston University in opener

By Kyle Predki
Collegian Correspondent

The men and women of the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams gear up this weekend for their first meet of the 2008-09 season. The road to Atlantic 10 Championships begin with an away meet on Saturday against Boston University.

This'll be the second straight season the Minutemen open against Boston University, hosting last year's meet at the Joseph R. Rogers Jr. pool at Boyden gym. Although the dual meet last year resulted in a loss for both the women's and men's teams, the men finished first in the 2007 BU Invitational later in the year.

The teams gathered a few new competitors in the off season, four on the men's team and seven on the women's. The new competitors will experience the high caliber competition UMass has produced in the past years. With R.J. Rappe graduating last year, a new spot is open for another competitive leader. Rappe was the top diver for the Minutemen, with the highest score of nearly 150 points more than his following teammates in both the one meter and six meter.

This weekend's meet will give the new members a chance to showcase their talent, specifically for Jason Cook, a three-time All-American diver from Amherst Regional High School.

"This is going to be Jason's first collegiate meet," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said. "His knees might be wobbling a little bit."

The Terriers, already competing in an exhibition meet against Brown, will prove to be a worthy opponent for the Minutemen.

In their meet against Brown, Boston University posted 11 individual wins for the women and seven for the men. But the Minutemen aren't worried about the results of this starting match.

"My focus is building a championship squad," Yarworth said." "We don't prepare all the time for duel meets."

The same game plan holds true to the women's team. The real goal is the championship at the end of the season.

"How we swim and what we do on Saturday is completely irrelevant to where we are going to be in February," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said.

The women of the UMass swim team are built as a balanced team with much of it its competitors dominating in all areas of competition.

A key piece to this all-around balance is Anne Fogarty, the A-10 three meter dive champion. She'll compete this weekend in hopes of a repeat performance of last year.

Both coaches believe this is just a routine for the swimmers and divers. They're expecting a top performance but not worrying about the results. This is the peak of training for the two teams, who are spending endless hours in the pool getting ready for what is to come later in the season not in the beginning.

"Swimming is a training sport," Yarworth noted. "And the idea for me is not about how well and how fast we swim in a duel meet, it's how fast we swim in February."

UM down UCONN

The Massachusetts tennis team defeated Connecticut 5-2 yesterday to start their season. UMass extended its winning streak against the Huskies to five matches.

The Minutewomen's last loss to UConn was in 2002.

The UMass doubles teams defeated UConn in all three of their contests.

First doubles partners sophomore Candyce Boney and junior Maude Lecluyse beat UConn's Emily Herb and Kelley LaRosa, 8-4.

In singles play, the Minutewomen won four of six matches with the most impressive performance coming from Lecluyse.

She defeated UConn's Allison Campitiello after losing her first set.

The Maroon and White return to the court on Nov. 7 at the Big Green Invitational, hosted by Dartmouth.

Six a choice for Green

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Unlike questions one and two, there aren't any lawn signs for Question 6 yet this election season, but former Green-Rainbow party gubernatorial candidate Jill Stein, M.D., says the future depends on it.

"The ship is sinking," Stein told the approximately 30 people crowded into a South Amherst home for her presentation, "A Secure Green Future."

Stein was invited to encourage area voters to vote "yes" on Question 6, which would put pressure on local representatives to support legislation mandating an 80 percent reduction of greenhouse emissions in Massachusetts by 2020 – 30 years sooner than more popular national measures. It would also phase out tax incentives for non-renewable energy projects and put focus on localized sustainability.

Stein said the situation is dire, but going Green is more feasible than most people think.

"This economy, the Green economy, is already happening," she said.

Stein and Smith College physics professor Nathanael Fortune, Ph.D. provided a presentation outlining what they said was the rapidity with which global warming is taking hold of the planet, as well as the limited availability of non-renewable resources in years to come.

Fortune said more drilling and increased production of fossil fuels would only exacerbate the problem.

"The first solution to any problem where supply is concerned is to change how you live to reduce the demand," he said.

Stein advocated pushing to get Question 6 passed in order to bring the conversation on sustainability and reducing emissions to the forefront.

Question 6 is part of a statewide effort by the Committee for a Secure Green Future (CSGF) to get emissions reduction and sustainability incentive initiatives on the ballot In as many communities as possible.

Stein said that the question is on the ballot in 11 legislative districts and about 24 cities and towns. Because Question 6 is a local initiative, the actually number of the question varies – it is Question 6 in Amherst and Question 5 in Granby, Hatfield and Montgomery.

It also has not received as much attention as those higher up on the ballot question food chain.

"The thing about local ballot initiatives is that they

UM Quidditch to play for Cup

By Vincent Capone
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Quidditch team will compete in the second national multi-college Quidditch World Cup Tournament for the first time next week, hosted by Middlebury College in Vermont.

Quidditch is a sport played by characters in J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter book series.

In 2005, Middlebury College brought the game of Quidditch to the "Muggle," or human, world. It's played on the ground instead of the air, but many rules closely mirror Rowling's literary portrayal.

Muggle Quidditch has four positions: three Chasers, two Beaters, a Keeper and a Seeker. The game combines elements of tag, football, lacrosse and rugby.

Budget slashed

Recessions and state budgets

The University's 2008 budget will be reduced by 1.5 percent due to Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick's five percent cut.

UMass faces $12M reduction

By Chris Russell
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Robert Holub said he will be forced to cut $12 million from the University's budget this fiscal year, in response to Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick's recent five percent state budget cut.

The current economic situation is expected to cause budget cuts next year as well, which will make private donations more important to the University of Massachusetts, Holub said in a campus-wide email sent last Wednesday announcing the budget cuts.

The $12 million cut represents 1.5 percent of UMass' $789.2 million 2008 budget, forcing Holub to implement "one-time cuts to campus units and a halt to all hiring except for the most critical, strategic positions," he said.

The chancellor's office did not respond to an e-mail asking what these 'campus units' are.

According to Holub, "By taking these one-time budget actions now, we will not request mid-year fee increases, nor will we make cuts to student financial aid."

Holub also said he will begin discussions to deal with "the base budget reductions these cuts represent in the next fiscal year's budget."

These "base budget reductions" in next year's budget have some UMass students apprehensive.

Junior Elisha Adey said she fears the possible effects of a recession on the University.

"I am very concerned for what's going on in our country and state economically," she said. "I am depending on financial aid and student loans to pay for my undergraduate coursework, and will also need those resources for graduate school."

Junior Joseph Berger echoed these sentiments.

"Financial aid. That's what I'm most worried about," he said. "Most kids need some help to go here, and if that gets cut a lot of people are going to feel it."

In 2007, 70 percent of undergraduates received need based financial aid totaling $178.3 million, according to the UMass Office of News and Information.

A recent poll taken by the UMass Alumni Association showed alumni also relied extensively on financial aid.

Over 65 percent said a college education would have been totally out of their reach had they not been able to get financial aid, and 43 percent said they think the current economic situation will make college difficult or impossible to afford for some people who would have been able to attend in normal economic times.

With the probability of reduced state aid next year, private donations, including those from alumni, will become more important to UMass.

According to University spokesman Ed Blaguszewski, UMass received about $33 million in donations last year, which he describes as essential for the functioning of the University.

"Private support from alumni, parents and friends is very important to the present and future success of UMass Amherst," he said. "The campus depends on both public and private support to maintain and improve its status as a nationally recognized public research university."

Blaguszewski added that he is "concerned" that private donations may decrease this year, but projections "are very difficult to make" at this time.

John J. Havens, a researcher at Boston College's Center on Wealth and Philanthropy, said he believes the economy will not cause a large drop in charitable giving.

He recently told a conference of fundraisers "that it may be a year before the troubled economy begins to take a toll on the sums charities collect," according to the October 8 issue of the Chronicle of Higher Education.

Havens said "the decline in giving won't last long, and won't be significant" as long as national

State ranks low on enlistees

By Josh Walovitch
Collegian Staff

In the past, living within a rural community or in an area where there is limited economic opportunity, have been predictors of military enlistment rates around the country.

Recently retired University of Connecticut professor of sociology Jim DeFronzo made some observations and identified some predictors that may be more accurate when analyzing the enlistment rates of our nation.

"I found that the percent of people with hunting licenses in a state, the percent of state residents divorced or the percent who are not church adherents [those devoted to practicing their religion] tend to be better predictors of military enlistment rates than other variables," said DeFronzo.

DeFronzo supported his claim with statistics comparing people living in Massachusetts and Alaska, because of their tendency to be polar opposites in terms of enlistment rates.

Massachusetts has a low ranking in terms of people who have hunting licenses, residents who were divorced and the percent of people that are not church adherents. Alaska ranks just the opposite, having a high percentage of people in each category.

States like Alaska have provided our country with a surplus of 18-24 year-old enlistees per capita, around 57 percent more than the average. Others states, such as Massachusetts, have contributed about 47 percent less than the average.

Statistics involving the number of college and job opportunities available in a state are also used to predict national military enlistment rates.

"Alaska is a much more isolated state [compared to Massachusetts] with less 'influencers' and also less opportunity for college or jobs," said UMass Amherst ROTC Senior Military Advisor, William LaFever.

At UMass, over 72 percent of the 103 cadets in the ROTC program are from in state, with the majority of the out-of-state cadets from the North East.

According to the National Center for Educational Statistics, Massachusetts is home to 253 colleges, universities, technical and vocational schools while Alaska offers 35.

"When someone like myself who grew up in a small community in Alaska, a state that is not known for their business rather their natural resources," said UMass graduate and Alaskan native Micah Bloom. "It was the obvious choice for kids in my situation to get out of the state and enlist in the army or go to school, which in turn provides many life experiences that we may have not gotten had we stayed in state."

As of June 2008, Alaska has the fifth highest unemployment rate at 6.8 percent and Massachusetts has the 24th lowest unemployment rate at 5.2 percent.

"I think just being a blue collar worker in Alaska makes them more susceptible to joining the military," said Bloom. "Additionally, Alaska like many of the mid west-states has suffering economies and few job opportunities to retain college graduates."

Minutewomen drop hard-fought match

URI outlasts UMass in A-10 match

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Prior to yesterday's game against Rhode Island, the Massachusetts women's soccer coach knew that URI could break out at any point during the Atlantic 10 season.

He hoped it wouldn't happen against UMass (6-5-3, 3-3-1 A-10). The breakout happened defensively for the Rams (6-9-1, 2-5 A-10) as they shut-out the Minutewomen, 1-0.

Goalkeeper Lauren Luckey's streak of two consecutive shut-outs came to a close, despite finishing the game with five saves, but the offense never came through, as the Rams limited opportunities the entire match.

URI held UMass to two shots, but only one counted on goal. The Rams took nine shots in the first half, but none of them found their way into the net.

"I thought they did a really good job of pressurizing," Rudy said.

The first score didn't come until the 17th minute of the second half. Freshman Stephanie Santos took a hard shot on the left side from 10 yards out and finished on the lower-right corner of the goal.

UMass followed up an off-sides call with a foul. URI kept the possession and converted on the opportunity.

Sophomore Ina Bjorklid set up the goal after passing the ball to midfielder Kaylen Shimoda. The sophomore then got it to Santos, who had the lone tally of the game.

Both teams stayed aggressive throughout the match, but it was freshman Lindsey DiOrio who made a play the officials believe was too aggressive.

The back received a yellow card after making a slide-tackle at the end of the second period.

Ashley Hamel and the Minutewomen have to brush back their tough 1-0 loss to URI behind them as they take on La Salle and Fordham this weekend.

UMass basketball coach Derek Kellogg hopes for a large showing not only at Midnight Madness later tonight, but throughout the season at the Mullins Center.

Klub Kellogg to jump-start season

Kellogg hopes for big showing tonight

By Johnny R. Lanzaro
Collegian Staff

When the doors open up for Klub Kellogg tonight, it'll be somewhat nostalgic for Derek Kellogg.

"It's kind of funny walking in there every day. My best memories there was during practices and in the last game in the [Curry Hicks] Cage," Kellogg said. "Now, coming back as a coach, there's some sentimental value to that."

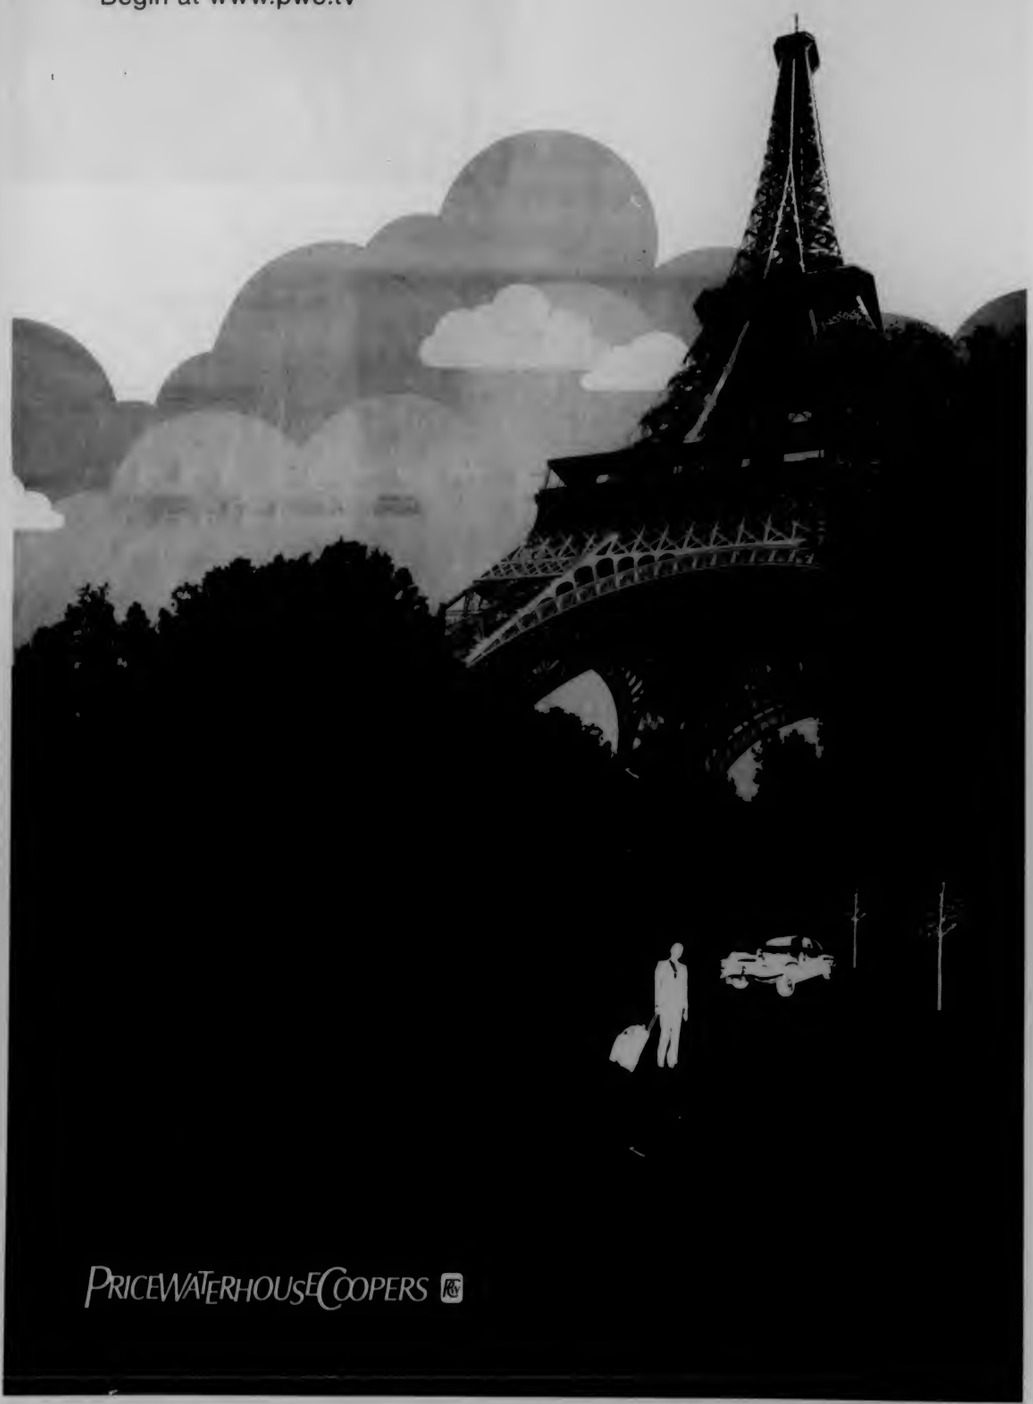
The doors to the Cage will open at 6 p.m. with activities for fans able to come away with T-shirts and other prizes, before the floor is given to the teams. Kellogg is hoping for a great turnout at the event as he feels it's important to the success of the team.

"To have a high-level basketball program, you need student involvement. You need the students to take them on as their own team and have fun at the games, enjoy being around the team and the players and come make it a festive atmosphere."

Once the players take the court and are introduced to the fans at 7 p.m. they will take part in activities where they can showcase their talents. Both the men's and women's teams will take part in a three-point shooting contest and some of the men's teams will participate in a slam-dunk contest.

The lineup for the dunk contest is not finalized yet according to Kellogg, but there are some players expected to partake including last year's champion, Terry Guffrey.

"I heard Terry Guffrey, which surprises me, was the champion of last year's dunk contest, and he's going to try to hold onto his title," Kellogg said.



Others who may showcase their skills are Oregon State transfer Sean Carter and freshmen Javad Gibbs and Travon Wilcher. Some guards may see some action

Magic time for UM players

Since its creation, "Muggle Quidditch" has expanded into a national phenomenon, with over 180 registered teams nation-wide.

Fourteen colleges and universities are expected to join UMass and Middlebury in the tournament, including Amherst College, Boston University, Chestnut Hill College, Emerson College, Princeton, Vassar, Louisiana State, University of Washington, McGill University, Carlow University and Green Mountain College.

Junior Matt Drake started UMass Quidditch last spring. This will be the team's first major competition. UMass Quidditch is a Registered Student Organization and has enough members for two full teams, allowing them to play games and practice scrimmages and drills.

"I think the best part about the world cup is that we can go in with no expectations, except for a good time," said Drake. "We're bringing 20 people and all of them are incredibly enthusiastic just to have the opportunity to play."

"I'm really proud of how the team has come together for the event," he said. "It's really been a team effort to plan out transportation, shirts, capes, a banner and general preparation for game strategies. There's so much that goes into it, and it's so great to see our group all working at that same goal."

"Middebury has been playing Quidditch for three years," said UMass Quidditch treasurer Kristina Moy. "So, I don't expect us to win, but I do want this to be a fun, once in a life time opportunity. It will definitely be a rough weekend since we need to be there by 9 a.m., and the game will not end until 6 p.m. A lot of gas, a couple of endless nights of little sleep, but as long as our team is in the bandwagon with us, then we are all set to go. And that's what matters."

Moy said she is delighted about the festival-like atmosphere accompanying the Tournament.

"It looks like a lot of fun because it's not just about Quidditch; there will also be entertainment like bands and such," she said.

The tournament will have activities relating to Rowling's novel. There will be live musical entertainment, a capella performances, owls, alpacas and other animals, exploding "potions" chemistry experiments and the "Flying Fists," a student fire-juggling club. As for the Quidditch game itself, it will feature live sports announcement, fully-equipped bleachers and tents and local Vermont food for sale.

"This will be a great opportunity to meet new people who like to play Quidditch as well, and potentially some Harry Potter fans," Moy said. "Seeing how other groups coordinate their teams will help us improve ours."

The tournament will be held on Sunday, Oct. 26 in the middle of Middlebury campus from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. The event is free and open to the public.

More information is available at the College Quidditch website at www.collegequidditch.com.

Question for sustainability

Calls for reduced emissions

From QUESTION SIX on page 1

don't come out on the booklets from the state," said Larry Ely, who hosted the event in his home.

But those in attendance last night said the question cannot wait for the whole state to catch on.

"The way things are now, 20 percent by 2020 isn't enough and we should shoot higher," said Gerald Peterson, a retired University of Massachusetts physics professor. "That's what this does."

"The idea that we have the luxury of waiting until 2050 is a fallacy," said Eli Beckerman, field coordinator for CSGI. "We're trying to raise the conversation to a higher level of urgency."

Stein said that the plan to reduce emissions by 80 percent is based in the research of two authors: Lester R. Brown, author of "Plan B: Rescuing a Planet under Stress & a Civilization in Trouble," and Bill McKibben, author of "Deep Economy: The Wealth of Communities and the Durable Future."

"Both of them are essentially saying, 'This is really urgent, this not rocket science and this is a problem that's eminently solvable,'" she said.

Cody Torn, a UMass alum who operates LocalGreenie.org, "a Craigslist for Green business," said he's excited by the prospect of Question 6 providing incentives for sustainable business.

"I'm interested in money going to Green jobs and Green careers," he said.

Stein said much of the legwork for getting the question on the ballot was done by local people in individual districts.

"It was carried out where volunteers came out of the woodwork," she said. "And they did."

Stein encouraged those in attendance to contribute to the cause, asking as little as a contribution of a few dollars, to make phone calls to friends and neighbors in support or to volunteer to hold signs outside the polls on November 4.

"I would love to feel confident that this would pass, but we don't have a budget and we don't have staff on the ground," she said.

incomes do not drop sharply, which would make the impact on giving "more severe and prolonged."

He based these assertions on data from the 2001 recession. From 1999 to 2002 household wealth dropped 20 percent...the largest drop since the 1930s, but household donations only fell 10 percent over the same time. Havens added that as wealth began to increase in 2002, so did donations.

Corporations and condoms

Nick O'Malley

That's right, you might have missed it, but on Thursday afternoon, there was a Starburst-sponsored trailer that set up shop next to the parking garage. In an attempt to appease the students, the promotion included representatives handing out free samples of their new "Starburst Gummiburst" candy while inviting students on to a makeshift stage to play a round of Rock Band.

The company's organizers were obviously playing off of college students' two favorite things – free food and Rock Band.

It all went down nicely, as the promotion fulfilled its purpose of raising awareness of a new product while University of Massachusetts students took candy from strangers. The only downside was the candy itself – a Gusher-esque product with a small pocket of juice and too much bland gummy. Neither Starburst or the University could have asked for much more from the promotion.

Plus, we all got free candy out of it.

Going back a couple of weeks, though, UMass faced some scrutiny when the campus lawn played host to a caravan of promotional tents by Trojan Condoms. Not everyone appreciated Trojan's product placement in the middle of the campus.

As liberal as UMass is, birth control remains a touchy subject. Going beyond that debate, however, is the issue that UMass chose to bring in a corporate giant for this purpose.

Student-run events, such as "sex on the beach," that promote safe sex are one thing, because they're not sponsored by the school. But when companies are brought in, it gives off the image that the University supports those companies. It's hard to argue against such a point when corporations are parking their 18-wheelers in the middle of campus.

When the university opens its gates to the condom manufacturers and their ilk, it's a corporate Trojan horse.

As the University brings in companies and allows them to showcase themselves in the heart of our campus, it raises the issue of our school's image, and what these promotions do to it.

We see promotions and free handouts on this campus every day. While we witness Trojan Condoms set up shop in the middle of campus one day, there are radical Christians handing out bibles to all passersby the next. The only difference between the two, is image.

When we see the man with his stack of bibles, we see someone trying to spread the word. But when the University opens its gates to the condom manufacturers and their ilk, it's a corporate Trojan horse.

Chancellor Holub was brought in because the UMass system wants to improve its national status. However, it's difficult to see how the presence of these companies takes the university in that direction.

This isn't NASCAR, where you can slap advertisements from Budweiser and Wonder Bread on your hood and get away with it. The top schools in the nation don't work like that. Because if you're really that good, you don't need the money.

UMass hasn't sold its soul to advertising yet. But this is the school that holds a contract with Coca-Cola that prevents students from seeing a Pepsi logo for a five mile radius.

There's a fine line when it comes to bringing companies on campus. There was one case where I was waiting for a bus at Haigis Mall and got a free sugar free Red Bull from a Red Bullmobile. That's all well and good. It's when companies are setting up shop at the heart of the campus with trucks, tents, and promotional assistants running around giving out samples and drawing in students, that the line begins to be crossed.

This, however, is not as bad as the credit card companies that come to college campuses in order to entice naïve college students with the prospect of free stuff. They know all to well what a college student will do for a free t-shirt.

College campuses are targets that advertising companies are dying to get their hands on – particularly alcohol companies. In a place where Beirut is the national pastime and the weekends start on Thursdays, there is no better market for the major beer companies to get a younger audience.

Fortunately, most universities have resisted attempts to place alcohol advertising on their campuses. Most companies are limited to television ads to reach such an audience.

The college student age group has an extensive market of product aimed directly towards them. Jolt, Vault, Mountain Dew, Red Bull, Rockstar and my personal favorite Bawls are just a handful of energy drinks that are in huge demand from students that prefer to wait until dawn to go to bed.

Advertisers and college administrators both try to suck as much money as possible out of college students. The only difference is what students get in return.

These large-scale promotions have their benefits for the university. However, as long as advertisers have any stake in the campus' image, the school loses advertising in its most important product - the UMass brand.

NASA: big budget, big projects, big deal.

Hannah Nelson

NASA was created out of pure ego. The space race started like a global sporting competition with national rivalries. Which country could outdo the other and get the furthest first?

Would you like me to pull out the tape measure? Of all the perfectly practical ways to spend taxpayer money, sending it into an endless vacuum is the one most dreadfully wasteful endeavor. Scientific pursuits are all well and good, but how on earth is space exploration furthering humanity's well-being?

In these economically troubling times, why continue to pump money into sending men and women into space when there are children right here on earth who would benefit from improvements to public education? Or the college students who would like to be a little less in debt?

The current proposed NASA budget for 2009 is $20.2 billion, up from 2008's $17.3 billion. This year's NASA spending only accounts for 0.6 percent on the $2.9 trillion fiscal pie chart. But to give some perspective, as of 2007's $15.8 billion budget, each taxpayer was contributing about $57 annually to NASA.

To some people, these numbers may seem marginal. One price tag given for warring in the Middle East during the Bush years has been $604 billion taxpayer dollars. Approximately $810 billion has been spent on NASA in over half a century. While those numbers may seem to give more clout to an anti-war argument, consider the deficit brought on by the latter sum. Maybe NASA has been a silent parasite all these years.

Obama has continually promised in the debates and elsewhere, that he plans to go through the US budget and eliminate and cut from programs that are not cost-effective, productive or even necessary.

If NASA doesn't stick out like a sore thumb I don't know what does, with the possible exception of Congressional salaries. I'm willing to level on this though. I'm not necessarily advocating for NASA to meet the infamous hatchet, I'm just saying that there's some restraint needed.

Europe's collective space program has recently announced that it's Mars exploration program, ExoMars, will be postponed until 2016 due to the financial crisis. The current estimate for ExoMars is 1.2 billion euros, approximately $1.6 billion US dollars.

The ExoMars mission had already been pushed back previously from 2011 to 2013. As of 2005, ExoMars had a budget of 650 million euros, but plans for expansions and improvements outgrew their wallet.

If NASA doesn't stick out like a sore thumb, I don't know what does, with the possible exception of Congressional salaries.

Italy, the country heading the mission, won't invest any further, and none of the other countries want to up their stakes either. If Europe is shelving a space project that has a price tag that pales next to NASA's yearly budget, shouldn't that be some kind of sign, regardless of the US place in the global hierarchy?

The nice little twist in all of this comes with the European Space Agency looking to try to persuade US and Russian involvement to get the funding to keep the mission afloat.

The US has committed to backing the construction of two of the necessary instruments involved; this in light of the fact that NASA's Mars Science Laboratory project is over budget itself.

This is a large vote of confidence on the part of the US, given that the only other time Europe gave Mars the old college try five years ago, the robot was lost in the red planet's atmosphere. The Mars Express satellite that deployed the lost robot is still out there, sending perfectly good quality pictures back.

The next Mars mission for NASA set for 2009 is also lacking the necessary funds. The aforementioned Mars Science Laboratory is the size of a car and the largest Mars rover to date. The price tag on this one was upped from $1.6 billion to $1.9 billion and is still short, with officials staying tight lipped on how much exactly is missing.

And NASA has the gall to go to Congress for the surplus, now, when people are losing their homes and retirement funds. There must be a hole in the salt shaker, because if the rover doesn't get launched next year on schedule, the project will only continue eating up money. The Mars Science Laboratory is being called "a really important scientific mission" that is being touted for its impending impact on the next 10 years of space exploration.

What happens to all the elementary school children, who after years of tidy lessons on outer space, are won over with career ambitions of riding into space themselves? There's irony when the same children, college aged today, can't afford a college education.

What use is there then in knowing that there's water on Mars and exiling Pluto? One of ExoMars's goals is to continue that worn out task of searching for life. Well there's plenty of life right here on Earth that could use a watchful eye.

Digital doodling

Paul Payer

Throughout the lecture halls and classrooms of this University, it is a common sight. Perhaps you are even guilty of it yourself.

A student slouches slothfully in his chair, clicking idly through Facebook pages, while a professor drones on regarding the presence of neoclassicism in 18 century French literature.

I personally have never understood this phenomenon, which takes place at least a couple times every day in each of my classes. What motivates people to walk to class and sit in a cramped lecture hall for 50 minutes, only to spend that time watching South Park repeats on YouTube? If an individual's primary objective involves refreshing their knowledge about the seventh season of South Park, why come to class at all?

A fair argument against this criticism can be made: students are simply looking to cash in on that sweet attendance grade, and care about little else besides being present for class. Walk into any class on a Friday morning, and this will be blatantly evident. Most students do not go to class in a daily pursuit of knowledge, or with hopes of being entertained by the professor. But most students do go to class, and at least feign the appearance that they do.

I can only imagine what a professor thinks when his or her eye catches sight of an AIM window on a student's laptop screen in the place where Microsoft Office should be.

I'm sure they cannot be too pleased with such behavior, as it essentially amounts to a non verbal statement stating that the student doesn't have any interest in what the professor has to say to the class on that day, which is the professor's job. Imagine a business meeting where a sales presentation is met with drowsy nods of the head and intent concentration upon crossword puzzles and Sudoku boxes.

I'm not saying I don't share guilt in this problem. Whenever I bring my laptop to class, I always seem to justify checking my e-mail on the basis that I might have some important message or notification, but in reality I'm only interested in what new bumper stickers I got on Facebook or how my fantasy soccer team is doing. These actions seem to have become basic accessories to living in a technologically advanced and connected society.

Although this is true, the loss of productivity and attention due to menial online activities is staggering. The distraction goes beyond simple in-class clicking and surfing. Imagine adding up the aggregate hours spent by UMass students on Facebook, crossword puzzles, Sudoku and YouTube in comparison to time actually spent on writing papers or studying for exams.

Imagine adding up the aggregate hours spent by UMass students on Facebook, crossword puzzles, Sudoku, and YouTube.

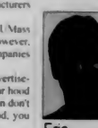
The result wouldn't be pretty.

Several studies and surveys in the workplace have been conducted regarding the amount of time spent on web-surfing and online social networking. One survey of 10,000 employees across a broad range of industries found that employees waste about two hours a day on average. The study also found a huge divergence between age groups, with young professionals wasting far more time with frivolous internet activity.

Conventional wisdom says that poor habits relating to work ethic and diligence are difficult to break. Talking around the water cooler at work or doodling in a notebook during lecture are activities which have been around for decades and will likely continue even if e-mail replaces the water cooler, and surfing on a laptop in class replaces sketching in a notebook.

As students, we invest a great deal of time and resources into attending college. It likely represents the largest investment one has made in life up to this point, and requires one dedicate the majority of one's time to college-related activities. Although nobody is arguing that Facebook and YouTube represent the downfall of society and intellectual achievement, managing your time properly will probably make your semester, and life, easier in the long run.



It would be completely unfeasible and unfair to suggest that students should be in a constant state of rapt attention during class time. We would all simply burn out. Distractions can be a good thing; it's a reason why employers of the employees mentioned in the above study decided not to completely block out Facebook and other distractions. It keeps people sane.

If your intention is to spend a full class period playing World of Warcraft in the back row of Mahar instead of listing to the lecture (as some student in my sophomore year biology class did), then maybe you should reevaluate your decision to come to class that day and possibly your decision to attend college in general.

On the other hand, if you just need a break in a busy day, or a second to distract yourself from a monotonous lecture, then flip open a Collegian and recharge your batteries with a Sudoku.

The character of debate

Eric Magazu

If you had a chance to watch the final presidential debate last Wednesday night, perhaps you were inspired by Senator McCain's direct appeal to Joe the Plumber. In McCain's vision, "Joe" represents the everyman of small businessowners throughout the country that will be negatively impacted by Obama's plans for a tax increase. Senator Obama, on the other hand, promised the American people fundamental change that would make America a better place.

Regardless of the philosophical and ideological positions you might take, it seems to me that Obama focused on his vision for the country, while McCain focused on pointing out the negative aspects of Obama's positions. This negative comparison comes across as ironic, when it is McCain who repeatedly indicates he is personally hurt by the negative aspect of the campaign thus far.

I suppose there is not much that presidential candidates can do about our fundamental character.

A significant portion of the debate was a discussion of the negative tactics used in the television advertisements of both campaigns. This discussion detracted from the limited time available to discuss the pressing issues facing the American people. If you weren't well versed in positions of the two candidates before the debate, I wouldn't be sure that you would have a strong view of the underlying ideological approach of each candidate after the debate.

From my experience, voters tend to focus less on the specific subheadings of issues, such as education, healthcare and the environment, but instead look at the philosophy of each candidate to determine if it lines up with his own vision of what America is all about. Beyond this, personal features such as honesty, experience and charisma tend to play a large role in the decisions of most voters.

When it came to the intended audience of each candidate during the debate, McCain gravitated towards using phrases and terms that are known by political insiders, while Obama conveyed his message directly to the American people. McCain referred to issues such as the Medicare prescription drug plan, the 9/11 commission and the patients' bill of rights.

These three issues had their time when they were high on the minds of the power players in Washington, but by rattling off his positions on these issues, McCain probably lost the interest of most viewers. McCain needed to explain what these issues were all about.

McCain often invoked terminology used casually by columnists and pundits, but not often used by people when discussing issues in the breakroom at work. McCain sprinkled his statements with phrases such as "class warfare," "spreading the wealth" and "elections have consequences." These references are fine, and were probably recognized by most of the journalists covering the debate, but, without further explanation, were likely lost on most others.

By contrast, Obama was substantive, while being careful to clearly convey what his positions on these issues meant. Obama stated areas where he did not adopt the mainstream view of the Democratic Party. He pointed out that he supported tort reform, contrary to the position of most trial lawyers, that he supported linking teacher pay to their performance, contrary to the position of most teachers' unions and that he supported clean coal technology, contrary to the position of most environmental organizations. While both candidates were able to discuss the issues in which they played an active role, it was Obama that managed to connect these issues with the American people.

The debate presented us with a brief survey of the issues such as education, healthcare and the environment, but failed to address the most essential issues. We did get to hear a brief response on the requisite question that seems to sum up all of the moral and social issues of our day, the candidates' position on Roe v. Wade. Roe v. Wade is a Supreme Court opinion that effectively invalidated most of the substance of the individual abortion laws of each state. This question hardly reaches the surface in what is a much larger issue affecting the nation deep down.

With the most essential issues facing the American people absent from the debate, it appears that the significant repair needed is still a ways off. It is in our day that we are witness to an almost complete breakdown of the essential bonds of tradition that preserve the order of our society. It is not so much, as Obama conveys to us, a fundamental change that is required, but simply a return to the values that were once held by ourselves and by the ones that came before us. The self-indulgent, materialistic, atmosphere of today is a way of life that simply won't be sustained indefinitely.

I suppose there is not much that presidential candidates can do about our fundamental character. It is instead up to each one of us to repair the breach and prepare the paths. It is then that we will find the one for which we are looking. As for this election, as it pertains towards the end of conveying a comprehensive vision to the American people, it appears to me that Barack Obama has a clearer and more convincing case to make to each and every American.

Iron Horse welcomes Mirah

BY EMMA REED
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Soft, sweet and fierce, Mirah Yom Tov Zeitlyn surrenders herself in the form of a lullaby-esque voice and lyrics that could make a lumberjack cringe, cry and call for help. Tonight, the Iron Horse will be the temporary home to indie-alternative-rock angel, Mirah and opening band No Kids.

Mirah was born on her family's kitchen table in Philadelphia, and just four short years after her unorthodox birth, went on to write her first song. After spending most of her life in Philly, Mirah moved to Olympia, Wash. at the age of 18. While attending The Evergreen State College she began singing and performing. After what she describes as "four funny years," Mirah graduated, taught herself to play guitar and began writing songs.

IRON HORSE MUSIC HALL
TONIGHT
$12 | 8:30PM

In 1997 Mirah released her debut album "Storageland" (Yoyo Recordings) and in 1999 joined K records, a record company focused largely on artful collaborations.

On board with K records Mirah released the album "You Think It's Like This But Really It's Like This" in 2000. A collection of four of her own recordings alongside collaborations with Phil Elvrum of the Microphones, the album was an instant success.

But it wasn't until 2001 with the release of "Advisory Committee," that Mirah solidified her place in the indie-rock world. Now 11 years and 10 albums later, Mirah released her newest album "Old Days Feeling" in July of 2008, and she isn't stopping there.

"I would like to make music for the rest of my life and I'd also like to make a living for the rest of my life. I try not to worry myself too much about whether or not these two things continue to align themselves," Mirah said in an interview with Holmes Wilson of Downhill Battle.

Musical exploration tends to be Mirah's modus operandi, and has casually set her apart from other up-and-coming artists. Her cooing vocals accompanied by Elvrum's majestic orchestration create an unadulterated melody of emotions in the title track of her 2002 album "Cold Cold Water."

Innocently raw vocals are complimented with a hissing snare drum and a simple acoustic guitar riff in "The Sun."

Simplicity reigns supreme in "Jerusalem," an endearingly simple ode to her Jewish roots.

"Don't Die in Me" is gloriously heart wrenching. The honesty of Mirah's lyrics combined with the ghostly rhythmic snares creates an almost dream-like feeling.

Genre mixing generated opportunities for Mirah to experiment lyrically. Exploring subjects from religion and history to heartbreaking endings and passionate beginnings, Mirah's lyrical prowess taunts and teases fans.

The devastatingly honest "Body Below" explores pain and desire with the lines, "But what starts with desire / Can turn into need / The chest gets all tight / Like it's got some disease." While "100 Knives" expresses sexual contentment ("I want to mess up the sheets with you / There's nothing I'd rather do") and devious memories ("You were trying to kill me").

Mirah has collaborated with artists from K records and Yoyo Recordings extensively.

Beginning her career with Elvrum, the two worked together on her albums and on just about all of the albums produced by the Microphones.

Mirah also did collaborations with the Black Cat Orchestra, an acoustic ensemble consisting of horn, cello, saxophone, drums and a double bass, and Brooklyn based artist Ginger Brooks Takahashi, with whom she created the album "Songs from the Black Mountain Music Project."

Maddow newest talk-show titan

BY CHUCK BARNEY

It's about 10:30 p.m. in New York and Rachel Maddow has just finished her nightly television gig at the MSNBC studio in Rockefeller Center but she's still very much "wired." Now, she just desperately wants to get some z's.

"If I don't get to sleep by midnight the prospects for a good night's rest are about one in a million," she says in a phone interview while walking briskly along Sixth Avenue toward her apartment. "I might as well hit myself over the head with a ball-peen hammer."

It's a wonder that Maddow, a Castro Valley, Calif., native and Stanford grad, can sleep at all these days. The relentless blur that is her life consists of daily anchoring duties for the Air America radio network and blogging assignments for the Huffington Post. She's also penning a book on the heavy topic of American militarism since 1949.

But the job generating the most buzz is one she has held for only a few weeks. As the liberal-minded, John McCain-bashing host of "The Rachel Maddow Show" on MSNBC, she has boldly bolted into the cable-TV news club of political pundits while racking up mostly rave reviews and robust ratings.

"She has supernatural reserves of energy," says Bill Wolff, Maddow's executive producer. "She works harder and longer than anyone I've ever known."

She's also got smarts to spare. Maddow, 35, is a Rhodes scholar with a doctorate in political science from Oxford. A lesbian who came out at the age of 17, she wrote her dissertation on AIDS activism in prisons.

"She's pretty unreal," Wolff marvels. "Intellectually, she kind of runs laps around everyone."

Maddow warmed up for her current assignment with regular guest bookings on CNN and MSNBC, including the network's top-rated program, CNN's Larry King.

Rachel Maddow is the first openly gay woman with a national news program. Her show "The Rachel Maddow Show" airs on MSNBC.

The keys to her success? Maddow blends that impressive intellect with a quick wit, a refreshing calmness and engaging smile. Unlike other unabashedly partisan cable-TV commentators, she stands emphatic cheers for her side, but does so with a touch of self-deprecation and a disarming brand of charm.

"There's a sardonic quality to her, but she's not mean-spirited," says Tom Rosenstiel, director for the Project for Excellence in Journalism. "The nastiness is missing. She obviously knows how to connect with her audience."

And behold her motto: "Mind over chatter," a film rebuttal to the obnoxious shouting matches that plague cable television. As a rule, only one guest appears on Maddow's show at a time, thereby cutting down on the din.

"I'm just trying to pay back the uni-

In Good Spirits' feeds off community theater setting

BY MICHELLE FREDETTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Arena Civic Theatre put on a spirited performance Friday night at the Shea Theater in Turner's Falls.

Walking into the moderately sized theater, one could hear the friendly chatter among the many spectators already seated and ready to watch the ACT's production of "In Good Spirits." There was an atmosphere of familiarity, one that is often found in audiences of community theater productions – everybody has season tickets and everybody knows everybody else.

In such an obviously community-theater setting, it was refreshing to watch a production that poked fun at itself, making fun of community theater all night long.

The set was well done without being too simple or too over-the-top, and it left a lot of open space for the many players to fit on stage.

With such a large cast, choreographer Melanie Reneris did what she could with the small space. Dance moves were kept simple and repetitive, but were appropriate for the lyrics.

Some of the dancers, however, had difficulty staying on beat and not everyone put the same amount of "oomph" into their moves. Since so much of the show contains comments on how terrible community theater is, these mistakes fit in and actually add to the comedy of the production rather than detract from it.

The same is true of the singing. Sarah Kaczmarek of UMass Amherst (Bunny), Alana Martineau (Rosemary), Dawn Ross (Edie), Emma Henderson (Carol-Ann), and Chris Dunay (Mortimer) sang impressively, but they were exceptions.

While not bad, the rest of the cast's singing paled in comparison. The rest of the players struggled to hit high notes and endeavored unsuccessfully to project their voices.

Again, though, because the singing was still respectable, the times when it fell short simply played into the jokes about the competence of community theater's.

Moreover, the troupe's production of Howard Odentz's "In Good Spirits" left spectators in stitches throughout the show, making them forget about any weakness in dancing or singing.

One area that was not lacking in any way was the orchestra. The small orchestra did justice to three-time Emmy Award-winning composer Bruce Zimmerman's orchestrations.

Unlike many musicals where the lyrics get lost in the loud instrumentation, keyboardist and conductor Ams Roberts-Crawford, clarinetist Cliff White, and drummer Leo Arthur played beautifully without overpowering the singing.

Filled with wacky comedy and sexual innuendos, this is a show perfect for a modern sense of humor.

Odentz has included pop culture references younger audiences will appreciate, such as clever references to the film "The Sixth Sense," as well as jokes for the older theatergoers, like a song about actress Carol Burnett.

The hilarity of the writing was enhanced by the clever directing of Robert Ducharme. For example, when Rosemary does the hand motions and mouths the words to the song, her daughter, Carol-Ann (Emma Henderson), sings. Rosemary's actions perfectly captured the spirit of an overzealous pageant mom.

Rife with such zany notions as a fluoride chocolate bar-selling dentist, "Jaws the Musical," and a huge six-foot man in drag, the ridiculousness of the show proved irresistible for viewers.

Ducharme's direction upped the over-the-top comedy of the production, as drag ghost Tequila Mockingbird (Dave Peck) and 1950s not-quite-so-good good girl Bunny (Kaczmarek) added extra flour-

Mt. Holyoke goes Vegas

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Saturday started so innocently. The Red Sox were winning an honest game in Tampa, while the foliage around central Massachusetts was in full bloom. Come nightfall, the quiet, chilly afternoon experienced quite the transformation.

Saturday evening marked Mount Holyoke College's annual celebration of Las Vegas Night, an event funded by the college's Student Programs. From 10 p.m. to 2 a.m., the college opened its gates to a slew of five-college students, as they were invited to spend the night gambling and dancing.

When Mount Holyoke plans for Vegas Night, they go all out. Students were encouraged to dress to the nines. Not only did you need to play your cards right, but you needed to look good while you did it. Many students proudly donned their best attire, ranging from tuxedos to ball gowns. Still, the formal gowns met their match against the cocktail dresses and skin-tight leather bodysuits, which were surprisingly widespread.

For the most part, the event took place in two buildings. In the Blanchard Campus Center, Vegas Night attendees were allowed to bet on various casino and card games. Though normally a modest cafeteria, the Blanchard floor was peppered with tables of green felt.

Blackjack, Texas Hold'Em and Gin were some of the more popular tables, but they were only a small handful. A dynamic jazz ensemble helped maintain the mood of Las Vegas on the fair stage.

In the next room, a midnight buffet was being served to an eager crowd of dolled up party-goers. Despite its lack of the more traditional Vegas martinis and shrimp cocktails, the breakfast buffet was immensely popular.

Another main highlight was the chocolate fountain, which has long been a custom and universally-welcomed luxury in Las Vegas.

Upstairs, there were more tables and a vast amount of people. At certain moments, it seemed as though no one was paying any attention to one another. The large crowd brought a strange energy – an exuberance that illustrated a need to keep moving. Whether talking on a cell phone, sending a text, or becoming easily amused by the night's atmosphere, party-goers were certainly in search of something to dance to.

Taking scrabble to the great outdoors

BY MARY BETH BRECKENRIDGE
AKRON BEACON JOURNAL

LAKE TOWNSHIP, Ohio — For Jane and Keith Crane, Scrabble is an outdoor sport. The Cranes installed an eight-foot-square game board in their backyard earlier this summer, so now their Thursday night Scrabble tournaments take on outsized importance.

The Cranes are both Ohio educators. She teaches second grade at Firestone Park Elementary; he retired after 36 years teaching government at Tallmadge High School.

And both, not surprisingly, are aficionados of the word game. So when Keith Crane saw a smaller version of a game board installed on an HGTV show, his interest was piqued.

He fashioned the board from pavers laid in a bed of sand. 225 of them, to be exact. He installed them all in one day and had the back pain to prove it.

Jane Crane painted the bonus square in the proper colors and made letter tiles from craft-store wood plaques.

She took apart shelves and reconfigured the pieces to make tile racks, and pavers and tiles were sealed to prevent water damage.

Now Scrabble games at the Crane house are a physical as well as mental pursuit.

The players have to get out of their seats to place their tiles on the board and pick new ones from the selection spread out face down in the grass.

They usually play on Thursday evenings, when Jane Crane's mother, Nancy Johnson, can get in on the action. She lives near Malvern, Ohio, and typically spends the night between her Thursday volunteer stint at Akron City Hospital and her Friday morning tennis match in Manchester, Ohio.

Sometimes other relatives or friends show up.

Keith Crane and his wife Jane built this large scrabble game in their backyard in North Canton, Ohio.

A couple of weeks ago, neighbors who'd seen the Cranes playing came by, driven by curiosity.

"You know, it's fun because we get outside," Jane Crane said. "It gives us a good excuse to be out."

They haven't faced many challenges, other than having to light patio torches when darkness falls or dealing with the few times their dog, Maggie, has run across the game board. If it rains, they just take the game inside - on a regulation Scrabble board, that is.

"But you know," Jane Crane said, "it's not as much fun."

ishes to their words and held looks for longer than expected.

For example, when Kaczmarek delivers her line, "It's a madhouse!" it comes out more like, "It's a MAAAAAAADhouse!" The exaggeration in this and other areas would make anyone giggle about their absurdity.

Musical Director Amy Roberts-Crawford did the same, having singers flaunt their range unnecessarily in a humorous rather than showy way. The actors raised eyebrows and winked while doing so to make sure you knew the embellishment was intentional.

Casting was exceptional across the board. Especially notable were Steve Woodard as Taslo; Dawn Ross as Edie; and Dave Peck as Tequila. Woodard was the quintessential grumpy old (dead) man, Ross was perfectly upbeat, and Peck seemed to actually float across the stage in his drag queen costume.

Chris Dunay and Alana Martineau, playing the leading (living) man and woman, stepped effortlessly into their roles, almost making one forget they were acting.

Young Emma Henderson, only nine years old, performed strongly and enthusiastically. She never portrayed any nervousness for a moment, appearing completely at ease in front of a crowd.

And, of course, it's difficult to forget (Prima) Donna, played by Martha King-Devine, who truly looked as though she thought she ran the show.

With strengths in every area and weaknesses in only a few, the Arena Civic Theatre's production of the hilarious new musical "In Good Spirits" is simply hysterical.

The ATC will continue performing "In Good Spirits" Oct. 24 and 25 at 8 p.m., and Oct. 26 at 2 p.m. at the Shea Theater in Turners Falls.

Vegas Night at MHC

Once out of Blanchard, students were guided down a sidewalk lit by a series of colored ornaments. Walking past the campus' Wilder Hall, beyond Mead Hall and across the street, one began to hear the loud thumping of speakers.

Chapin Hall was the other half of Vegas Night – the musical half. The stage was pumping with the sounds of seven emcees, who kept the students in motion the entire night.

Still, any attendee of Las Vegas Night will say the best part of the evening's events was without a doubt the after-party.

Mount Holyoke's campus is nationally recognized as one of the most beautiful and scenic of the five colleges, and the dormitories are no exception. The ivy-strewn brick buildings were brimming with students long after the 2 a.m. cutoff.

The night was not without its drawbacks, sadly, and several ambulances were called to site. Though the college had many warnings about the dangers of excessive drinking, a few students went overboard and paid dearly for it.

"It's a fun night where you can dress up how you want," freshman Rinat Degani said. "But there's an obscene amount of alcohol and some people just go crazy."

The Substance and Alcohol Awareness for Everyone, or SAAFE, issued flyers and brochures which circulated around the campus in the previous weeks, with advice on how to remain responsible throughout the evening. Though closely watched by the SAAFE program, Vegas Night is notorious for its slack regulations.

Saturday's quiet afternoon was long gone, and in its place was a very late Sunday morning. The chips may have fallen where they may, but the 2008 Las Vegas Night will leave a definite imprint on the Mt. Holyoke campus, and on everyone who was a part of it.

Host goes from Air America to MSNBC

verse," she says of the show's gift of less gab.

That doesn't mean Maddow runs from a fight. She admittedly loves to argue ("Going toe-to-toe and hashing things out is fun") and one of her favorite foes is arch-conservative Pat Buchanan, who appears regularly on the show.

"The fact that he will come and spar with me with such a generosity of spirit is great - even though I think 85 percent of his views are toxic," she says.

Maddow and Buchanan might be the oddest of couples. At 19, she watched the 1992 Republican National Convention on television in tears as he denounced gay rights in a fiery culture-war speech that rocked her to her core.

"It was like he was declaring that my own country was at war with me," she recalls. "Now, I get it intellectually and strategically, but at 19, I only got it emotionally."

Apparently, all is forgiven. When they're not tussling for the cameras, Maddow and Buchanan often chat up their mutual love of spy movies. And on the refrigerator in the Castro Valley home of Maddow's parents is a photo of the two of them posing arm in arm.

"It's a kick," says Bob Maddow, an attorney with an office in Walnut Creek, Calif. "They couldn't be more diametrically opposed, but they have a healthy respect for one another."

Bob and his wife, Elaine, admit it's "surreal" to see their daughter beaming all over television (she appeared on "The Tonight Show With Jay Leno" last week). But they knew early on they weren't raising a typical child.

Rachel's interest in current events surfaced when she began reading newspapers from cover to cover in elementary school. Her tenaciousness was apparent in the way she amassed bumps and bruises as a three-sport athlete at Castro Valley High ("We gave away six pairs of crutches when she went off to college," says Elaine). Her nonconformist ways were evident when, as the valedictorian of her high school class, she ditched the conventional preapproved graduation address at the last minute in favor of an improvised speech about social responsibility.

It drew a standing ovation.

As for her keen debating skills, they often materialized in the verbal skirmishes she waged with her parents and older brother David.

"Anytime we would have a disagreement, she could outtalk me and give me a run for money," Elaine says. "It got to the point where I'd have to say, 'OK, we're not going to discuss it anymore.'"

After graduating from Stanford in 3 years, Maddow settled in San Francisco, where she worked to promote AIDS prevention and gay rights, focusing especially on getting medicine to HIV-positive prison inmates. Then it was onto Massachusetts to finish her dissertation.

It was there that Maddow's broadcast skills began to emerge. Friends urged her to enter a contest being held by a Holyoke radio station to find a new on-air personality. With no experience to speak of, she auditioned and was hired on the spot. She thrived in the job and in 2004, "Air America" lured her away.

As an athlete, the 5-foot-11 Maddow likened herself to Eddie the Eagle, the gung-ho, fish-out-of-water Olympic ski jumper who soared into the hearts of fans despite a glaring lack of talent. Now, she sees some similarities in her TV persona.

"In a way, I think viewers identify with me because I seem real," says the woman who refers to herself as a "total dork."

"Everyone had the idea that they could do what Eddie did on the ski ramp and I think there's that feeling with me on television."

Wolff prefers a different athletic comparison.

"It's like watching Tiger Woods play golf. It seems like he doesn't break a sweat, but you know he worked incredibly hard to be able to do what he does," he says before going on to rave about Maddow's grace under fire and ability to break down and make sense of complicated issues.

But not everyone is a full-fledged fan.

A National Review media blog calls her "condescending" and Alessandra Stanley of the New York Times recently complained that she doesn't "add a fresh or contrarian perspective to a cable news channel that increasingly positions itself as the Anti-Fox."

Rachel Maddow has seen her national news program's ratings double its predecessor since its September launch.

Maddow counters that her show consistently reaches out to the other side and that members of the McCain campaign have declined numerous invitations to appear on the show.

In fact the boycott ended only last week when McCain's senior policy adviser Nancy Pfotenhauer came on.

As for her on-air approach, she qualifies as her biggest critic.

"I want to be psyched on this job every day, but I'm not," Maddow says. "This is very new to me. It's really fun, but it's also really hard. And like I've got miles to go before I'm close to being good."

Hogan back in the reality ring

By Madeleine Marr
McClatchy Newspapers

Hulk Hogan is back where he belongs, in the ring. Sort of.

Hogan returns to his first love at 8 p.m. EDT Saturday on CMT's "Hulk Hogan's Celebrity Championship Wrestling," in which he helps 10 "celebrities" become wrestlers.

We use that term loosely since the cast includes troubled child stars (Danny Bonaduce, Todd Bridges), on-the-periphery siblings (Frank Stallone) and cross-dressing hell raisers (Dennis Rodman).

On a conference call, the man born Terry Bollea, 55, was in a surprisingly good mood for someone with pressing family issues: Son Nick, 18, is in jail, daughter Brooke, 20, has moved out and has her own reality show and wife Linda is trying to clean him out in their divorce. Some highlights:

How's life treating you?

"People say, 'You've been through a tough time,' but it depends what you call tough in this crazy, materialistic world. People have special children, people are fighting for their country or living in the street."

Why another reality show?

"I'm always looking for new ways to generate some money without getting kicked in the head. I always get approached by fans saying they quit watching wrestling when I stopped. So we said why don't we do kind of an "American Idol" of wrestling?"

Why train real wrestlers?

"The old time wrestlers – the Ultimate Warrior (Brian James Hellwig), Randy Savage, Andre the Giant – aren't around anymore. It's like a bunch of robots now, with interchangeable parts, the art form was lost. The only larger-than-life characters are celebrities."

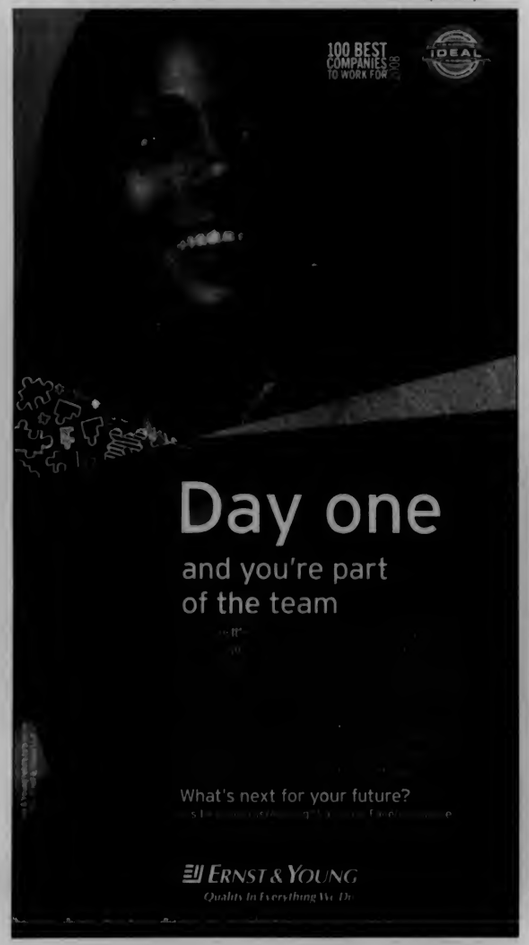
What do you want fans to know about the show?

"The old bald-headed Hulk Hogan is back out there. I think it'll bring 'em back to the good old days."

Will we see you wrestle?

"Maybe they'll crank me up the ramp in my wheelchair (laughs). I'm not retired, just tired. I've got a fake knee, fake hip. I'll have to get some matching parts first."

Who's the best competitor?



"Redman really surprised me. (Then Chicago Bulls/now L.A. Lakers coach) Phil Jackson called me back in the '90s saying, bar none, Redman was the best athlete he'd ever coached. Better than Michael Jordan. Though he wouldn't shut up talking his normal crap."

Anyone better than you expected?

"Todd Bridges: this kid stepped up. He's got the coordination, balance, awareness and presence in the ring. And Dustin Diamond. You wouldn't think he could crack an egg but he was so dialed in, living the part, walking around in character, yelling into the camera. He's Andy Kaufman reincarnated."

Hulk Hogan (right) is making a return to both wrestling and reality television with his new series "Hulk Hogan's Celebrity Championship Wrestling." Celebrities include Dustin Diamond (left) and Dennis Rodman.

UMass running back Tony Nelson is slowed down by Richmond defensive back Seth Williams in Saturday's homecoming loss to the Spiders. Nelson, the leading rusher in the Colonial Athletic Association, was limited to just 61 yards on 23 carries.

Woodward) but returned in the fourth after missing the next offensive series.

Both starting quarterbacks were efficient, but not spectacular. Coen was 18-of-30 for 165 yards and a touchdown, while Richmond's Eric Ward was 11-of-20 for 95 yards and a score. But the game was decided on the ground, as Vaughan's 156 yards on 21 carries surpassed UMass tailback Tony Nelson's 61 yards on 23 rushes.

Richmond used Vaughan's 74 rushing yards in the first quarter to jump out to a 9-0 lead. After its first drive resulted in a 23-yard field goal, tight end Joe Monteverde made a tough catch in the end zone on a fourth-down play for a touchdown on the next drive (kicker Andrew Howard missed the extra point).

After a UMass field goal by Armando Cuko, Richmond responded with its third consecutive scoring drive to start the game with a 12-play, drive capped off by a 2-yard touchdown run by Ward. The Minutemen answered right back with a 22-yard touchdown pass from Coen to Victor Cruz.

In the second half, UMass hit an early field goal cutting the deficit to 16-12. But the blocked punt by McBride led to a 23-12 Richmond lead. Shortly thereafter, Coen went down briefly with the injury.

"I didn't think we had much rhythm today," Brown said. "I saddly we tend to get better [as the game progresses] but Liam went down in the second half and we had to go in a different direction there."

After Ward fumbled on the first play of the fourth quarter and UMass' drive stalled under Woodward, Cuko connected on a 38-yard field goal, giving UMass a chance down one score at 23-15. Cuko missed a 43-yarder on the next drive and Richmond marched down the field 74 yards on eight plays for Vaughan's second touchdown of the game and a 30-15 lead.

Game Notes

Brown said Coen would be re-evaluated on Sunday and Monday. The 1998 National Championship UMass team was honored at halftime, including Manuel Shipp, Todd Hankhead and coach Mark Whipple. Woodward didn't complete a pass in four attempts. He replaced Coen a second time late in the game – because of the insurmountable lead – and was intercepted ... Of Richmond's 12 drives, five started in UMass territory. Howard was 121-for-121 on extra-points prior to his miss. UMass also missed an extra point with the score at 16-9, as the snap was mishandled by Woodward ... Richmond missed a 55-yard field goal at the end of the first half. UMass' Jeremy Miles caught the short kick in the end zone, but chose to kneel it for a touchback to end the half. The attendance of 15,953 was the 21st largest in school history and the third of 15,000-plus crowd this season in three home games.

Punt block hurts UM

was fair caught, another was muffed and the other one was returned for four yards.

Compare those numbers to the punting game of the Minutemen who had five punts by Brett Arnold that averaged 36.6 yards per punt but only 15.4 net yards per punt. UMass had to deal with Richmond's return men, Justin Rodgers and Derek Hatcher who averaged 21.5 yards per punt return, including a 45-yard return by Rodgers.

UMass coach Don Brown knew what they would be facing in the kicking game, but did not execute what they practiced all week.

"In practice, we tried pooching it. We shot to land it between the 20 and 25 yard line [Arnold] is a great young man that takes his job very seriously, but I would have like to seen a little better job of spotting the ball," Brown said. "We kicked low and right to [Rodgers], which is disconcerting."

In both kickoffs and punts, the Minutemen continually tried to take away the chance for Rodgers to make a big play on a return. But Rodgers continually took the short kicks for decent returns that gave the Spiders great starting field position, something Brown knew might happen.

"We were trying to short-kick and keep [Rodgers] away from killing us in the kick return game," Brown said. "I did not want to give him the chance to kill us on a homerun. In reality when you have to defend against marquee players in those kick return scenarios, you run the risk of giving their offense decent field position."

The biggest mistake on special teams, though, came about half way through the third quarter. The Spiders' punt team had pinned the Minutemen at the UMass 26-yard line and after three straight incompletions by UMass quarterback Liam Coen, the Minutemen were forced to punt.

Arnold took the snap, and before he could get the kick off, Richmond's Nicholas Battle was in the punters face and blocked the punt.

"If you ever wonder what the coaches do before the game, we're out there with the stop watches and looking at things. You time the operation time from their snapper to their punter and it looked like it was a little slow, looked like if you really wanted to get at it, you may have an opportunity to get after it," Richmond coach Mike London said. "If the opportunity presents itself we said we're going to go after one and we went after one and it worked."

J'Nnamdi Smaugh recovered the ball on the UMass 13-yard line and it set the Spiders up for a touchdown. The Minutemen had been playing well on defense prior to the block, but lost all momentum after it, something Brown calls "the biggest momentum changer in college football."

so much. Last season, opponents averaged only 19.2 points per game against UMass. This year it's up to 32.4. The problems are unquestionably up-front. In 2007 the Minutemen sacked the quarterback 44 times in 13 games. This season they have six in six games.

The Minutemen are now 4-3 overall and 2-2 in the Colonial Athletic Association. Entering the Richmond game they were ranked No. 10. My guess is they slip to approximately No. 16 with this latest loss. Granted, all three of their losses were to great teams, but all four of their wins were by small margins (12, 3, 10 and 4 points) and against teams that aren't all that strong. The problem for UMass is that at least four CAA teams will be ranked ahead of them in the new poll Monday (James Madison, Richmond, New Hampshire and Villanova) and a fifth (William & Mary) could conceivably as well.

"Theoretically, the UMass football team could make the playoffs," said coroner Ely Rosenswaike. "If they ... and that's a big if ... win the remainder of their games, they would likely get in. But I don't think they can be revived in time for the Nov. 15 tilt against New Hampshire.

"And even if they do beat the Wildcats, one of the other remaining four teams on the schedule could knock them back out." Rosenswaike added. "And it that doesn't happen, I don't think this team has it all together to make a serious run in the playoffs."

The Massachusetts football team is survived by 20,114 undergraduates, 5,750 graduate students, 1,175 faculty members, the Maroon Platoon, the Marching Band, www.umassshops.com and Sam the Minuteman.

The Memorial services will be held at McGuirk Stadium after the regular season concludes for the Massachusetts football team on Nov. 22, with Sam the Minuteman crying officiating.

Harris said.

The night started with the women's basketball team introduced as the "Dack Attack," referring to coach Marnie Dacko. The Cage, featuring a crowd of around 2,000 people, erupted as the Minutemen were introduced afterward.

The first event was the 3-point shootout featuring a player from both teams. The winning team was forwards Kristina Danella and Luke Bonner with nine baskets in the last round.

The night ended with forward Tony Gaffney defending his dunk contest championship from last year with a 360 in the final round.

"His dunks were pretty good," Kellogg said. "I've seen him do better but I think he was a little nervous."

For the seniors, Friday night was not only about having fun, but getting ready to work towards making the NCAA tournament. Point guard Chris Lowe sees no reason why that can't happen this season.

"We've got one of the best backcourts in the country coming back," Lowe said referring to himself and Harris. "I'm just ready for the season to get started. We have unfinished business."

UM sweeps weekend

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 Conference now has a lone team atop the standings.

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team defeated both West Chester and La Salle to pull ahead of Temple as the top team in the conference.

The Minutewomen (12-3, 4-0 A-10) dropped the Golden Rams, 4-1, on Sunday to keep their winning streak going. UMass hasn't lost in its past five games, and have won nine of its last 10.

Senior Katelyn Orlando scored two goals against West Chester, giving her a team-leading – and career high – 11 goals this season. Her first goal came in the first half, off of a pass from Erin Parker that she one-timed into the right side of the goal.

|---|---|
| UMass | 4 |
| W. Chester | 1 |
| UMass | 2 |
| La Salle | 0 |

Orlando found the back of the net a second time by way of a Christine Rodgers pass, which drew WCU goalie Joelle Zarefoss away from the goal. With her back toward Zarefoss, Orlando took the pass from Rodgers and wheeled around to fire the ball into the empty net.

"I think she's just gaining a lot of confidence now," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of Orlando's goal-scoring pace in the second half of the season. "She's finding herself to be at the right position at the right time. The effort that she's put in, these past four years, she's definitely getting some rewards."

With opposing teams spending so much time trying to stop Orlando, other players are beginning to shine as well.

Sophomore forward Katie Kelly has scored a goal in each of the Maroon and White's last four games. Her eight goals ranks second on the team, as does her 20 total points scored.

The Minutewomen pounded the West Chester net with 14 shots-on-goal and freshman goalie Alesha Widdall saw only two shots against her in the game, one of which was the only goal given up by her this past weekend.

Another strong point of Sunday's game was UMass' second-chance efforts. Two of the Minutewomen's four goals came after a failed shot-on-goal that deflected in UMass's favor.

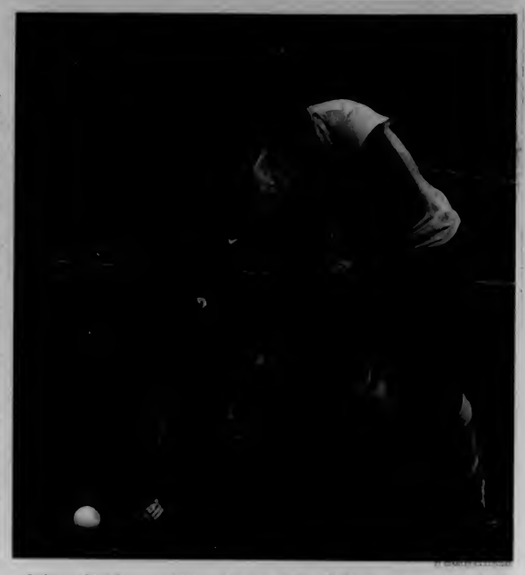
The UMass forward line pressured the Golden Rams (5-9, 0-2 A-10) more than any other line on the field. Seven of the Minutewomen's 14 shots came from Orlando, Kelly and junior Cher King.

King played an integral role in both of UMass's games this weekend. She scored on a rebound from sophomore defender Jaime Bourazeris' shot and had her hand in on another penalty corner. King passed the ball in bounds to Kelly for her lone score of the game.

La Salle (5-11, 0-4 A-10) also fell victim to the skill of King.

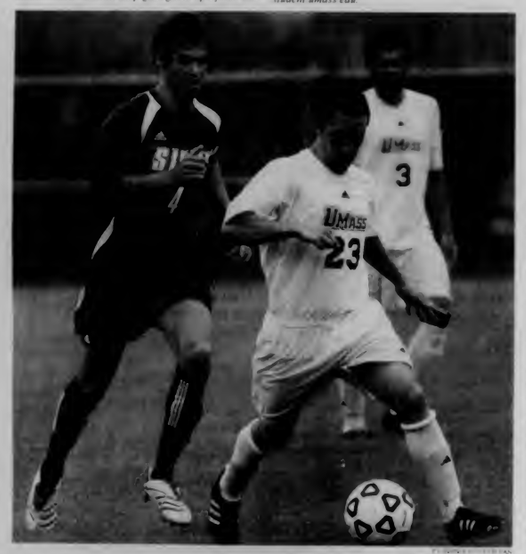
She assisted both goals scored by the Minutewomen in their 2-0 shutout of the Explorers. Both assists came when King intercepted the ball from the opposition and created a breakaway.

"Every time she plays, she provides a whole other level of play," Sowry said of King's value to the team. "She has great skill, she has great vision, she sees the field really well and she's a gamer."



A positive for the Minutewomen in this game was the lack of penalty corners they gave up, a concept that Sowry stresses each practice.

Widdall also showed no signs of fatigue after her gold-medal-winning performance for the United States at the Junior Pan Am Games.



She blanked La Salle for the fourth shutout of her young career. She had six saves in the winning effort. Widdall is 8-4 while in goal this season for UMass.

The Minutewomen return home for their final two games of the regular season this weekend against Saint Joseph's (11-5, 3-1 A-10) on Friday and Temple (7-9, 3-1 A-10) on Sunday for Senior Day at UMass.

Sophomore Jaime Bourazeris dribbles past Harvard midfielder Shelley Maasdorp in a game earlier this season. The Minutewomen went 2-0 over this past weekend, defeating both West Chester and La Salle.

UMass midfielder Chris Vaccaro slips by Siena midfielder Sebastien Anzevui in a game earlier this year. The Minutemen broke out of a four game scoreless streak this weekend, besting St. Bonaventure, 4-1 Friday.

DeSantis, Minutemen look better offensively

sure on UMass' defense, but the Minutemen were able to handle it. Senior goalkeeper Zack Simmons proved once again to be the backbone of the Minutemen as he recorded his third shutout of the season.

"I thought we handled the ball as well as we have [all season] as far as getting ourselves out of pressure and moving the ball quickly," Koch said. "[Duquesne] was a very difficult opponent to play against. They came at us for the whole 90 minutes and then the two overtimes."

On Friday, the Minutemen showed what they can do offensively as they dominated St. Bonaventure (2-4-4, 0-2-1 A-10). The Minutemen were focused throughout the game and attacked the SBU's weaknesses as they moved the ball into dangerous scoring areas.

In the first half, sophomore Ben Arikian had the only goal. The midfielder carried the ball down the right side of the field as he crossed the ball in front of the St. Bonaventure goal, but luckily for the Minutemen, the Bonnies' defense misplayed the cross and deflected the ball into their own goal.

"We just kept doing what we've been doing and that's trying to create opportunities, and this time we were able to put them away," Koch said. "Once we scored the first goal we got more confident and we put St. Bonaventure in a tough situation where they had to come out and try to tie up the game."

In the second half, the Bonnies became more offensive and concentrated on their attack instead of their defense, making it easier for the Minutemen to score.

And they did, three more times.

Mark DeSantis had two goals. He scored with a header on a cross from senior attack Prince Ofosu (51st minute) and he headed in a free kick taken by Tony Bassett (87th minute). Ofosu contributed once again for the Minutemen just a few minutes after his assist on DeSantis' goal when he scored an unassisted goal.

The Minutemen will continue their run for a berth into the Atlantic 10 Tournament this weekend with two home games Friday against Richmond and Sunday they will take on George Washington.

Game notes

In Sunday's tie, Zack Simmons earned his 26th career shutout – the most in UMass history. — DeSantis's two goals on Friday tied his career-high two goals in a single game. He set the record on Oct. 12, 2007 against Dayton. — The four goals that were scored on Friday are more than half of the goals the Minutemen have scored all season (seven goals before this past weekend). — The last time the Minutemen scored four goals in a single game was Oct. 29, 2004 in their 4-0 win – also against St. Bonaventure. — Sunday's game was UMass' fifth time going into double overtime this season – not one overtime game has been decided in a single overtime. — Ofosu's goal on Friday was his third goal of the season, he remains the leading scorer for the Minutemen.

Swim teams open up season with losses

By Holly J. Galvin
Collegian Staff

With a home dual meet on the horizon, both Massachusetts swimming and diving teams will take a 0-1 record into this upcoming weekend's matchup with Army after close season-opening losses at Boston University.

Despite stellar freshmen performances and the men's squad's domination of the one-meter diving event, the Terriers overtook the Minutemen, 134-109, and the Minutewomen, 148-98.

Diving coach Mandy Hixon's men's squad got off to another solid start, placing three of the top four performers in the one-meter: Jason Cook (305.18, second place), Byron Johnson (253.80, third place) and Adam Duffield (244.65, fourth place).

Cook, an Amherst native swimming in his first-ever college meet, was also the three-meter dive's leading performer, scoring 359.63 and finishing first overall.

Men's coach Russ Yarworth lauded the addition of Cook, describing the rookie's long-time relationship with Hixon as a key cog in graduation replacements.

Citing the loss of a top 2007-2008 Atlantic 10 diver, Yarworth spoke confidently.

"[Cook] has been diving with [Hixon] since he was 11-12 years old, so there was obviously a good relationship there and she's one of the best coaches in the country," Yarworth said. "We felt very confident that he could continue his development as a diver by staying with her."

On the women's side, senior captain and reigning A-10 Diver of the Year Karen Upperco led the way for UMass, finishing second in both events. Upperco's scores of 223.95 in the one-meter and 256.80 three-meter, respectively, were not quite enough to oust BU Senior Tess Warrenfeltz (288.90 one-meter and the 314.40 three-meter).

Minutewomen coach Rob Newcomb stressed caution in over-judging the BU dual meet results.

"How we swim and what we do on Saturday is completely irrelevant to where we're going to be in February," Newcomb said. "I look at different things like races, how they're performing, and where we are [early in the season] as opposed to where we are [towards the end] the season."

Yarworth echoed his counterpart's words to the wise, emphasizing his team's intense September-November double sessions training program as a top priority.

"Obviously I want to win, but I'm not going to adjust the training pattern for a dual meet victory," Warworth said.

The reigning A-10 Champion Minutemen, who eventually won BU's invitational last year after losing the dual meet, placed in a variety of other events. With a time of 1:56.27, junior Mike Berthiaume won the 200 fly, while fellow junior and defending A-10 Freestyle powerhouse Juan Moliere swept the Terriers in both the 50 and 100 free.

For the Minutewomen, UMass 100 fly and 200 fly school record-holder Christa Narus led the way with individual victories in the 200 fly (2:06.22) and 200 free (1:54.81).

Newcomb's 400 relay team of Narus, Hoopa Walsh, Kayle Tegeler, and Katharine Chalakis placed first with a time of 3:39.63.

Newcomb hopes Narus can continue last season's end of the year success.

"She's had a great fall and has been swimming very, very well – not only in the fly, but in some other events too. She'll give us some versatility," Newcomb said.

UM fall to Richmond in rare McGuirk loss

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

On the day that the 1998 championship team was remembered, the 2008 Massachusetts football team may soon be forgotten as its playoff hopes took what could be a devastating hit.

The No. 10 Minutemen lost for the first time in 17 games at McGuirk Stadium Saturday, losing to No. 9 Richmond, 30-15, in front of a homecoming crowd of 15,953.

The Spiders dominated UMass with field position and in the ground game, as Richmond's average starting position was its own 48-yard line and running back Josh Vaughan rushed for a career-high 156 yards and two touchdowns in the wire-to-wire victory.

| UMass | 15 |

"Ultimately we just didn't get enough done," UMass coach Don Brown said after the game. "[It's] back to the drawing board. We just got to restart and respond with a great effort next week and start a new win streak at home."

The Minutemen (4-3, 2-2 Colonial Athletic Association) trailed 9-0 and 16-3 in the first half, but cut the lead to 16-12 midway through the third quarter. But a blocked punt by Richmond's Eric McBride gave the Spiders the ball at the UMass 13-yard line, which Vaughan ran in for a touchdown two plays later for an 11-point lead.

"Blocked punts kill you," Brown said. "We made a mistake in the protection and that really kills you. The worst momentum breaker in college football is a blocked punt."

The Minutemen hit another field goal to pull within eight, but Richmond (5-3, 3-2 CAA) stopped UMass from scoring again, adding a late touchdown for the game's final score.

Adding to UMass' problems was an injury to quarterback Liam Coen's left (non-throwing) elbow. He left the game late in the third quarter (replaced by Scott

Special teams' lapse costs Minutemen

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

There was nothing special about the Massachusetts football team's special teams this weekend.

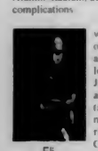
While the Minutemen's offense and defense did not play well in the team's 30-15 loss to No. 9 Richmond, a lot of it can be traced back to how special teams set up the other two facets of the game.

As for UMass' defense, they had their backs against the wall all game. On average, the Spiders offense started at their own 48-yard line and started five of their 12 drives in the Minutemen's territory.

By giving Richmond (5-3, 3-2 Colonial Athletic Association) the starting position it had, the defense's misfires were more costly. The Spiders were constantly just one play away from the red zone and were successful once they got there; Richmond was 5-of-6 in red zone opportunities.

Even when the defense came up with three-and-outs and stopped the Spiders offense, Richmond still pinned the Minutemen deep in their territory because of UMass' poor return game.

The punt coverage was one of the weakest aspects of Richmond's team, but the No. 10 Minutemen (4-3, 2-2 CAA) couldn't exploit it. Last week against No. 1 James Madison, it was Richmond's punt coverage that lost the game as Scotty McGee of JMU returned a punt 69 yards with one second remaining to win the game for the Dukes.



Coming into the game, the Spiders had the second-worst average net yards per punt in the CAA. But on Richmond's three punts on Saturday that were kicked to Sean Smalls, one

Rest in peace: UMass season declared dead

UMass Minutemen

AMHERST — The Massachusetts football team's season died Oct. 18, 2008 at 6:31 p.m., at McGuirk Alumni Stadium, due to a variety of complications.

Eli Rosenswaike

The Minutemen were virtually on life support after consecutive losses against James Madison and Texas Tech (and shaky and narrow victories over Holy Cross, Albany, Northeastern and Delaware), but Saturday's loss to Richmond was enough for me to pull the plug — unofficially, of course.

The autopsy and lab results were inconclusive, but the 2008 UMass football season ended prematurely due to a variety of reasons — included, but not limited to: Richmond running down their throats, red zone blues, special teams' follies, chronic slow starts, a non-existant pass rush, an underperforming defense, an affinity to commit penalties and a now relatively-meaningless win over a vastly overrated and struggling Delaware team.

Born Aug. 30, 2008 (the start of the football season) in Amherst, Mass., the Massachusetts football team had enormous expectations for this 2008 season. With a National Championship run in 2006 and a playoff appearance in 2007, coach Don Brown expected his Minutemen to live long. Led by senior Liam Coen, the best quarterback in school history, UMass had title hopes — which were backed up by a preseason ranking of No. 5 in both the Sports Network Poll and the Coaches' Poll.

There were few question marks with the Minutemen entering the season. With Coen returning, the only question mark offensively was the extremely young receiving corps — but Victor Cruz and Jeremy Horne have proved to be strengths, rather than weaknesses, ranking as two of the better wideouts in the conference. The kicker (Armando Cuko) and punter (Brett Arnold) were relative unknowns entering the season, but both have played well.

Ever since 2004 when Don Brown was hired, the Minutemen have had one of the best defenses in the entire Football Championship Subdivision. That's Brown's staple as a head coach. This year? Not

According to the coroner's report, the Massachusetts football team was pronounced "dead" at 6:31 p.m. on Saturday night, following the 30-15 loss to Richmond at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Coach Don Brown not happy.

They scored.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team broke its four-game scoreless streak Friday against St. Bonaventure in a 4-1 win — but Sunday's game was a different story; the Minutemen did not score in 110 minutes of soccer, in a double-overtime scoreless tie against Duquesne.

|---|---|
| UMass | 0 |
| Duquesne | 0 |
| UMass | 4 |
| SBU | 1 |

Statistically, Duquesne and UMass (3-6-3, 1-1-1 Atlantic 10) were equal in the match-up. The Minutemen took 18 shots to the Hawks' 16, they held the advantage on corner kicks, 7-6, and the Minutemen had 10 fouls to Duquesne's nine, but the Minutemen did have more shots on goal (nine) than the Hawks' (four).

"In our minds we thought we were the better team, but that doesn't mean anything unless you score a goal," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "[The Dukes] worked their tails off. They made it very difficult to play and they are a tough team to play on their field. So the stats were fairly close and the game was close."

Duquesne (5-5-4, 1-2-1 A-10) started the game controlling the ball and dominating play for the first 15 minutes, but as the half progressed UMass slowly started to take over the game. But neither team's dominance over the other resulted in goals.

"I give our guys a lot of credit. We were able to play well enough, certainly well enough to win, but unfortunately we didn't," Koch said. "We got four goals on Friday, we could have used one of them [on Sunday]. But that's just the way the game goes."

Duquesne put a lot of pres-

Klub Kellogg opens basketball season

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

After reaching the NIT Championship at Madison Square Garden last year, the Massachusetts men's basketball team knows what a packed arena can do for a team's success. Coming off of last year's NIT run, it was no surprise that the theme for the first Klub Kellogg was maintaining that fan support for the entire season.

Filling up the Mullins Center on this night, the Curry Hick Cage is such a high priority for UMass coach Derek Kellogg that he came out of the stands during player introductions. He then addressed the fans on how their support will turn the Minutemen into a national program.

Kellogg made a subtle reference to his previous job at Memphis when he said he wanted it to be a program talked about in the same breath as "you-know-who."

"[In order to become a national program], we need an unbelievable student presence at our games," Kellogg said. "We're going to be on television as much as anyone in the country. I let's make the Mullins Center the toughest place in the country to play."

The Minutemen will play at least three games on national television. Their games against Memphis on Nov. 17 and Kansas on Dec. 13 will be on ESPN while the Jan. 17 game against Temple will be on ESPN 2.

If UMass wins both its games Nov. 11 and Nov. 12 at the 2K Sports Classic, it will be on ESPN once again at Madison Square Garden against the winner of the Durham Regional.

ESPNU will also air the Minutemen against Xavier on Jan. 31. Kellogg believes having this national exposure is part of building a national program, which will increase support for the team.

Junior Ricky Harris believes that aside from winning games, much of the support will come from being friendly with the student body and becoming part of the community.

"I'm friends with all the students around campus. I try to introduce myself to everybody."

Panhandling limits protested

Residents, students and local panhandlers gathered on Thursday, speaking out against Ordinance 285-63, which, if passed, will place limitations on where and how a person can ask for money.

By William McGuinness
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The city of Northampton was dubbed the "Paradise of America" by Jenny Lind, the "Swedish Nightingale," but a group of protestors argued city officials are closing the gates to its least fortunate.

On Thursday, about 50 city residents, students and local panhandlers marched in an impromptu street performers' parade, protesting city lawmakers' attempts to limit begging within city limits.

They organized specifically against Ordinance 285-63, which includes mode and place limitations that do not outright ban the practice from the town. But the protestors' signs, chants and drum beats declared the ordinance's language is specific and restrictive enough to criminalize panhandling in much of the city.

The ordinance restricts panhandlers from asking for money within 15 feet of a bus stop, ATM, bank or public telephone. They cannot ask people who are waiting for something, and will not be allowed to ask for money while passively sitting or standing. Requesting money while sit-

The University of Massachusetts hosted its annual Fall Open House for all prospective students and their families on Saturday.

This year, however, the carefully planned Open House was unexpectedly interrupted with a power outage that affected most of the campus.

The outage lasted from around noon until 1:05 p.m. Many on-campus buildings lost power, including the Campus Center, the Student Union, and the west side where the Mullins Center is located, according to Patrick J. Callahan, a spokesperson for the University.

More than 4,500 students were expected to visit the campus from Massachusetts as well as from 16 other states. UMass Chancellor Robert C. Holub and the director of admissions, Kevin Kelly, kicked off the Open House with a welcome speech at the Mullins Center at 10 a.m., after which students were invited to participate in campus tours as well as presentations from 10 of the University's schools and colleges.

However, the School of Education and the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, who were holding presentations in the Campus Center and the Student Union Ballroom, were both affected by the power outage.

Many students, both current and prospective, and their families were directed to eat at the Franklin Dining Commons, which had power instead of at the Blue Wall or The Hatch.

Steve Fox, a professor in the UMass journalism department, was in the Blue Wall meeting with a perspective journalism student and her family when the power outage occurred. Other than joking that the outage was a result of the budget cuts being put into effect, Fox said that his conversation continued and that people didn't seem too shaken.

"It was just one of those things, people were happy and excited to be here and to be checking things out," Fox said. "It was such a nice day, but everyone — students, parents — kept wondering and milling about [after the outage]."

As for the cause of the outage, Callahan said he spoke to the UMass Physical Plant's director, who said it occurred because of a failure in the control system that brings the power onto campus. The reason behind this is not yet known and is still being looked into.

Local hospital to host screening clinic

By Rachel Dougherty
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Cooley Dickinson Hospital will host a free breast and cervical cancer screening clinic from 5-8:30 p.m. on Oct. 23, in honor of Breast Cancer Awareness month.

The clinic, sponsored by the hospital's Cancer Care Program, offers free physical breast exams and pap smears that will be performed by hospital practitioners and certified nurse practitioners and midwives. The hospital is encouraging uninsured or underinsured women to take advantage of the potentially life-saving screenings.

"Women should begin having breast exams done by a physician by age 20," said Dr. Mary Ellen Walsh, director of the Cancer Care Program. "Have a physician check it over and show them what to look for themselves."

In the case of cervical cancer, women should begin screening when one of two things happens.

"[They should start screening] when they turn 18 or when they become sexually active. Whichever comes first," said Walsh.

The clinic, which is funded entirely by Cooley Dickinson Hospital, offers access to the types of critical screening that women without insurance are sometimes denied. To some, a yearly mammogram costing between $175 and $300 may be easily covered by insurance, but to others, it becomes a choice between paying the bills or taking measures to prevent breast cancer.

This clinic is one of several ways that Cooley Dickinson tries to reach out to women who, for whatever reason, are not getting the screening they need.

"I don't want you to think that it's a choice between coming to the free clinic and paying $400 for a breast exam," Walsh said. "If someone is underinsured and but needs medical attention, of course there are other ways to get the screening they need."

Getting these physical exams or mammograms is crucial to improving cancer survival rates, doctors say. Breast cancer has the third highest incidence of any cancer, and is diagnosed in 182,460 women and 1,990 men every year.

Injured UMPD officer returns

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts police officer who was severely injured when he was allegedly kneed in the groin by a UMass ROTC cadet, returned to work Monday after two weeks of recovery.

During routine patrols before the Oct. 4 football game, four UMPD officers noticed a group of tailgaters disrobing and swimming in a portable pool in the back of a pickup truck in Lot 22 outside McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Officers said that most of the men obeyed when asked to stop, get out of the pool and put on their clothes.

However, officers said Marshal D.P. Keating, 21, of Edgewater, N.J., resisted.

"It continued to escalate and Keating refused to cooperate with officers," said UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald. "He continued to dive into the pool from the top of the truck. He was completely naked and began to flash everyone."

Once Keating emerged from the pool, police said he continued to provoke the gathering crowd and then advanced toward the officers.

"The four officers tried to arrest him, but he was wet and slippery and he then kneed an officer two times in the groin, requiring the officer to go to the hospital in an ambulance," Archbald said.

The injured officer was admitted at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, reportedly experiencing intense pain, nearly passing out, and was given morphine.

Officials declined to release the name of the injured officer, who was fully cleared by a physician before returning to his duties yesterday.

"He did his duty and wants to focus on being a police officer," said UMPD Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor. "I think he just wants to put all of this behind him."

Police arrested Keating at 3:15 p.m., about 15 minutes prior to the start of the football game between UMass and Delaware. Keating faces charges of resisting arrest and disorderly conduct on an outstanding warrant, as well as assault and battery on a police officer, which is a felony offense, Archbald said.

Tailgating prior to football games is allowed at the University, but officials said they took action in this instance because they worried that the conduct of people in the pool could cause problems.

"This is the sort of incident that gets quickly out of hand," said Archbald.

The attendance at the day's game was the largest crowd for a regular-season UMass game since 1974, with an estimate exceeding 16,000 fans.

In the same incident, Alexander S. Costas, 19, of Newburyport, Christopher R. Tufkin, 18, of Gloucester, and Andrea Spector, 19, of Peabody, were all arrested on charges of being minors in possession of alcohol, police said.

Clinic to aid breast cancer

Breast cancer also kills more women in the United States than any other kind of cancer except lung cancer, accounting for 40,480 female cancer deaths a year. The sooner the cancer is detected, the greater the chance of surviving it.

Women diagnosed with stage one breast cancer have a five-year-survival rate of 97 percent, meaning that 97 percent of women diagnosed while their cancer is still in stage one are alive five years after the initial diagnosis. The 10-year-survival rate for stage-one breast cancer is 95 percent.

By contrast, one in four women diagnosed with stage four breast cancer live five years past diagnosis, and 16 percent past 10 years. For cervical cancer, which can be caused by the sexually transmitted HPV virus and is expected to kill 3,870 women in 2008, the five-year-survival rate is 92 percent when detected in the earliest stages.

The clinic at Cooley Dickinson is an annual event that was initiated as a part of Breast Cancer Awareness Month, an annual campaign to reach out to breast cancer victims and promote cancer research.

Poverty 'not a crime'

ting on a public bench or while in a public park will also be prohibited.

The ordinance also drew attention from Western Massachusetts ACLU attorney William Newman, who criticized the language of the ordinance, and said much of the restrictions are already covered under other city laws and offered to intervene against it legally if it is required. He is currently working with city officials to eliminate wording that would limit free speech.

If passed, those who do not comply with the law can face a fine between $50 and $300.

David Beyer, who protested as a representative from the Freedom Center's "Poverty is Not a Crime" campaign, said the fines are too steep. Incarceration is the alternative to an individual's inability to pay, and he said imprisonment is a poor alternative to homelessness.

Northampton mayor Clare Higgins said to area media outlets that the intention of the ordinance is not to criminalize extreme poverty but instead to make panhandlers act more reasonable when on the streets interacting with other residents. She said outlawing panhandling outright is in violation of the First Amendment, which supports free speech and a citizen's right to ask others for money.

The ordinance was proposed in response to a number of complaints which claim the city's panhandlers were overly aggressive and, in some cases, verbally abusive when seeking donations.

The city has fielded these complaints for years and has encouraged residents and visitors to contribute to local shelters and organizations that work directly with them providing services and supplies.

But Caty Simon, also from the campaign, said this is the equivalent to asking people "not to feed the animals."

Simon said the decision will be made by the Northampton City Council and not the public, so she said her group's goal is to spark a public outcry. The group will use a mix of petitions, phone banks and presentations at city council meetings to get out its message.

She said the group hopes to involve a large number of those interested because "those people who have a vested interest in this are not just the Main Street businesses … but also the street people and the activists."

EMILY GRUNDY/COLLEGIAN STAFF

Protestors parade through downtown Northampton, holding signs and speaking out against the passing of the ordinance.

But Judith Fine, owner of Gazebo at 14 Center St., said aggressive panhandling is an issue that affects other panhandlers, business owners and patrons of the downtown area alike.

She told Northampton's Daily Hampshire Gazette that customers complain of harassment and communicate how uncomfortable they feel when entering and exiting downtown establishments.

Contrarily, Northampton business owner Rachel Hannah said customers' discomfort should not trump panhandlers' First Amendment rights.

"We can't base ordinances on class, and that's what this is," she said.

Hannah said she often refuses to give panhandlers money because it is her right to say so just as much as it is the right of the panhandler to ask.

"It's not a requirement," she said.

She admitted that few people would tell her that they like to be asked for money – that it is awkward.

"But that's why it is important for us not to pass this," she said. "You can't pass laws based on people being uncomfortable."

A man simply known as "Boxcar" said that like anything there are two sides of the coin.

He has traveled as a panhandler throughout the country and cited that the city of Northampton is among the friendliest and most receptive of panhandlers in the country.

"I've seen people looking for quarters and chasing down people around here to get it," he said while sitting on a stoop, looking for donations. He would be violating the ordinance should it pass. "But you've got to be respectful. If people want to give you a dollar or something, they'll find a way to do it."

Arctic heating up

By Robert S. Boyd
(MCT)

WASHINGTON— Temperatures in the Arctic last fall hit an all-time high – more than 9 degrees Fahrenheit (5 degrees Centigrade) above normal – and remain almost as high this year, an international team of scientists reported Thursday.

"The year 2007 was the warmest year on record in the Arctic," said Jackie Richter-Menge, a climate expert at the Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory in Hanover, N.H, and editor of the latest annual Arctic Report Card.

"These are dynamic and dramatic times in the Arctic," she said. "The outlook isn't good."

Arctic temperatures naturally peak in October and November, after sea ice shrinks during the summer. The shrinkage lets more of the sun's rays heat the ocean rather than be reflected back into space.

As a result, the ocean is warming and causing global sea levels to rise even faster than predicted, according to the Arctic Report Card, the product of 46 scientists from 10 countries.

Summer 2007 set a record low for sea ice in the Arctic, threatening reindeer, walruses and polar bears and opening shipping lanes above the Arctic Circle, the report said. This summer's ice melt was only slightly smaller.

"There has been a massive loss of sea ice starting in the 1990s," said one of the authors, James Overland, an Arctic expert at the Pacific Marine Environmental Laboratory in Seattle. "In 2008, we've lost so much multi-year old ice, it's very difficult for the ice cover to go back to where it was 20 years ago."

The Arctic Report Card's authors attributed the temperature spike to a combination of long-term global warming and short-term, natural variations in ocean currents and winds above the Arctic Circle.

"Global warming by itself wouldn't cause this much sea ice loss," Overland said. Nor would changes in wind and ocean currents alone.

"Changes in the Arctic show a domino effect of both natural variation and the emerging global warming signal," he said. "Both are necessary to put us in this strange new world. Once we're in this place, it's very hard to go back."

Although the Arctic is warming overall, its effects vary from place to place. The Bering Sea, for example, is in a cooling spell, and an unusually severe winter has bulked up Alaska's glaciers.

At the same time, the huge Greenland ice cap shrank by 88 square miles (220 square kilometers) as a result of an unusually warm spring and summer, according to Jaxon Box of the Byrd Polar Research Center in Columbus, Ohio.

Greenland dumped at least 24 cubic miles (100 cubic kilometers) of melted ice into the ocean. The report said the result was an "unprecedented" rise of nearly 0.1 inch per year.

The Arctic warming trend began in the 1960s and has been accelerating in the past decade.

Scientists say these changes in the Arctic are early warning signs of what may be coming for the rest of the world's climate.

Record temperatures in the Arctic threaten its wildlife, such as reindeer, walruses and polar bears, as well as causing the polar ice caps to melt at an alarming rate.

College hopefuls take to sabotaging others

By Josh S. Cohen

CHICAGO — In the competition to get into the most selective colleges, some students and their parents are resorting to a tasteless tactic: bashing other applicants.

The letters, mailed to college admissions offices, typically arrive without a signature. They say that rival applicants cheated on exams or got suspended for underage drinking. Sometimes, they include an unflattering newspaper clipping or a sly suggestion to check out pictures on a student's Facebook page.

At Northwestern University, one letter was written in crayon.

"I guess they thought we couldn't trace it if it were in crayon," said Christopher Watson, Northwestern's dean of undergraduate admission. "The grammar was too good to be a little kid. . . . We see everything. Nothing shocks us anymore."

This year's high school seniors should plan for another year of fierce competition to get into the most elite colleges and universities. The number of high school graduates is expected to peak at about 3.3 million this year, with more of them choosing to attend college.

And if a recent discussion on a listserv for college admissions professionals and high school counselors is any indication, the competition could lead to some shocking behavior.

The e-mail exchange began with a simple query.

"I just heard a horrific story from one of my students, and I wanted to see if there is any validity in it," Sue Moller, a high school guidance counselor on Long Island, New York, posted on a message board for the National Association for College Admission Counseling. She wrote that a student told her that parents were writing letters about the "bad" conduct of other students "to help the chances of their student gaining admission."

She asked whether any of the college officials had received such letters. She wasn't expecting much of a response, but got more than a dozen replies.

"This is a lot deeper than I thought it was when I posted this silly question. You should have seen me running around the office saying, 'You won't believe this one,'" Moller said. "I can't believe how widespread it is."

College admissions officials said they do not track how many of these letters, calls or e-mails they receive, and said they are unsure whether they're getting more of them. But with competition fiercer than ever, and technology making it easier to communicate, several experts said they wouldn't be surprised to see more of this behavior.

"If it is more competitive than before, then perhaps more of it is going on," said Bill Fitzsimmons, Harvard's admissions dean. "People are willing to lie in order to do better in what they consider to be a difficult competition."

Fueling the behavior, in part, may be the perception that the competition is toughest among applicants from the same high school, perhaps leading some families to target classmates.

"People think if they disadvantage one student, it may advantage theirs," said Stacey Kostell, director of undergraduate admissions at the University of Illinois. She said the university has received anonymously sent newspaper articles about applicants' criminal activities.

Fitzsimmons and several other officials said anonymous allegations typically get thrown in the trash. If the letters include specific allegations or a newspaper article detailing criminal activity, officials might follow-up with a call to the applicants or their high schools.

Ted O'Neill, University of Chicago's dean of admissions, said the university only occasionally receives a letter intended to sandbag another applicant. One letter pointed out that a student had lied about being president of the senior class.

O'Neill said he has followed up on signed letters, but disregards the anonymous ones.

But Dan Saracino, University of Notre Dame's director of admissions, said he'll investigate allegations even if they're provided anonymously.

"If the person is saying something that might have some credence, you don't want to dismiss it," he said. "We will contact the student who is being maligned and ask them if they care to respond."

Gloria Mueller, the college counseling coordinator at Glenbrook South High School, said it's the school's policy to verify only students' academic records, not disciplinary information. She described anonymous letter-writing campaigns as "absolutely, totally sleazy."

Mabel Freeman said Ohio State University has received letters from disgruntled families after their children were denied admission but other students from their high school were admitted.

Freeman, the assistant vice president of undergraduate admissions, said it's unfortunate that the efforts are primarily orchestrated by adults.

"It is one more indication of the high anxiety that seems to be out there, the inability of some families to deal with a rejection," Freeman said.

UM student selected to be diversity leader

By Alyssa Creamer

After reviewing résumés and interviews from undergraduate applicants scattered across the country, KPMG LLP, an international accounting firm specializing in audit, tax, and advisory services, selected University of Massachusetts student Temari Pimentel to intern for a school year at the KPMG Boston firm.

Pimentel, an accounting major, was selected among 50 other U.S. students to attend KPMG's Future Diversity Leaders four-day conference in Hollywood, Calif., last August. Students selected were the top applicants, who demonstrated great strength in academics, community service, and campus involvement. KPMG preferred applicants who had devoted time and effort into extracurricular activities promoting diversity.

At the conference, not only was Pimentel awarded her internship – which KPMG encouraged her to take – but she also received the firm's leadership scholarship.

"The conference was absolutely amazing," Pimentel said. "I got to meet so many people; a lot of whom I still keep in touch with. I was really lucky. A couple people got scholarships, but not everyone got the internship. The KPMG [conference instructors] taught everyone about all the ethics, principles, and different leadership roles of the firm. They prepare you to be a leader whether you end up working with them or not."

About 75 to 80 percent of KPMG's full-time employees started out as interns for the company.

KPMG's National Managing Partner and University Relations and Recruiting employee, Manny Fernandes said the campus recruiting process is "an early identification of the top talent that is out there at the universities."

Upon completion of her sophomore year internship, Pimentel will compete for additional scholarships and another internship opportunity.

"[KPMG] gave me a really broad explanation of what I'd be doing," Pimentel said. "I'll definitely be working with a team doing small projects within larger projects for the firm."

Temari Pimentel was chosen from students across the country as a recipient of both a scholarship and internship for KPMG.

The team will consist of KPMG employees and possibly other interns. Pimentel expects to learn a lot from KPMG's leadership programs throughout her internship.

"This opportunity is similar to any experience involving a first time exposure to something," Pimentel said. "I'm nervous, but I want to be professional. It's an opportunity for future full-time employment, so I want to give it my all."

Pimentel's internship is within the audit specialization.

"Basically, the program is designed to give me an introduction to the KPMG Boston company," said Pimentel, who grew up in the Boston area.

A member of Commonwealth College, Pimentel attributes learning a large part of her leadership skills to her freshman year living in a ComCol Talent Advancement Program called the "Emergence Scholars Program."

Pimentel said she wants to bring her "motivation and cultural experiences" to her new internship. She looks forward to eventually meeting with clients.

"I want to show [KPMG] my determination and my focus," Pimentel said. "Every project I do, I always try to give it more than my all. So it would mean a lot for me to show them what I have to offer. I've always worked hard to make sure that I keep all my doors open, and for something like this to come through one of my doors, it's like all my hard work isn't going down the drain."

"I hope that I can create opportunities for other students to follow in my footsteps," she said. "I know there are students who work just as hard if not harder than I do and I would love to see have the same opportunities as me or even more."

Our flag is three colors

Jeromie Whalen

Last Thursday, comedian Richard Lewis appeared on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show with John Stewart" and – though in the midst of a tiresome rant – commented on the state of the current presidential campaign. "This is a nightmare," Lewis said in regards to Barack Obama's middle name being Hussein. "What if McCain's middle name was Hitler or Mussolini?"

"The Democrats are too nice," he continued. "They would say, 'Well, in Romania Hitler means soufflé.'"

While rather coarsely put, the Democratic Party's "weakness" is not truly weakness at all. Rather, what Richard has unwittingly discovered is a shift in the aggressions of their political rivals.

Growing desperation and anxiety felt by the Republican Party has led to various frustrated groups to trade in usual political pandering for something much more devious. While healthy debate and respectful disagreement is a must for both sides in the presidential race, the rhetoric as of late has taken a dangerous turn.

Earlier last week, for instance, the Sacramento GOP came under fire for posting several controversial ads on the group's Web site, which included such phrases as "Waterboard Barack Obama" and "the only difference between oBama and oSama is BS."

When a woman watching the vice presidential debates at a Republican convention center laughs at Sen. Joe Biden as he tearfully mentions the death of his wife and daughter, we as a nation must pause and reflect on the path that is being taken in this presidential race.

In another attack, the Chaffey Community Republican Women of California circulated a newsletter containing a cartoon image of the senator on a food stamp surrounded by African-American stereotypical images such as watermelon, ribs, Kool-Aid and fried chicken.

While both groups later apologized for the offensive material displayed, the notion that this type of sentiment, while explicitly renounced, is being felt internally by some GOP members threatens the core of our American values. When Gov. Sarah Palin allows hateful language such as "terrorist" and "kill him" to go unaddressed during a rally, a standard is set in which a lack of immediate response is as detrimental as condoning such actions.

When the Republican campaign, trailing in the polls, resorts to purposely misinforming the American public by suggesting that Barack Obama "pals around with terrorists," issues of crucial importance drift to the back while precious debate time is wasted on debunking erroneous allegations.

When a woman watching the vice presidential debates at a Republican convention center laughs at Sen. Joe Biden as he tearfully mentions the death of his wife and daughter, we as a nation must pause and reflect on the path that is being taken in this presidential race.

Our flag is three colors. It is not entirely red, nor is it entirely blue, but a mixture of both with space in between for respect and compromise. When these values are vacant, our flag – our nation – does not symbolize the true spirit of democracy that resides within our values as Americans. We are in danger of ripping the moral fabric of our nation, and unless our leaders and people as a whole can hold these core principles above our political dissonance, a tear will be made much larger than any threads can mend.

Opposing Obama

Greg Collins

Let's look past change, hope, ACORN, William Ayers, terrorist accusations, Muslim whispers and rhetorical eloquence.

Instead, let's examine Sen. Barack Obama's experience as a state and federal legislator. Because if there is one factor that may reveal a glimpse into his underlying, political philosophy and how he will use this thinking to influence public policy as president, it is his record as a lawmaker. From this record, we can determine some conclusions about what Obama truly believes in, absent from any sweeping rhetoric.

One: Barack Obama has a history of refusing to protect the life of a child even if the child survived an abortion. As an Illinois state senator, he led opposition to a bill which guaranteed the safety and security of a baby outside the womb who survived an attempt by medical practitioners to end the baby's life inside the mother's body. Not one Democrat in our federal legislature voted against the same bill, called the Born-Alive Infants' Protection Act in Congress in 2002.

Obama has justified his opposition to the Illinois bill, saying it did not include an amendment that was provided in the federal bill, which would have ensured that the legal status of unborn children would not change. But as Amherst College professor Hadley Arkes has pointed out, this amendment was, in 2003, proposed to the same bill in a committee chaired by Obama, who voted in the committee to kill the bill.

The plain fact remains that Obama backed a measure that guaranteed the right of a mother for either an "effective abortion" – that is, an abortion inside the womb – or for a child to be killed outside the womb who, for some medical complication or another, was not aborted inside the mother.

Two: Barack Obama has a history of supporting race-based and sex-based public policies. He led efforts in 2004 to flout a U.S. District Court decision that rejected a Chicago ordinance to set aside at least 5 percent female business ventures and 25 percent non-white business ventures on municipal projects. In 1999 he demanded that the Illinois governor appoint a minority to the Illinois Commerce Commission. That same year he urged black senators in the Illinois state legislature to unite behind a plan to establish a casino in a minority community.

Look past Obama's contemporary rhetoric and concentrate on his record.

Obama, as revealed in The Chicago Defender, also supported electing politicians based on the color of their skin.

"An incumbent African-American legislator with a 90 percent district may feel good about his re-election chances, but we as a community would probably be better off if we had two African-American legislators with 60 percent each," the Defender reported.

The same newspaper also highlighted that Obama opposed Hispanic politicians taking seats from black politicians in the Illinois General Assembly. Even though Obama's contemporary rhetoric creates the impression that he is a post-racial thinker, his past patterns supporting race-conscious public policy suggest that he perceives skin color as an important shaper of a government's identity.

Three: Barack Obama has a history of supporting irresponsible and inefficient government programs. Obama co-authored a bill in the Illinois State Legislature which provided tax credits for developers to build housing complexes in Chicago. He also pushed for federal subsidies as a U.S. senator. In addition, one of his campaign proposals is to give developers $500 million a year for additional public housing developments.

Yet, according to the Boston Globe, many of these Chicago housing programs – backed ardently by Obama – became unsafe and uninhabitable because of various problems including collapsed roofs and rodent infestation, reflecting government neglect and incompetence.

The Grove Par neighborhood in Chicago, represented by Obama as state senator, was the most notorious example of this failure of government-subsidized housing.

"[Obama's political supporters] profited from the subsidies even as many of Obama's constituents suffered," the Gobe reported. "Tenants lost their homes; surrounding neighborhoods were blighted."

Many consider that Obama has a better grasp on the economy than Sen. John McCain. Yet this assumption begs the question of why Obama supported a policy directly preventing low-income urban residents from having the potential opportunity to buy accessible, privately-financed housing because of government intrusion on what otherwise would have been private property.

Furthermore, Obama, as a state senator, called for millions of dollars to fund youth, crime-prevention packages, investment in new technologies, regulations of electric utilities and anger management classes for 5- to 13-year-olds. He advocated for such initiatives knowing full well that the Illinois state budget was facing severe budget restraints in the early 2000s, which later ended up resulting in a state deficit of $5 billion more than expected.

Look past Obama's contemporary rhetoric and concentrate on his record. You will find that he has supported measures to end the life of a child who has survived an abortion, created public policies based on skin color and to establish housing programs restricted low-income individuals from living in areas that were being occupied by unsafe and deteriorating government-funded apartments.

If the best indicator of future performance is past performance, there is little reason to feel that an Obama presidency would lead to hope – or change.

The sad truth

Tina Ortiz

It's early morning. Daytime television commercials murmur underneath the sounds of my daily wake-up routine. A pink-bikinied woman shares with me her "not typical results" of diet pill X.

She assures me that she is 59, but you wouldn't know it – and a grandmother, too. On a normal day, her smile doesn't bother me. But two car and three Axe commercials later, her plastic grin eventually makes itself irrepressible somewhere in my subconscious, only to appear unexpectedly at times when I find myself most vulnerable.

It is a sad truth that today, as a woman, so much of how society defines you is determined by the image in the mirror. This ugly reality can spark feelings of inadequacy in even the most confident person.

Although common in many college-aged women, these are dangerous thoughts that have plagued the female psyche for far too long. Why are women so inclined to a heightened awareness of body image? Why are men traditionally free from those habits?

The American young woman is being conditioned on a mass scale by the advertising market. Marketing companies force-feed the American public sexual stereotypes with underhanded tactics, and in record numbers.

When will the manipulative lens of the media no longer distort the American female? We are not garnishes for expensive cars, but human beings with an immeasurable value not determined by our physical traits.

I wonder why images of sex-crazed females attacking a man just because he sprayed TAG on himself are allowed to air and not seen as offensive. And let's be honest, TAG smells like crap.

The subconscious of the average person is assaulted with an obscene amount of advertisements on a daily basis whether they are aware of it or not. People are buying and selling ad space in some of the most creative places I've ever seen.

There are fashion designers offering young people the option to tattoo their bodies with their logos in exchange for money. It won't be long until every blank space around you will be painted like a NASCAR jacket.

It is a sad truth that today, as a woman, so much of how society defines you is determined by the image in the mirror.

The media serves a far greater purpose for the public than merely selling products. It sells to Americans an iconic standard for normalcy. According to a study performed by the Higher Educational Research Counsel in 1990, on average, more college-aged men consider themselves to be above average in competitiveness, mathematical, and scholastic ability than college-aged women. A fact, I think, heavily influenced by the media.

A negative self-image can cause depression, an epidemic that has become more deadly among teens. Research shows that teen suicide has dramatically increased over the past decades, with females attempting suicide more often than men in record numbers.

Advertisements are unavoidable for the modern, young woman who finds herself in front of the computer or TV screen more often than previous generations.

Women who strive to be successful in the business world have few role models in the media. It seems like men don't want us in the business world and neither do the media. A woman seeking a career must take into account the fact that being of the "child-bearing age" will work against her candidacy for any job.

It's distressing that the only way females will achieve respect in the marketing world is if there are actually women in positions of power to get the job done. And in light of all the obstacles the media presents, this is no easy task.

In fact, the times women appear without men in advertisements, they are frequently used only as decorative eye candy. Advertisements are often digitally altered to enhance certain features, meaning that the women who see these ads are comparing themselves to surreal images that are more cartoon than human.

Eating disorders are becoming so common that the issue has evolved into a popular RA bulletin board topic. It's clear that the topic of female identity and body image is a matter worthy of attention. Of all the people afflicted, 10 percent die.

Oftentimes people argue that it is the aim of marketing companies to spark some feelings of dissatisfaction in its targeted audience. The pivotal purpose of an advertisement is to make it seem as if life isn't as good as it could be without the product being marketed.

Just buy the diet pill, the facial cream or the sexy lingerie and those feelings of dissatisfaction will bloom into fulfillment. But at what point is the line drawn between marketing strategy and gender degradation?

Sorry Mr. Jefferson, America is changing

Eli Gottlieb

Let me get the easy part of this column over and done forthwith.

In my official capacity as a Collegian columnist, I endorse Sen. Barack Obama for president of the United States and Sen. Joseph Biden for vice president of the same United States. However, I predict that John McCain and Sarah Palin will actually win the election. In the majority of this column I will explain my prediction.

The simple reason McCain will win is, of course, sheer theft. But that tells us nothing useful except not to trust digital ballots. In my life, I prefer to learn something from every failure I find in myself and in others. According to this philosophy, the people of the United States need to understand the reason – the cause – that they will wind up with yet another insane fascist of a president.

I, personally, believe that the key to this cause lies in the differences between the base of the Republican and Democratic political parties. The Republican Party has a base of mostly rural, poor or quite wealthy, less educated, more evangelical Christian, male voters.

The Democratic Party has a base of women, the educated, the non-white, the middle class, the urban, and the non-Christian. One would think the Democratic Party could easily take the majority of the country's votes with a coalition that large, while the Republicans would have only a small minority. However, the opposite continues to happen year after year. Why?

Firstly, because the Republican Party's base is mostly uniform, it allows a single set of policies to appeal to the entire base. The various interests that power the Democrats have minor disagreements with one another, but their differences seem to make the party fracture and fight itself. The result is an aphorism created for Palestinians that has become applicable to Democrats – they never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

In my opinion, the best way to heal the rift between the "two Americas" without moving further into fascism or requiring a forcible leftist takeover is simply to abolish the Senate and abolish the Electoral College.

However, in my humble opinion, the Republican Party continually wins because it has figured out how to make the most overrepresented constituency in America its base.

Somehow even Sarah "breast, butt and Jesus" Palin has inadvertently spotted the fundamental fact that divides America into two nations – of whom the Republican Party represents one. She also remarked upon it when she declared herself happy to visit "pro-America" sections of America and that this is "a nation of Wasilla's." These sections are not red America and blue America, coastal and central, or rich and poor. Fundamentally, they are urban and rural America.

In urban America, rich and poor alike live in close quarters and depend on one another for infrastructure, social services and even daily meals. Cultures and ethnicities are diverse in urban America, as are industries. Due to all this diversity, people accept more variance in beliefs or appearances.

Liberal policies make sense in cities and urban areas, because if you don't keep people on their feet in a city they'll end up panhandling on the street. If you don't make allowances for deviant social behavior in a city, someone will surely find you as deviant as you find them.

In a rural place, on the other hand, like Wasilla, Alaska, or Bethlehem, N.Y., where I lived most recently before coming to UMass, more conservative policies actually make sense. You just don't have enough people in such an environment to make a welfare state work without utterly crippling tax rates.

Since the population is relatively uniform in terms of background and religion, certain social regulations sound a bit less oppressive and more like mere codifications of what everyone already does or refrains from doing. These areas also have less of an economy, resulting in their constant desire for pork-barrel projects that essentially redistribute wealth from the rich and urban to the poor and rural. Funny thing, that.

This division results in the politics we see because our Constitution blatantly and purposely over-represents rural voters. Every state receives two senators, regardless of its population, and also contributes two electors to the Electoral College regardless of population. This means that a voter in West Virginia has more of a voice in the running of this nation than I do, a voter in rural-suburban upstate New York.

Now, I understand that the so-called Founding Fathers had to make compromises in order to strengthen their fledgling nation of white, Anglo-Saxon landowning males on a continent filled with Frenchmen, Spaniards and, worst of all, the natives who actually own the place. However, we in the modern day can't allow compromises made hundreds of years ago to cripple us today.

In my opinion, the best way to heal the rift between the "two Americas" without moving further into fascism or requiring a forcible leftist takeover is simply to abolish the Senate and abolish the Electoral College. Elect the president by direct popular vote, and replace the Senate with a proportional representation parliamentary body like sensible democracies have.

You could even still call it a Senate out of tradition, but the nation needs a legislative body that will actually represent the will of the people as a whole instead of privileging the one part over the other.

NoHo pizzeria pleases

By Morgan Meagher
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON – Pizza is considered a staple in many college students' diets. It's often the last refuge at 4 a.m. on a Saturday night, leftovers can make a passable breakfast the next morning, and it can be catered to any taste.

It may be a straightforward dish, but even with so many pizzerias in the area, it can be hard to find a truly great pizza.

However, Sam's Pizzeria and Café, located at 235 Main St. in downtown Northampton, offers just that.

Sam's pizza selection runs the gamut from the traditional cheese and pepperoni, to the more unusual, such as Pasta Pizza topped with penne, chicken, and broccoli, and a pizza with Mexican rice, black beans and sour cream.

With 20 to 30 of the over 100 varieties in Sam's repertoire available at any given time, there's always something new and delicious to try. Additionally, the menu always offers a few vegetarian options and at least one vegan pizza daily.

The barbecue chicken white pizza has big chunks of tender meat along with bite-sized pieces of fresh broccoli and a drizzle of tangy barbecue sauce. The potato-bacon-cheddar pizza was smothered with slices of red potato and flavorful cheddar cheese, and the bacon was just crisp enough. One customer described the steak and cheese pizza as "so filling" and tasting "just like a Philly cheesesteak."

Best of all, none of the pizzas were greasy and they all looked and tasted fresh.

The massive slices cost $3 for cheese or pepperoni, and $3.50 for any of the gourmet options, and two slices is more than enough to satisfy even the biggest craving. Whole pizzas can also be purchased, ranging in price from $15 to $20, depending on the toppings.

The crust on Sam's pizza is fairly thin and light, striking the perfect balance between crispy and chewy and providing the perfect palate for the rest of the ingredients.

In addition to the cornucopia of pies, Sam's also offers a rotating menu of freshly made soups and three different salads, including a "Modified Caesar" with tomato, a spinach salad, and a modified Greek salad. The restaurant also features homemade desserts such as cheesecake brownies and chocolate truffles, and a full espresso bar.

In addition to coffee and espresso, Sam's beverage menu includes the usual soda fountain – stocked with Coke products – as well as fantastic craft sodas made with maple syrup, craft iced teas, and an array of bottled beer and wine.

Owner Sam Harbey makes sure that all the food made at his namesake is fresh, delicious, and nourishing, and it's easy to taste the care and attention that goes into the food. The produce comes mainly from local farms; many of the herbs are grown in the restaurant's window boxes. The soups, salad dressings and desserts are all homemade.

Despite the low prices, Sam's food tastes expensive and the quality of the ingredients stands out.

The restaurant's ambience is laid-back, friendly and intimate, a good place to bring a date or the whole family.

The interior is fairly small, but the capacity is expanded by patio seating on the Main Street sidewalk, which is open as long as the weather is agreeable. Even when the weather turns poor, the plate-glass window which forms the front wall of the restaurant provides the perfect opportunity for people-watching.

Sam's also offers free Wi-Fi, so the Internet-dependent can bring laptops and iPhones along. Warm lighting complements the sunset colors, wood benches and tables.

Sam's Pizza and Cafe, located on 235 Main Street in Northampton, received rave reviews from many locals. Sam's sells pizza slices and pies, as well as soups, salads and desserts.

Large black-and-white portraits by local artists like Greg Stone adorn the walls, depicting historical figures and artists like Chief Sitting Bull and Frieda Kahlo.

On Thursdays and Fridays, Sam's features live open-mic live music. Local bands, as well as customers, can perform, anyone is welcome to play a few songs. When there is no live music to be had, classic rock, R&B, and jazz play on the sound system.

Ben is back in 'Way to Normal'

By Ilana Ransom Toeplitz
Collegian Correspondent

As of Sept. 13, the indie, piano-rocker Ben Folds is back with his latest album.

The eagerly-anticipated "Way to Normal" is his latest studio album since 2005's successful "Songs For Silverman." However, he also produced "Supersunnyspeedgraphic," a compilation of five individually released E.P.s, which hardcore "Folds Fans" will say was musically disappointing and simple, and that Ben's glory days were when he was the leading member of the 90s indie-rock trio "Ben Folds Five."

Ben brings familiar sounds with "Way to Normal," reverting back to his tight, backup harmonies and piano-thumping songs, as well as the trusty improvisational jams where Folds abuses the piano like it offended his mother.

Folds' fans have missed the witty lyrics and rocking melodies that brought Ben his loyal following. While "Way to Normal" is no panacea for Folds' sometimes inconsistent solo career, it is definitely a rocking step in the right direction.

It's obvious Folds grew insecure about his work after 2005's "Songs for Silverman," which was a hard act to follow in itself.

However, Folds brings back his standard self-deprecating sense of humor in a good way on "Way to Normal."

This is best exemplified in the laughably tragic "Hiroshima (B-B-B-Benny Hit His Head)," which narrates the true story of how Folds slipped onstage at the opening of a concert in Hiroshima in front of the entire stadium, began bleeding onto the piano, and had to be checked for a concussion.

Ben Folds has recently released his latest solo effort, titled "Way to Normal," which is reminiscent of his more classic tunes.

Folds, who has been known to keep a miniature continuous storyline flowing under his albums, follows this track with "Dr. Yang," which describes the doctor's appointment which was the result of Folds' gory fall.

Most attention on the album has been weighted to the single "You Don't Know Me," which features the backup vocals of rising indie pop singer Regina Spektor (best known for her bittersweet, catchy tune "Fidelity").

Folds orchestrated this song on the album, as well as a few choice others, which adds intensity and passion to the musically melancholy songs.

Folds also puts together a complete piano orchestra consisting of 10 backup pianos. This is not his first time with a single-instrument orchestra – in his MySpace Sessions DVD he has a "Guitorchestra" backing him up, a 40-something piece acoustic guitar ensemble.

Known for pulling wacky, musical stunts, "Free Coffee" is played with metal Altoid containers strewn across the inner piano strings to give the accompaniment a scratchy, ping-like quality.

Folds has also sprinkled "Way to Normal" with familiar tongue-in-cheek social commentary.

"The Frown Song," "Effington," and "Errant Dog" paint 21st century caricatures with lyrics. "The Frown Song" delves on how trendy it is to showcase one's depression nowadays, while "Effington" is a laughable straight-forward observation of your atypical, middle-class, working town in Anywhere, USA.

Written from the perspective of another, "Errant Dog" pokes lighthearted fun at poodle-hugging, guru-worshipping, yoga mat-toting yuppies. Although writing from another person's perspective is a trademark of Folds', perhaps it's time to teach an errant dog some new tricks.

The best song on the album is without a doubt "Kyle from Connecticut," which observes a woman re-contemplating her deceased secret affair after 30 years of marriage. Folds hits this song right on the head with its rolling, melancholy melody.

Overall, "Way to Normal" is faithful to Folds' style, but this acts as a double-edged sword: some songs are stanch, and some are stale.

For the hardcore fans, the deluxe version of the album comes with five bonus music videos and some extra excerpts.

On the whole, don't trip on your way to buy the album, however, it is definitely a step up for Folds from his last release and a reliable listen for dedicated fans.

Mass. 4-H clubs members host yearly winter food drive

By Elyssa Horowitz
Collegian Correspondent

The second annual "4-H Cares About Community" food drive began Sunday, Oct. 5, in coordination with the start of National 4-H Week.

From now until Nov. 15, 4-H members statewide will be collecting and donating non-perishable food items to those in need this winter.

Last year, Massachusetts 4-H club members and volunteers collected more than six tons of food for area shelters and pantries. This year, Cumberland Farms' 196 Massachusetts stores will have collection boxes available to accept donations from the public in an additional food drive.

"With a difficult winter approaching, thousands of people need assistance," 4-H Extension Educator Gretchen May said in a statement.

The 4-H club of Massachusetts includes more than 13,000 members and offers a variety of youth programming and adult volunteering.

As the weather turns colder and the economy shows little chance for improvement, more households are faced with the choice between heat and food for their families this winter. Statewide 4-H members reported that food banks and shelters have depleting supplies, and that the need for support this year has grown significantly.

"People's budgets are snapped," said 4-H Extension Educator of 26 years Tom Waskiewicz. "With the oil prices to keep the heat, families are looking for any assistance to lighten the load."

Waskiewicz, who coordinates programs and clubs in schools and camps throughout the western counties, said the 4-H food drive in Massachusetts is purposely planned in the fall in order to call attention to the annual need for people to fill their cupboards as the holiday boxed goods become the primary season begins.

According to the United States Department of Agriculture and United States Census Bureau, one in every seven Massachusetts residents faced food insecurity last year, which amounts to nearly 450,000 people. Additionally, the prevalence of food shortages in low-income communities has risen to an all-time high this season, according to the Project Bread Status Report on Hunger in Massachusetts.

In response to the need 4-H members, friends and family are volunteering their time and working with the local Cumberland Farms managers to bring this year's food drive a step beyond that of previous years. The 4-H club is also looking for assistants to transport food to local pantries, shelters and soup kitchens.

"There are so many who are just over the line of state or federal assistance, but food and fuel prices are taking a whack out of their income and they'll really be struggling. Hopefully we'll catch them before that and help them through," Waskiewicz said.

According to Waskiewicz of the Amherst Survival Center on North Pleasant Street, which provides services to residents in need in more than 10 area counties, is one of the many beneficiaries of the 4-H members' work.

"There are many agencies that rely on that support," Waskiewicz said. "No one should feel embarrassed to ask, work as hard and come forward for help."

'Hard-working' band delivers second album to 'loyal' fans

COURTESY DOWNTOWN RECORDS

The Cold War Kids' latest album, "Loyalty to Loyalty," reflects their thoughts on today's world.

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

"Loyalty to Loyalty," which is the second, full-length album from the "Cold War Kids," is a representation of what kind of band they strive to be.

The most appropriate adjective to describe the "Cold War Kids" would be "hard-working."

Though "Loyalty to Loyalty" is only their second LP, it comes after five EPs, three of which were recorded in 2006.

What sets "Cold War Kids" apart from other bands is the elements in their music, which are not necessarily new, but provide the group with their own flavor.

In the case of their newest release, the group's most redeeming quality is the way the lead vocalist chooses to sing. Although he doesn't have a particularly melodic voice, it is one that makes listeners yearn for more, as well as offsetting the music nicely.

The album, which is recorded to sound like a live performance, is made up of 13 different songs which cohesively allow the listener to relax while enjoying the music.

Although the album contains no up-beat dance pieces, it would be perfect to listen to on a bus ride, a long trip or while walking to class.

The first track, titled "Against Privacy," is not the best opener for the group to use to introduce new audiences to their music.

However, "Mexican Dogs," which is the second track, should have been the opening one, as it is the most upbeat and fun song on the album.

"Welcome to the Occupation" has somewhat of a Latin vibe to it, with the musicians use bongos as well as their regular drums for the beat and the chorus for this song presents interesting lyrics.

"And I give up / Raising your kids, America / You treat 'em like an obligation / Welcome to the occupation."

For the most part, the lyrics on this album don't seem profound or intellectual, but that shouldn't suggest that they are poorly written.

The group discusses various social issues with their lyrics, such as politics and the American lifestyle.

Although some songs become repetitive halfway through, the album is a solid effort for the band.

"Cold War Kids" are not trying to use intricate words to make them seem smart or try to play a type of music they aren't accustomed to, they're just rocking.

And that's what they do best.

Calif. chihuahua flick conveys failing American markets

By Mark Caro
Chicago Tribune

When the economy goes to the dogs, moviegoers follow.

That's the apparent message of "Beverly Hills Chihuahua's" weekend box office triumph over the explosive, topical thriller "Body of Lies."

"Body of Lies" came in boasting three-time Oscar nominee "Titanic" star Leonardo DiCaprio, Oscar winner Russell Crowe and Ridley Scott, who directed Crowe in "Gladiator" and last year's hit "American Gangster."

Yet the big names and bigger action-film marketing were no match for Disney's pint-size pooches with Mexican accents, even though "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" already had been out for a week.

According to Monday's final numbers, "Chihuahua" grossed $17.5 million over the weekend, and "Body of Lies" pulled in $12.9 million, leaving it in third place behind the low-wattage horror film "Quarantine" ($14.2 million).

These numbers are being cited as inevitable signs of the times. Last week after all, was Wall Street's worst ever, and the general population was diagnosed with a case of high anxiety.

Did they choose to relieve their pain by seeing a mega-star thriller about the War on Terror? Nope. They went with the talking pooches.

"Movies that reflect what's going on in society in a realistic way may be a tough sell right now," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of the box office tallying company Media By Numbers. "With 'Chihuahua,' when you're sitting at that movie, how can you be thinking about your pocket book or your bank accounts or mortgage or your stocks and bonds?"

Of course, the PG-rated "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" and the R-rated, torture-depicting "Body of Lies" aren't exactly apples and oranges; they're more like apples and buzz saws.

Although Disney is touting the appeal of "Chihuahua" beyond parents and kids, those seeking a family-friendly comedy have few other options.

"This is 'Chihuahua' by default," said Neal Gabler, author of "Life: The Movie" and "Walt Disney."

"It's not that America has said, 'Oh, we have to see 'Beverly Hills Chihuahua' because the economy is melting down.'"

Gabler also debunked the "myth" that the nation flocks to escapist movies in dire times.

During the Great Depression, he said, movie attendance actually dipped, and studios didn't stop releasing socially relevant dramas in addition to the era's hit comedies and musicals.

"That notion that America whiled away its troubles at the movie theater is not true," Gabler said.

While "Beverly Hills Chihuahua" evoked fond memories of Taco Bell commercials, "Body of Lies" arrived shlepping the baggage of other recent Middle East-themed films that have sputtered. "In the Valley of Elah," "A Mighty Heart," "Rendition," "Lions for Lambs," "The Kingdom," "Grace Is Gone" and this year's "Stop Loss" and "The Lucky Ones."

Should the new movie's apparent failure be interpreted as a continuation of audiences' studious avoidance of this topic?

Or was the problem that "Body of Lies" has an unfun title, got so-so reviews and didn't give potential viewers the impression that they'd be seeing anything new?

One might note that the year's most popular movie also is about the War on Terror: "The Dark Knight." Darkness is just more fun with capes, face paint and killer filmmaking.

Members of the Massachusetts 4-H club are collecting non-perishable food items through November for area food shelters.

Cumberland Farms partners with 4-H

FOOD DRIVE from page 5

With seven Cumberland Farms locations within 10 miles of the University of Massachusetts, students can find many opportunities to donate non-perishable food items to local pantries and shelters this winter.

Waskiewicz anticipates a 4-H collegiate club at all campuses of the University of Massachusetts within a few years.

After completing the food drive phase this winter, 4-H directors and educators will campaign to bring more support to campus with promotion in the Campus Center and Student Union, as well as branching out and working in the on-campus eateries.

Furthermore, Waskiewicz hopes to coordinate efforts with the UMass Student Government Association, and continue efforts throughout various schools across the state.

"If we can build a structure of people and collaborate with other organizations to become one small piece of a larger machinery to alleviate hunger, that's what it comes down to," Waskiewicz said.

'Sounds of Animals' a fitting description

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

"The Ocean and The Sun," the sixth album from collective band, The Sound of Animals Fighting, is different from other albums, to say the least.

Not only do the members of this group wear animal masks, but they also go by the names of the animals. The Nightingale, The Walrus, The Lynx, and The Skunk.

After hearing this album, it is difficult to understand what they are trying to accomplish.

To be fair, they collectively hail from different bands, each stemming from different genres, and come together to create something new.

"The Ocean and The Sun"
Epitaph Records
4/10

The recording opens with a woman speaking in different tongues, which is the title track of the album. It's an interesting introduction, but it segues into "I, the Swan," which is a strong way to start the album.

The song is not so much melodic as it is interesting, and it sounds like the vocals were recorded in an echo-filled room.

The guitar riff repeats the same few notes for the entire song, which includes what sounds like a harp in some parts and a typewriter as a secondary sound effect.

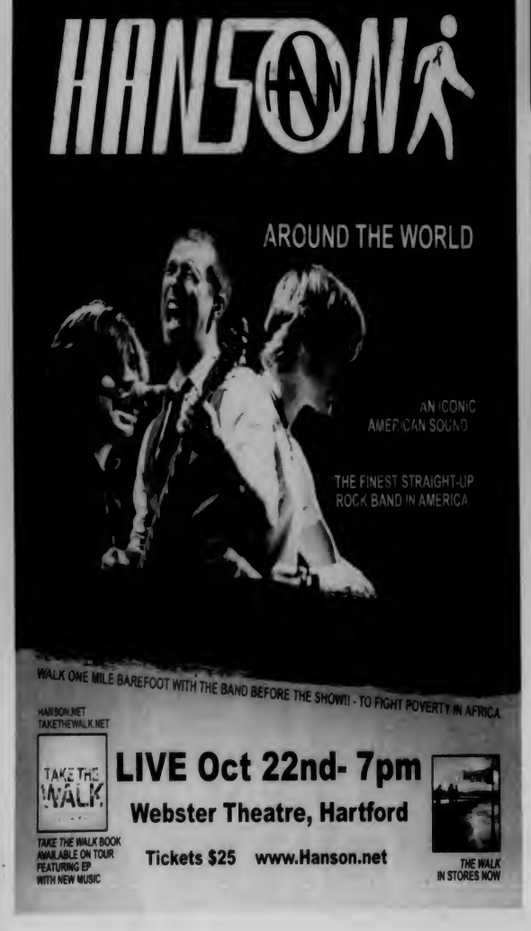
Another notable track is "Blessing Be Yours Mister V," which is a louder selection than the earlier songs in which the vocalist uses harmonies to offset the music. It sounds more progressive rock, and doesn't seem to belong on the album.

On "Another Leather Lung," which isn't a stand-out performance, children are speaking in what seems to be the same language as the introduction to the CD. Although it sounded somewhat strange, its sequence in the concept of the album is more evident to ardent fans.

As a whole, the album is musically advanced. The musicians are obviously proficient at their instruments and are trying to push the boundaries of what music is. Since most consider music to be objective – nothing is "good" or "bad" – this group wants to show something never done before.

Overall, the CD is easier to tolerate after a few additional listens. Comparable to The Mars Volta, it can come as a shock if the music is new, but in a sense that both bands are constantly trying new styles of music to further bend their genre.

The Sound of Animals Fighting is more relevant to those who are loyal followers, thus making this record just another step in the group's career.



It would be advised to listen to "The Ocean and The Sun" only when in a relaxed setting in which your mind is able to hold the unusual musical collection that the album brings.

Additional bands that helped with the recording include Circa Survive, Rx Bandits, Finch and the Autumns.

Minutewomen lead A-10

Defense makes goalkeeping statistics worst in league

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The No. 17 Massachusetts field hockey team and the U-21 Barbadian National Team have something in common; they both have Cher King on their forward line.

After her trip to the 2008 Junior Pan American Games, King returned to the Minutewomen (12-3-0, 4-0-0 Atlantic 10) to score two goals and add an assist in last weekend's games against West Chester and La Salle.

"She's very smart," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of King. "She has the ability to make the impossible pass. She sees the open lanes well. She also creates changes because of her urgency on the ball, in terms of taking free hits quickly. She gave us a great attack this weekend."

UMass Field Hockey

Against the Golden Rams (5-9-0, 0-3-0 A-10) King had two shots on goal and played 63 minutes, exiting only once in each half, both for special teams purposes.

While the Barbadian native is known as a scoring threat, her assist total (three) exceeds her goal total (two) for the first time in her career.

King ranks fourth on the team this season with 22 shots, 14 of which have been on goal. In 13 games, the Minutewomen have a 15.23 shots-per-game average, the highest in the conference.

King has a knack for beating on the defensive side of the ball. She is the only member of UMass to have multiple defensive saves (ones made by a team member other than the goalie) this season.

Her intensity is important to the team and she creates breakaways that make her teammates perform better.

Katelyn Orlando and Katie Kelly lead the team in goals and both have career highs in goals this season.

The unselfish nature of King and other players has made UMass a well-rounded team. The Maroon and White lead the conference in total team assists, with 28 and team assists per game with 2.15.

Senior midfielder and captain Mary Shea has one goal and six assists this season in all 13 games she has started. The No. 17 Minutewomen are 4-0-0 in Atlantic 10 play.

Less is more

Though the Minutewomen lead the conference in wins, some of their goal-tending statistics are among the worst in the conference – but for a different reason.

Sowry's defense has shed the title of "young" or "inexperienced," since UMass goalies have allowed 16 goals this season, the best number in the conference by a margin of seven.

Freshman goalie Alesha Widdall has 37 saves this season, third lowest in the conference. However, this is mainly because of the defenders in front of Widdall. The work that sophomores Jackie Iait and Jaime Bourazeris put in for the defensive line cannot be recorded on a stat sheet. The two backs follow Widdall's lead and are two of the main stoppers on the UMass defense.

The Minutewomen are allowing an average of 1.23 goals per game, another conference best.

The Maroon and White have not allowed opponents to score multiple goals during its five-game winning streak.

A reason for the influx in shots on goal by opposing teams is the abundance of penalty corners allowed this season by UMass. While the Minutewomen have achieved 114 penalty corners this season, they have also given up 102.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Jamie Bourazeris has three goals and three assists this season. The Minutewomen are the only undefeated team in A-10 play.

Running back leads Huskies

CAA from page 10

William & Mary wide receiver D.J. McAulay carries the ball in the Tribe's 27-13 victory over Delaware last weekend earning them a No. 23 ranking in national polls. William & Mary will take on Rhode Island next weekend at home.

ings. They have the daunted task of facing No. 1 James Madison. The Rams will head to Williamsburg, Va. to face William & Mary.

No. 11 New Hampshire avoids upset

UNH erased a 21-6 halftime deficit that left the Northeastern crowd in Brookline stunned. Sophomore quarterback R.J. Toman connected with his receivers for three second-half touchdowns to give the No. 11 Wildcats (5-1-0, 2-1-0 CAA) a road win. Terrance Fox was Toman's favorite target all day, hauling in 103 receiving yards to go along with a touchdown.

It's the second straight week that the Huskies (2-5-0, 1-2-0 CAA) have come close to taking down a top-10 FCS (Football Championship Subdivision) team. The Huskies well-balanced offensive attack was led by senior running back Alex Bromfield, who racked up 72 yards and two touchdowns on 19 carries. Quarterback Anthony Orio connected on 28 of 41 passes for 236 yards and a touchdown.

Northeastern travels north to face Maine next week. UNH heads home to meet the visiting Towson Tigers in Durham, N.H.

William & Mary overpower Delaware

Senior quarterback Jake Phillips' 338 yards and two touchdowns (one rushing) led the charge for William & Mary (4-2-0, 2-1-0 CAA). The Tribe put the game out of reach midway through the fourth quarter when Phillips connected with Chase Hill for a 44-yard touchdown, which all but crushed Delaware's chances of a comeback.

Ohio State transfer and current Delaware quarterback Robby Schoenhoft continued to struggle, completing 10 of 23 passes for 45 yards. The Blue Hens (2-5-0, 0-3-0 CAA) continue to struggle to find their first conference win.

After traveling to Hofstra next week, the Hens will face powerhouse teams like No. 1 James Madison, No. 7 Villanova and No. 9 Richmond.

William & Mary will return home next weekend looking to remain hot as it hosts Rhode Island for its homecoming game.

Rays' success hard to fathom

By Mike DiGiovanna
Los Angeles Times

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — The Tampa Bay Rays are going to the World Series.

Let that roll around on your tongue for a bit. Let it sink in.

Still hard to fathom? You're not alone.

Even some Rays, after their heart-stopping 3-1 victory over the Boston Red Sox on Sunday night clinched their first World Series berth and kept their magical, improbable, unfathomable, worst-to-first season alive, had trouble comprehending it all.

"I can't believe it, I really can't believe it," Tampa Bay reliever J.P. Howell said amid a wild celebration in Tropicana Field. "I just don't know what to say. Thank you, God. Thank you for this gift."
